Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, W. J. Massee, was arrested by sheriff of Spartanburg county under the mandate of his Excellency Cole L. Blease, governor of South Carolina, issued on the 25th day of July, 1912, in accordance with a requisition from his Excellency Ben W. Hooper, governor of Tennessee. On the same day, upon the application of Massee, Hon. T. S. Sease, circuit judge, issued a writ of habeas corpus returnable in the afternoon of that day. The sheriff made return to the writ: "That W. J. Massee is held in my custody under telegram from Governor Cole L. Blease and warrant issued by Magistrate A. H. Kirby, charged with making threats and using duress to induce Robert Williams to dismiss an action in United States court." The record contains this statement of the proceedings before Judge Sease: "Counsel for the petitioner then moved that the petitioner be admitted to bail pending the hearing of the foregoing writ. Counsel for the state objected on the ground that the statutory four days' notice had not been given. This objection was overruled, and his Honor passed the following order admitting Massee to bail, his Honor ruling and holding that appellant was entitled to four days' notice, but that he would admit the petitioner to bail in the meantime." Accordingly, an order was made that Massee be discharged from custody on giving bond in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for his appearance before Judge Sease on the 27th day of July, 1912. The bond was made, and Massee was discharged. In the meantime, on the 26th of July, Governor Blease, having received a telegram signed by Governor Hooper stating that the requisition had been signed by mistake and was revoked, requested Judge Sease to continue the hearing until Governor Hooper's telegram could be authenticated under the seal of the state of Tennessee. An order was accordingly made postponing the hearing until the 7th of August, and requiring Massee to appear in person before Judge Sease on the 7th day of August at 10:30 in the forenoon, and continuing the bond in force until that time. In passing this order, Judge Sease considered, without objection of counsel, the telegram of Governor Blease to him, the telegram of Governor Hooper to Governor Blease, and a telegram from James B. Cox, Esq., of Knoxville, to Massee, stating that Governor Hooper had promised to revoke the requisition.

Massee did not appear on the 7th of August, pleading illness as an excuse, and his counsel presented a paper, purporting to be signed by Massee, waiving his right to be present at the habeas corpus proceedings. Counsel for the state of Tennessee objected to the hearing in the absence of the petitioner, on the grounds "(a) that the bond was conditioned upon the personal appearance of the petitioner, W. J. Massee, before his Honor, and, upon the failure of the petitioner to enter his appearance in person, the condition of the bond was broken; (b) that in a habeas corpus proceeding in which ex vi termini, and, as the law directs, the body of the petitioner must be brought into court, the personal appearance of the petitioner was a duty, and not a personal right which could be waived." Overruling these objections, Judge Sease proceeded with the hearing, and admitted for his consideration in the matter the telegram from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease purporting to revoke the requisition, the telegram from James B. Cox, Esq., to Massee, stating that Governor Hooper had promised to revoke the requisition, and an affidavit of W. D. McNeil to the effect that, in a conversation with him Governor Hooper gave his reasons for reinstating the requisition, and stated that he did not previously sign the requisition.

In overruling the objection to all these documents, made on the ground that they were mere hearsay, and that the formal requisition of the governor of a state was not subject to collateral attack in this manner, and that counsel were taken by surprise, and had no opportunity to meet the statements of the affidavits of McNeil, Judge Sease held "that, as such had been introduced before him, and considered by him when he passed the order extending the time for the hearing, they were already in, and would be considered by him, as they were referred to in an order previously passed by him in this matter." Counsel for the prosecution then produced a telegram from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease, dated July 26, 1912, withdrawing the message of the day before purporting to revoke the requisition.

Upon this showing, after argument, Judge Sease made the following findings and judgment: "(1) That the requisition is irregular on its face, and not in conformity with the act of Congress relating thereto, in that no copy of the indictment found by the courts of Tennessee, as required by law, was produced; (2) I find, as a matter of fact, that the requisition was not authorized by the governor of Tennessee, but the same was issued without authority, and is therefore null and void. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the prisoner, W. J. Massee, be discharged from the custody of the sheriff, and his recognizance canceled of record, and that he be allowed to go hence without delay."

The validity of the requisition from the governor of Tennessee depends on whether the papers transmitted by him to Governor Blease were made out as required by the Federal statute, and we think that Judge Sease was clearly in error in holding that they were on their face irregular and defective. The statute provides: "Whenever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or territory, charging the person demanded of having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear." Revised Statutes of United States, § 5278, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3597. The objection sustained was that no copy of the indictment found by the courts of Tennessee was produced. The record before us shows that the copy of an indictment charging a crime under the laws of the state of Tennessee was attached to the requisition, and certified therein by Governor Hooper to be authentic. The objection that the certificate of the clerk of the circuit court stated that the paper purporting to be an indictment was a copy of the minutes of the court, and not of the indictment, has no foundation. Even under the strictest verbal test, the certificate can bear no other construction than that the indictment appears in the minute book, and that the indictment itself, not the minute book, was on file in the clerk's office. There can be no doubt that the requisition papers were on their face regular in every respect.

The assigned error next in sequence is the admission of the petitioner to bail pending the hearing, without notice to the attorneys representing the prosecution. The question made is not now a practical one, for the bail bond was taken, and the petitioner released, and it would be impossible for this court to restore the status existing before the bond was taken. But since the point is important, we may state our views of it. Legislation in respect to extradition of fugitives from one state to another being within the power of Congress, the regulations fixed by Federal statutes are paramount to state Constitutions and statutes, and all that a state court can do under habeas corpus proceedings is to determine whether the conditions prescribed by the Federal Constitution and statutes have been complied with. If they have not, the court may release absolutely or on bail, according to its discretion.

The general rule in habeas corpus proceedings is well established, that, pending a final hearing, the judge or court may admit to bail. Barth v. Clise, 12 Wall. 400, 20 L. ed. 393; Re Kaine, 14 How. 134, 14 L. ed. 357. But extradition laws are enacted on the presumption that the state making the demand will accord to the fugitive his right to bail and all other legal rights, and, when it is remembered that the power of the court or judge under habeas corpus is necessarily limited to the inquiry whether the conditions of the Federal laws have been met, it seems obvious that bail should not be allowed pending the hearing, unless some departure from the Federal law has been made to appear. On this point the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject of international extradition applies with equal force to state extradition. In Wright v. Henkel, 190 U. S. 40, 47 L. ed. 248, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 386, Chief Justice Fuller said: "The demanding government, when it has done all that the treaty and the law requires it to do, is entitled to the delivery of the accused on the issue of the proper warrant, and the other government is under obligation to make the surrender, an obligation which it might be impossible to fulfil if release on bail were permitted. The enforcement of the bond, if forfeited, would hardly meet the international demand, and the regaining of the custody of the accused obviously would be surrounded with serious embarrassment. And the same reasons which induced the language used in the statute would seem generally applicable to release pending examination." Ex parte Wall, 84 Miss. 783, 38 So. 628; Ex parte Hobbs, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 312, 40 Am. St. Rep. 782, 22 S. W. 1035; Re Foye, 21 Wash. 250, 57 Pac. 825; 19 Cyc. 96.

But under habeas corpus proceedings the courts may inquire whether the prisoner really falls under the conditions of the Federal statute, that is, whether he is subject to extradition. For example, they may ascertain whether the prisoner is the person charged, whether he is a fugitive from justice, whether the papers show that he was in the demanding state at the time the offense was committed, and whether the act charged was a crime against the laws of the demanding state; but judicial inquiry cannot extend to the motive of the proceedings. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 28 L. ed. 542, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544, declared the power of the state courts to inquire, under the writ of habeas corpus, whether the statutes of the United States have been complied with, using this language: "What we decide—and the present case requires nothing more—is that, so far as the Constitution and laws of the United States are concerned, it is competent for the courts of the state of California, or for any of her judges having power under her laws to issue writs of habeas corpus, to determine, upon writ of habeas corpus, whether the warrant of arrest and the delivery of the fugitive to the agent of the state of Oregon were in conformity with the statutes of the United States, if so, to remand him to the custody of the agent of [the state] of Oregon."

In Pearce v. Texas, 155 U. S. 311, 39 L. ed. 164, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 116, the court approved of the action of the courts of the asylum state in leaving to the courts of the demanding state the protection of the prisoner in his constitutional rights.

In Hyatt v. New York, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. ed. 657, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 311, it was held that the court might discharge the prisoner when it appeared on the face of the extradition papers that he was not in the demanding state at the time the crime was committed; but in Munsey v. Clough, 196 U. S. 364, 49 L. ed. 515, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282, the court said: "But the court will not discharge a defendant arrested under the governor's warrant where there is merely contradictory evidence on the subject of presence in or absence from the state, as habeas corpus is not the proper proceeding to try the question of alibi, or any question as to the guilt or innocence of the accused."

The court held, in Pettibone v. Nichols, 203 U. S. 192, 51 L. ed. 148, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 7 Ann. Cas. 1047, that the inquiry in habeas corpus, whether the prisoner was a fugitive from justice, could not extend to an inquiry into his guilt or innocence, saying that "the constitutional and statutory provisions referred to were based upon the theory that, as between the states, the proper place for the inquiry into the question of the guilt or innocence of an alleged fugitive from justice is in the courts of the state where the offense is charged to have been committed."

In Pierce v. Creecy, 210 U. S. 387, 52 L. ed. 1113, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 714, Mr. Justice Moody lays down the limitation of the judicial power of inquiry in habeas corpus in this language: "This court, in the cases already cited, has said, somewhat vaguely, but with as much precision as the subject admits, that the indictment, in order to constitute a sufficient charge of crime to warrant interstate extradition, need show no more than that the accused was substantially charged with crime. This indictment meets and surpasses that standard, and is enough. If more were required, it would impose upon courts, in the trial of writs of habeas corpus, the duty of a critical examination of the laws of states with whose jurisprudence and criminal procedure they can have only a general acquaintance. Such a duty would be an intolerable burden, certain to lead to errors in decision, irritable to the just pride of the states, and fruitful of miscarriages of justice. The duty ought not to be assumed, unless it is plainly required by the Constitution, and, in our opinion, there is nothing in the letter or the spirit of that instrument which requires or permits its performance."

These statements of the principle involved by the tribunal to whose authority, in questions of this kind, all other courts must yield, have made clear the principle that the authority of the courts in extradition proceedings does not extend to inquiry into the motive or into the merits of the case in any respect. The supreme court of this state and other state courts of high authority have explicitly laid down the same limitation.

In Ex parte Swearingen, 13 S. C. 74, Mr. Justice McIver, with his usual force and clearness, thus states the rule: "It seems to us that the true rule is that when a requisition comes to the governor of this state for any person found in this state, which shows upon its face that all the requirements of the act of Congress have been complied with, it is the duty of the proper authorities of this state to recognize the statements of fact made therein as true, and to surrender to the agent of the state making the demand the person demanded, in the fullest confidence that he will receive ample justice at the hands of the authorities of such state. The very fact that there is no mode of enforcing the performance of the duty imposed upon the governor of the state upon which the demand is made, by mandamus or otherwise (Kentucky v. Dennison, supra, 24 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 717), makes it all the more obligatory that he should be scrupulously exact and prompt in the performance of such duty, and that the courts should not lend their aid to defeat the provisions of the Constitution so essential to the preservation of that good will which ought always to exist between sister states, by demanding more than is required by the act of Congress." Re Sultan, 115 N. C. 57, 28 L.R.A. 294, 44 Am. St. Rep. 433, 20 S. E. 375; Barranger v. Baum, 103 Ga. 465, 68 Am. St. Rep. 113, 30 S. E. 524; Singleton v. State, 144 Ala. 104, 42 So. 23; Ex parte Edwards, 91 Miss. 621, 44 So. 827; Bruyneel v. Wies, 153 Iowa, 565, 133 N. W. 1057. See also extended note in 57 Am. Dec. 395; 21 Cyc. 329.

Another established and obvious principle is that, when the extradition papers are regular on their face, every intentment is to be indulged in favor of their validity, and the burden is on the prisoner to show that some one of the conditions of extradition prescribed by the statutes, as above indicated, has not been met. Marbles v. Creecy, 215 U. S. 63, 54 L. ed. 92, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32. When the prisoner has made that prima facie showing, the court or judge issuing the writ may admit him to bail pending the final hearing on the writ.

Applying these settled rules, it is perfectly clear that the circuit judge erred in admitting the prisoner to bail pending the final hearing. When the application was made, the showing before the judge consisted of the requisition papers of the governor of Tennessee, and the mandate of the governor of South Carolina, all made out in accordance with the statute, and the verified petition of the prisoner. This petition contained nothing but statements that he intended to show that, while the prisoner had violated the criminal laws of Tennessee, he was guilty of no moral wrong; that the prosecution was a hardship on him; that it was instituted to collect a debt, and that the governor of Georgia had refused to issue a requisition. All this had no tendency to show that the extradition statute had not been complied with, and therefore, under the principle just stated and the authorities sustaining it, furnished no ground whatever for the discharge of the prisoner on bail. This being so, the law required that the petitioner should be remanded to the custody of the sheriff to be thereafter surrendered to the state of Tennessee, according to the mandate of the governor of the state of South Carolina, unless, at the future hearing ordered for 27th of July, a successful attack should be made on the regularity of the proceedings.

It was further contended, on appeal, that the circuit judge erred in admitting the petitioner to bail without four days' notice to the counsel representing the prosecution. The state statute provided: "When it appears, from the return of the writ or otherwise, that the party is imprisoned on a criminal accusation, he shall not be discharged until sufficient notice has been given to the attorney general or circuit solicitor, or other attorney acting for the state, that he may appear and object to such discharge, if he think fit." We are not now concerned with the question whether a judge may not grant bail in cases of emergency, when the prisoner is entitled to bail, under the Constitution, as a matter of course, the only question being as to the amount. Here, as we have seen, he was not entitled to bail as a matter of course, but only when a prima facie showing of noncompliance with the requisition statute should be made, and in such a case, while the statute does not prescribe the time, its clear import is that counsel shall have sufficient notice to enable them to resist the application for bail. The time is in the discretion of the circuit judge; but we think that there is strong reason for the position that it was error of law for the circuit judge to grant bail to a prisoner held on extradition proceedings, against the objection of counsel for the prosecution, on a few hours' notice. As the court is not unanimous now even on that point, and its decision is not necessary in this case, it is left undecided. We hold that the circuit judge was in error when he granted bail, because, on the showing before him, the petitioner was not entitled to bail.

The circuit judge erred, also, in admitting as evidence to impeach the requisition of the governor of Tennessee, solemnly made over his official signature and under the great seal of the state, mere affidavits of outside persons, to the effect that the governor of Tennessee had told them that he had not signed the requisition. No argument or authority need be adduced to show that such a method of impeaching an official document is not only contrary to the rules of evidence, but would be an intolerable impugning by the judiciary of the most solemn communications between the highest executives of sovereign states.

On the other hand, the circuit judge was clearly right in considering the telegram from Governor Blease, and that from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease indicating a withdrawal of the requisition. But even these telegrams were not sufficient authority to warrant the circuit judge's holding that the requisition had been revoked. They were of value only as justifying a continuation of the hearing to a future day, so as to give Governor Hooper an opportunity to withdraw his requisition by a formal communication to Governor Blease to that import. Governor Blease expressed accurately the force to be given to them when he requested Judge Sease to continue the habeas corpus proceedings until he could get the substance of the telegrams authenticated under the seal of the state of Tennessee. This was no doubt the view of the circuit judge also, who had before him, in addition to the documents above referred to, a communication from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease withdrawing the message of revocation, for he does not rest his order of discharge on the ground that the requisition had been withdrawn.

The final question is whether there was error in considering and adjudicating the petition, and discharging the petitioner in his absence. The petitioner did not appear according to the terms of the bond, but submitted a physician's affidavit to the effect that he was too sick to leave his home, in the city of Macon. Whether this affidavit was sufficient to warrant a further continuance would have been in the discretion of the circuit judge, if the petitioner had been properly discharged; but the principle is well settled in this state that, when an accused person gives bail for his appearance at a future time for the adjudication of the question whether his body shall be held in custody or released, he cannot have his right to discharge adjudicated, unless he is actually in the presence of the court, or in the custody of an officer subject to the court's order. If he fails to appear without legal excuse, his bail will be forfeited, and his application for the inquiry as to the legality of his arrest and detention will be considered abandoned. If he offers sufficient excuse for not appearing, then the cause must be continued until it is possible for him to appear. In habeas corpus proceedings, the whole matter before the judicial officer is whether the accused shall be released or remanded to custody. Unless he is present in person or subject to the order of the court, it is manifest the court cannot make effective its judgment against the person. A preliminary hearing demanded by the prisoner falls under the same principle. In considering the point, as applied to a preliminary hearing, the court said, in State v. Rabens, 79 S. C. 542, 60 S. E. 442, 1110, 14 Ann. Cas. 968: "A preliminary examination must have one of three results, dependent on the decision of the magistrate: The discharge of the defendant; the taking of bail for his appearance to answer the indictment; or his imprisonment. It may be the magistrate, in the absence of the defendant, could adjudge his discharge; but to take bail from the defendant or commit him to jail, it was manifestly necessary for him to be present in person. The defendant could not demand that the magistrate go through the empty form of conducting an examination which could have no efficient result. By failing to appear in person, he had forfeited the recognizance (State v. Minton, 19 S. C. 280), and he waived his preliminary examination when, by voluntary absence, he made it impossible for the magistrate to enforce his judgment."

The judgment of this court is that the order of Judge Sease be reversed, and that the petitioner be required to appear in person before Judge Sease on a day to be designated by him, and that he then be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Spartanburg county to be surrendered to the proper officer of the state of Tennessee, unless it shall officially appear that the requisition of the governor of Tennessee or the mandate of the governor of the state of South Carolina has been revoked.

Petition for rehearing denied August 25, 1913.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

G. WORTHEN AGEE et al., Appts.,
v.

D. D. SAUNDERS, Exr., etc., of Mrs. Kate Saunders Agee, Deceased.

(127 Tenn. 680, 157 S. W. 64.)

Executor and administrator — life insurance money — year's support.

Under a statute making life insurance distributable according to the law of distribution, free from the claims of creditors, it cannot be subjected to the year's support of the widow, which, by statute, is to be set apart out of the money on hand or due, or other assets.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County allowing a year's support to the executor of the widow of George W. Agee, deceased, out of the proceeds of certain life insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fitzhugh & Biggs and Thomas A. Evans for appellants.

Mr. L. B. McFarland, for appellee:

Life insurance money, collected by the administrator of the estate of the insured, on policy payable to his representatives, is subject to be set aside for year's allowance, where this is the only asset of the deceased, or personalty from which the year's allowance could have been made.

Proceeds of such policies, payable to personal representatives, are simply personal assets of the estate, and have the same legal status as other personal assets, with this exception,—they are not subject to the debts of the husband.

Neill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George W. Agee died intestate, on October 9, 1908, in Memphis, Tennessee, leaving the complainants as his only children, and Mrs. Kate Saunders Agee as his widow. She qualified as his administratrix, and has since died, and the defendant, D. D. Saunders, has qualified as her executor. Mrs. Kate Saunders Agee, as the widow of George W. Agee, applied to the probate court of Shelby county for the appointment of commissioners to set apart to her a year's support under the statute applicable to that subject. The deceased left no property, except two insurance policies, one of which was payable to the widow, and therefore belonged to her, and the other payable to his estate. The commissioners set apart to the widow for her year's support $3,000 out of the policy which was made payable to the estate. At the date of the death of the intestate there was due on this policy $5,749, which was paid to the administratrix, and out of this she appropriated the $3,000 set apart to her by the commissioners as aforesaid. The residue was divided equally between the two children and herself as distributees; the former reserving the right to sue for and recover their one third portion of the amount which she had retained for her year's support.

The foregoing is the substance of an agreed case submitted to the chancellor. He decreed in favor of the defendant, and the complainants appealed to this court.

The question submitted is whether the insurance policy was properly applied to the payment of the year's support. We are of the opinion that it could not be so used, and that the chancellor's decree was erroneous, and should be reversed, for the following reasons:

Our statute upon the subject of the year's support reads:

"Upon the application of the widow of an intestate, or of a widow who dissents from her husband's will, the county court shall appoint three freeholders, unconnected with her either by consanguinity or affinity, who, being first duly sworn to act impartially, shall set apart so much of the crop, stock, provisions, moneys on hand or due, or other assets, as may be necessary for the support of such widow and her family until the expiration of one year after the decease of her husband." Shannon's Code, § 4020.

The statute upon the subject of life insurance reads:

"A life insurance effected by a husband on his own life shall inure to the benefit of the widow and next of kin, to be distributed as personal property, free from the claims of his creditors." Shannon's Code, § 4030.

There is another section to the same purport, which reads as follows:

"Any life insurance effected by a husband on his own life shall, in case of his death, inure to the benefit of his widow and children; and the money thence arising shall be divided between them according to the law of distributions, without being in any manner subject to the debts of the husband, whether by attachment, execution, or otherwise." Shannon's Code, § 4231.

An insurance policy so left is, according to these sections, exempt property. Such property is not assets. The term "assets" is defined in our Code by exclusion as follows: "Every debtor's property, except such as may be specially exempt by law, is assets for the satisfaction of all his just debts." Shannon's Code, § 3985. The term "assets," therefore, under our law of administration, means, in its largest sense, property subject to the payment of the debts of the decedent. It is divided into personal assets and real assets. There is another division also, known as equitable assets. Personal assets are those which go into the hand of the administrator for the payment of debts, and this is the class referred to in § 4020. Real assets consist of

While the few decisions on this question reach a result contrary to that in AGEE v. SAUNDERS, they in no way militate against it, as they involve statutes quite different from that governing the AGEE CASE.

In Re Miller, 121 Cal. 353, 53 Pac. 906, the court set aside to the widow the proceeds of a policy on the life of her deceased husband, under a statute providing for the setting aside to the surviving husband or wife all the property exempt from execution, apparently the only question being whether the policy was exempt, and the court holding that the fact that it was payable to the insured's executor or administrator did not affect its exemption under a statute exempting all moneys and benefits in any manner growing out of any life insurance on the life of the debtor.

Likewise in McLean v. Martin, 155 Ala. 208, 45 So. 295, it was contended that a policy of insurance payable to the husband's estate did not constitute a part of the personal property belonging to the decedent at the time of his death, and that therefore it could not be set apart as exempt for the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

use of the widow; but the court pointed out that the statute declared "things in action" to be personal property, and that therefore, since an insurance policy was a chose in action, the proceeds thereof became a part of the estate, and could therefore be set aside to the widow under the exemption law.

Without disclosing the language of the statutory provisions, the court in Meyer v. Meyer, 25 S. D. 596, 127 N. W. 595, held that although a policy of insurance made payable to the insured or to his administrators, executors, or assigns might be disposed of by will under the statute, it was nevertheless subject to the statutory allowance of the surviving wife and minor children under another provision, and took precedence over a specific bequest. So, it seems that the proceeds of life insurance fall within the general rule announced in 18 Cyc. 386, that the statutory allowance comes from all personalty belonging unqualifiedly to the decedent, notwithstanding specific or general bequests elsewhere.

land, which must be subjected by special proceedings. Equitable assets may be either real or personal, but require the aid of a court of equity for their subjection, owing to their nature, usually based on some provision in a will.

It is perceived that under § 4020 the year's support must be taken out of "the crops, stock, provisions, moneys on hand or due, or other assets."

Since an exempt insurance policy is not assets, it does not fall within the terms of the statute.

This reasoning is not impaired by the fact that an administrator, after the debts are paid, must pay to the distributees any of the assets left in his hands, and that the duty also devolves upon him to collect an insurance policy payable as the one involved in the present case, and that he must distribute the amount collected between the widow and children as distributees of the estate. Both funds are subject to distribution, but both are not assets. One falls under the designation of assets left over after the payment of debts; the other, under the heading of exempt property, which is not subject to debts. The latter must be distributed as soon as collected, without regard to debts. The year's support must be taken out of the assets, not out of the exempt property.

The subject is further illustrated by § 4023 of Shannon's Code, which is as follows: "The property exempt by law from execution shall, on the death of the husband, be exempt from execution in the hands of, and be vested in, the widow, without regard to the size or solvency of the estate of the deceased, for herself and in trust for the benefit of the children of the deceased, or of the widow, or of both, and shall not go to the executor or administrator; and, in case there be no widow, and the estate be either solvent or insolvent, such property shall be exempt for the benefit of the minor children under fifteen." This refers to certain articles of personal property specified in our statutes for the benefit of heads of families. No reason appears why property of this class might not be invaded for the purpose of setting aside the year's support equally as well as an exempt insurance fund. The effect of holding that either class of exemptions could be so used would be to reduce exemptions to two classes, while our statutes provide for three, viz., the year's support, the items of exempt personal property, and the insurance fund. If such construction were permitted, it would always be insisted by creditors that the year's support should be taken out of one or the other of the two latter classes of exemptions, thereby causing two to coalesce and thus 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

serve the creditors at the expense of the widow and children,—a kind of marshaling in favor of creditors against the beneficiaries under our exemption statutes, thereby defeating the letter as well as the spirit of the statute. This would not be permitted in a court of equity, if that court could obtain control of the property in any particular case; but in most instances the matter would rest wholly within the jurisdiction of the probate court, where, under the operation of the rule insisted on, there would necessarily occur daily evasions of the exemption laws.

A decree will be entered in accordance with this opinion. The defendant will pay the cost of the cause.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

RE DETERMINATION OF INHERITANCE TAX ON ESTATE OF JOSEPH DESSERT, Deceased.

STATE OF WISCONSIN et al., Appts.,

v.

HENRY M. THOMPSON et al., Resp'ts.

Tax — succession — gift by aged person.

That a man has reached the age of eighty-six years when he makes a substantial gift of property to his child does not, if he was sound in mind and body, show that it was made in contemplation of death, so as to bring it within the operation of a statute imposing succession taxes.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in defendants' favor as to part of the claim in a proceeding to fix the inheritance tax

Note. — Succession tax upon gift in contemplation of death.

In many jurisdictions the statutes do not confine their operation to testamentary gifts or successions ab intestato, but expressly extend to at least two other forms of gifts; namely, gifts in contemplation of death, which is the subject of the present note, supplementing the earlier note on the same question appended to Re Benton, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458; and, second, to transfers made or intended to take effect upon the death of the grantor. The cases involving this latter part are collected in the note to Keeney v. The Comptroller, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1139.

As said in 37 Cyc. 1567, these provisions are intended to prevent evasions of the inheritance tax by distributions of property upon the estate of Joseph Dessert, deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court for Milwaukee county determining the amount of inheritance tax payable by the estate of Joseph Dessert, deceased. The county court determined that the value of the estate, including gifts made in contemplation of death, was $711,404.62; that the clear value of the estate at the time of Mr. Dessert's death was $709,704.12; and that the amount of inheritance tax payable thereon was $17,208.12. The executors appealed from this determination to the circuit court. By agreement of the parties the appeal was heard on the evidence taken in the county court. The circuit court reversed the determination made by the county court and made findings of fact and conclusions of law, of which the following is an epitome: The deceased at the time of his death in December, 1910, was ninety-two years of age. He made his will April 2, 1891, which will provided for certain specific bequests aggregating $7,700, and devised and bequeathed the remainder of his estate to Stella D. Thompson, the only child of the testator. The property which she took under the will, after the payment of administration expenses, was of the appraised value of $207,341.37. Prior to 1904 the deceased was actively engaged in the lumber business at Mosinee for many years. In the spring of that year he removed to Mil-among the members of a family or others just before death of the owner; and whether or not a transfer is deemed to have been made in contemplation of death is a question of fact in the determination of which the donor's age, his physical condition at the time, and the length of time he actually survives, should be taken into account.

It is shown in the earlier note in 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458, that a gift made with the consciousness that death is impending will be deemed to have been made in contemplation of death, irrespective of whether it is a gift causa mortis, or a gift inter vivos in view of such impending death. That note further shows that this is particularly the view in Illinois, and that while some of the New York courts took the same view, others held that the statute applies only to gifts causa mortis; but that the latter courts, notwithstanding this, reached conclusions that would have been reached under the Illinois rule by apparently regarding any gift made in extremis as a gift causa mortis, or by holding that in any event a gift, even if inter vivos, was subject to a tax if made and received with the intent and for the purpose of evading the provisions of the transfer tax act.

But in the New York case of Re Palmer, 117 App. Div. 360, 102 N. Y. Supp. 236, Smith, J., expressly indorsing the Illinois view, held that the words, "in contemplation of death," as used in the statute, embraced gifts "inter vivos" as well as causa mortis, and therefore held the provision applicable where a decedent who was ill of a lingering disease which affected both his mind and body assigned all his property, about three months prior to his death, to a son in trust for the widow and next of kin. One judge dissented and two concurred in the result that the property was taxable, but declared it unnecessary to hold that the gift was made in contemplation of death.

And regarding the Palmer Case as holding that the statute embraces gifts inter vivos made in contemplation of death, the court in Re Price, 62 Misc. 149, 116 N. Y. Supp. 283, indorsed the doctrine of the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

former case, and therefore held that the provision applies where a man seventy-six years of age who for two years had been under medical treatment, some of the time in hospitals and sanitariums, conveyed all of his real estate to his adopted son ten days before his death, stating to his attorney at the time that he did not know when his ailment would take a turn for the worse, and explaining that he desired to make such disposition of his property as would save his son the annoyance of the will contest.

In People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 93 N. E. 379, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, the court states in a general way that an owner may give away or otherwise dispose of his property or any part of it in any manner he sees fit, and if such disposition takes effect in possession and enjoyment during his lifetime it will not be subject to an inheritance tax unless made in contemplation of his death. In this case the court held that the statutory provision did not apply, inasmuch as the gift was not made in contemplation of death, but was made in consideration of the donee's contract to care for the donor's daughter during her life.

As to the applicability of the succession tax acts to property conveyed, or agreed to be conveyed, in consideration of the support of the grantor during his life, see the note to Re Lamb, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 226.

The case of State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351, is sufficiently set out in RE DESSERT.

In Re Bullen, 143 Wis. 512, 128 N. W. 109, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1114, the transfer did not take effect until after the death of the donor, and the court summarily declared that the transfer was made in contemplation of death, and was also intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, thus it seems inadvertently creating the inference that it does not regard the two provisions as mutually exclusive, but regards the provision as to transfers in contemplation of death sufficiently broad to include, among others, transfers intended to take effect at or after such death.

waukeee and ceased to take an active interest in his business; the same being thereafter attended to by his son-in-law, Henry M. Thompson. The deceased made his home with his daughter the last twenty-two years of his life, during which time he did not contribute anything towards the maintenance of the household or pay anything for the accommodations which he received there. For more than ten years prior to September 10, 1910, he was in continuous good health and his mental faculties were in no way impaired. His physical and mental condition during this period was unusual for a man of his age, and there is no evidence of any condition, except age, which suggests that he had any reason to believe or suspect at any time prior to a few days before his death that death might be imminent or impending. The deceased maintained an active interest in things generally until the first part of September, 1910, at which time he was overtaken with a seemingly slight indisposition, which marked a change in his condition, and after which he gradually declined until he died, having acute symptoms for only a few days prior to his death. During his lifetime the testator made gifts to Stella D. Thompson and to her husband as follows:

July 6, 1903	To Mr. Thompson,	cash	$ 6,500 00
Dec. 25, 1905	To Mr. Thompson, 75 shares of stock Elkhorn Lbr. Co., face value $7,500, actual value		15,000 00
Dec. 25, 1905	To Mrs. Stella D. Thompson, 75 shares of stock of Elkhorn Lbr. Co., par value $7,500, actual value		15,000 00
July 1, 1906	To Mrs. Thompson, securities of the value of		229,971 29
Feb. 11, 1907	To Mr. Thompson, cash		5,000 00
Feb. 24, 1907	To Mr. Thompson, cash		7,100 00
Dec. 25, 1907	To Mrs. Thompson, stock of Dessert Redwood Co., 813 shares, par value $81,300, actual value		175,852 00
Feb. 21, 1908	To Mr. Thompson, cash		6,000 00
June 5, 1909	To Mr. Thompson, cash		4,000 00
Nov. 27, 1909	To Mrs. Thompson, cash		12,000 00
Oct. 26, 1910	To Mrs. Thompson, cash		12,000 00
Dec. 14, 1910	To Mrs. Thompson, cash		6,000 00
Total amount of gifts prior to death			$494,423 29

The gifts made as of December 25, 1905 and 1907, were declared to be Christmas presents at the time they were made. The stocks were actually transferred on the books of the corporation two days later. As soon as the gifts of the securities were made they were turned over to Mrs. Thompson, and deceased never received, either directly or indirectly, any profit or advantage therefrom or exercised any control over them. The same is true in reference to the corporation stocks. None of the transfers of the property of the deceased were made in contemplation of the death of the donor, nor were they intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, except as to the gifts of October 26th and December 14th aggregating $18,000, in reference to which no contention was made by the appellants. In determining the value of the estate of the deceased and the amount thereof and of the property transferred by the deceased prior to his death, the transfers of which are subject to an inheritance tax, the sum of $476,423.29 in gifts should be excluded, and the transfer of the property which was the subject of said gifts is not subject to any transfer tax under the laws of Wisconsin, except the two items amounting to $18,000 above referred to. As a conclusion of law the court found that the appellants were entitled to judgment, and that the value of the estate of the deceased for the purpose of determining the inheritance tax thereon is $234,741.87, and further adjudged that the clear value of said estate as of the date of the death of the testator, after proper deductions, is $233,041.37; that the transfers of gifts, legacies, and devises aggregating $225,341.37 to Stella D. Thompson are subject to the payment of an inheritance tax. The amount of such tax was adjudged to be $4,723.54, instead of $17,208.12 found by the county court. From this judgment the state of Wisconsin and the county of Milwaukee prosecute this appeal.

Messrs. W. C. Owen, Attorney General, Walter Drew, and Edward Yockey, for appellants:

The facts show that these gifts were made in contemplation of the death of donor.

The burden of showing expressly that a gift is made in contemplation of death is not upon the state.

Mr. Lawrence A. Olwell, for respondents:

The question of whether the gifts under consideration were made in contemplation of death is a question of fact of which the finding of the trial court is final.

The right to impose an inheritance tax must rest upon evidence sufficient in probative force to bring it within the statute, and must show a case from which the law clearly authorizes its imposition.

The inheritance tax, not being a tax upon property, but upon the right to receive property, in other words, an excise tax upon the transfer (Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 Ann. Cas. 711; Beals v. State, 139 Wis. 544, 121 N. W. 347; State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351; Re Bullen, 143 Wis. 512, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1114, 128 N. W. 109), the statute must be strictly construed, being in derogation of common-law rights.

Where a statute has received a judicial construction in another state and is then adopted, it is taken with the construction so given it.

In New York, from which state our statute was taken, the words, "in contemplation of death," do not refer to that general expectation which every mortal entertains, but rather the apprehension which arises from some existing condition of body or some impending peril.

"Contemplation of death," in order to subject the transfer of property to an inheritance tax for that reason, must be the impelling motive for making a disposition of property.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no serious dispute on the facts of this case. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the gifts were made in contemplation of death. The only substantial question in the case is whether the circuit court was warranted in drawing the inferences which it did from the testimony. If the evidence fairly justified the drawing of such inferences, the decision of the lower court must be affirmed. Kola Lumber Co. v. Stoughton Wagon Co. 143 Wis. 329, 127 N. W. 974.

It is undisputed that the deceased was active and healthy in mind and body until about three months before he died. The first large gift was made four and one half years prior to his death, and the second a few days less than three years before death. All of the gifts were made to his daughter and her husband. Deceased had made his home with his daughter for twenty-two years before he died.

The contention of the appellants is that the gifts were made in contemplation of death and were in the nature of a final distribution of the estate, and are therefore subject to the inheritance tax. The following reasons are urged in support of this contention: (1) The gifts were substantially in accordance with the will of the deceased, made in 1891. (2) They included more than two thirds of a large estate. (3) The deceased had reached an extreme old age. (4) He had surrendered the management of his property and business.

The first, second, and fourth reasons assigned are not very significant. The will gave practically all of the estate to the daughter. As she was his only child, this was a perfectly natural disposition to make of it. If he desired to make substantial gifts, naturally they would be made to her. It is true she would receive the property under the will if the gifts had not been made. She would also receive the estate if no will had been made. These facts do not argue that the gifts were "made in contemplation of death," as that term is used in the statute. The daughter was a woman of mature years when the first large gift was made. Her age is not given, but she had been married eighteen years at the time. Men, like the deceased, who start with nothing and accumulate large fortunes, are naturally desirous that they be neither squandered nor dissipated by their heirs. As hard-headed men of affairs, they appreciate that it is ordinarily undesirable that any considerable sums of money should come into the hands of their children until they have had time to acquire the wisdom and experience which will enable them to take care of it. They appreciate the further fact that it is ordinarily undesirable that large fortunes be placed within their control at one time. If a part only is given and it is prudently handled, then the capacity for handling more is shown. If it is unwisely handled, there is still an opportunity to profit by former mistakes when other sums are forthcoming and before it is too late. It is for these reasons that trust estates are created so that large properties cannot be manipulated by those who have not acquired the maturity of character or business ability to manage them. We apprehend that one of the substantial pleasures in the life of an aged person is to observe the objects of his bounty make a judicious use of what has been bestowed on them.

When the first substantial gift was made to Mr. Thompson, the deceased still had left an estate of over $400,000. The next large gift was made a year and a half later. In the meantime the deceased had an opportunity to observe whether or not the daughter and her husband had the necessary capacity to handle the estate. At the time of his death the testator still had left an estate of over $217,000, or a sum large enough so that the income therefrom would greatly exceed his wants. It is also somewhat significant that the first of the two large gifts referred to was made about two years after the plaintiff had intrusted his son-in-law with the active management of his affairs and had had an opportunity to become fully acquainted with his business capacity. Leaving out of consideration the question of old age, there is nothing in the case that distinguishes it from any other where a parent during his lifetime gives a large portion of his estate to his children. This practice is not uncommon. Men who have built up a substantial business and acquired a competence through their thrift and business capacity frequently desire to be relieved from the cares and worries of their business as they become aged, and they turn the same over to their sons. Farmers frequently dispose of their farms in the same way. The real question is whether a gift made to a child by an aged parent sound in mind and body is subject to an inheritance tax because the donor was advanced in years when the gift was made. If this question is answered in the negative, the further question arises: Should the instant case be taken out of the operation of the general rule because of the unusual age which Mr. Dessert had attained when the gifts were made?

The material part of the inheritance tax statute, § 1087-1, is as follows: "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon any transfer of property, real, personal, or mixed, or any interest therein, or income therefrom in trust or otherwise, to any person . . . in the following cases: (1) When the transfer is by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person dying possessed of the property while a resident of this state. (2) . . . (3) When the transfer is of property made by a resident . . . by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death."

An act is not done in contemplation of death when the feeling that dissolution is approaching is absent, and is not the cause which impels or prompts the doing of the act. An aged person in good health who has acquired a competency and who desires to retire from active life may desire to distribute a portion of his accumulations among his children without any thought of impending death. He may derive genuine enjoyment from seeing them enjoy the fruits of his accumulations if they put them to good use, and may take pleasure in giving his advice or counsel as to how the business or property turned over should be managed or handled. The question of whether such a person may have a few years or many years to live is not a consideration that has entered into or affected the transaction. He does not give because he is anticipating death, but because it affords him a pleasure in life.

It was held in State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351, that the words "in contemplation of death," as used in the statute quoted were, "not used as referring to that expectation of death generally entertained by every person." Speaking affirmatively, the opinion proceeds: "The words are evidently intended to refer to an expectation of death which arises from such a bodily or mental condition as prompts persons to dispose of their property and bestow it on those whom they regard as entitled to their bounty." In further explanation of the phrase it is said: "A gift is made in contemplation of an event when it is made in expectation of that event and having it in view, and a gift made when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending, and in view of that event, is within the language of the statute." In that case the circuit court held that the gifts made by Captain Pabst were subject to the inheritance tax principally because he was suffering from a serious, if not a necessarily fatal, disease at the time the gifts were made, which ultimately produced death; and this court affirmed the judgment. The definition of the words, "in contemplation of death," given in the Pabst Case, does not differ from that announced by the New York court in Re Baker, 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed in 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094, where it is said: "This court has held that the words, 'in contemplation of the death,' do not refer to that general expectation which every mortal entertains, but rather the apprehension which arises from some existing condition of body or some impending peril." Neither does it differ from the interpretation put upon the words by the Illinois court in People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 604, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379, where it held that contemplation of death must be the impelling motive for making the gift, in order that it be subject to an inheritance tax.

It is only gifts made in contemplation of death that are taxable. A parent has the right to give his property to any proper subject of his bounty, freed from any transfer tax, provided the contemplation of death is not the cause which impels the making of the donation.

It is apparent, therefore, that it would be illogical to hold that proof that a person was aged when he made a gift conclusively establishes that it was made in contemplation of death. This could not be true if the donor might be actuated by any other motive. Common knowledge and experience teach us that aged people frequently give property to their children because of their desire to help them, and without any thought in reference to their own deaths. Mr. Carnegie is an old man in years. He has given away what would make several princely fortunes. It could not be fairly said that the feeling that he must soon die was the cause that actuated him to give.

Instead, it was the pleasure of bestowing a part of his fortune where he conceived it would accomplish much for the uplift and betterment of mankind by furnishing useful and healthful reading matter free of charge.

This brings us to the last question in the case, and that is whether the age of Mr. Dessert was so great when the gifts in question were made as to establish the fact that they were made in contemplation of death. If there is room for conflicting inferences, the decision of the circuit court must stand. The deceased was eighty-six years old when he made the first of the large gifts, and a year and a half older when the second one was made. He died at the age of ninety-two, being sound and active in mind and body until three months before his death. The evidence all tended to show that his physical and mental faculties remained unimpaired until his last illness, except that he was somewhat deaf.

We do not think the court can fix any particular age limit, and say that after it is reached a party can give his property away only in contemplation of death. In a sense, "old age" is a relative term. Some men are old at sixty, although they may have no organic disease. Others are vigorous in mind and body at seventy, and still others long after they have passed their eightieth milestone. There are octogenarians among the members of the Dane county bar at the present time. One is as actively engaged in his professional work as he was twenty-five years ago. Another is creditably administering the affairs of an important office. The third is retired from active labor. Chief Justice Fuller performed his arduous labors until he reached the age of seventy-seven. Justice Harlan did likewise until he was seventy-eight, Justice Field until he was eighty-three, and Chief Justice Taney until he was past eighty-seven. The venerable Ex-Chief Justice Lyon of this court recently died at the age of ninety-one, retaining his bodily and mental vigor until a short time before his death. Ex-Speaker Cannon, now past seventy-seven, is an antagonist who might well command both fear and respect in any forensic encounter in which he might see fit to engage.

Age in itself is not a very important factor in determining the capacity of persons to deal with their property, or in ascertaining the motives which actuated them in disposing of it. The deceased in this case might have made the gifts which he did because he expected to die at any time. But it was just as reasonable an inference for the trial court to draw that he made the gifts without any particular thought of death, and because he wanted his daughter and her family to enjoy the benefits of a part of his accumulations, and to see her and them use what was given while he was still alive, so that he could observe the uses to which it was put. It is an erroneous concept to conclude that aged persons dispose of their property because they think that death is staring them in the face. The hypochondriac or the pessimist might entertain such an idea, but such a one rarely attains old age. On the contrary, we think it is true that persons who have lived long and who are free from disease generally entertain the feeling that they have a few years longer to live, no matter how old they are, and that they do not regard death as imminent. We are not disposed to say in the instant case that the circuit court did not draw an entirely correct inference from the testimony, much less to say that its decision should be set aside.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed. Inasmuch as the state is the principal party appellant in interest, no costs will be allowed, except that appellants must pay the clerk's fees in this court.

Slebecker, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court. It seems clear to me that the property, amounting to the sum of $494,423.20, which decedent transferred as gifts to his daughter and her husband at the times designated in the statement of facts by the court, is subject to an inheritance tax. There is no dispute in the facts. The circuit court concluded as a matter of fact that these gifts were not made in contemplation of death in the sense of the inheritance tax law. I am wholly unable to discover any uncertainty as to what the ultimate facts in the case are. There is no dispute in the evidentiary facts, and from their nature and significance they leave, to my mind, no room for drawing different conclusions. In view of this state of the case, the question raised is purely one of law, and the circuit court's opinion of the facts cannot control this court in applying the law to these undisputed facts. The county court and the circuit court had the identical question for determination on the same evidence. The same proposition is presented here, and hence the question for review here, in my judgment, is whether or not the circuit court applied the correct principle of law to the undisputed facts.

Do the acts of decedent constitute a transfer of his property "in contemplation of his death" in the sense these words are used in the statute? As stated in the court's opinion, these words were interpreted in the Pabat Case as referring "to an expectation of death which arises from such a bodily or mental condition as prompts persons to dispose of their property, and bestow it on those whom they regard as entitled to their bounty." It was there also considered that a gift is deemed to be in contemplation of the event of death when it is made in expectation of it. To my mind, the facts and circumstances of this case clearly indicate that Mr. Dessert from old age was in that bodily and mental state which made him conscious of the fact that his demise must occur in the near future as an unavoidable event pursuant to nature's immutable laws. I think it is the general experience that such condition impresses men with a greater certainty of impending death than to the afflictions of illness. I am unable to escape the conviction that the fact of impending death from old age, under the circumstances shown in this case, actuated Mr. Dessert in making these gifts.

Does it appear that he acted upon this expectation or not? What more conclusive proof can there be that he acted in view thereof, than that he gave the great bulk of his estate to his daughter as he had planned by his will. There is no proof indicating that he gave these sums as remuneration for some obligation he was under to her or her husband, nor is there anything to show he did so in compliance with a plan that he had tested her and his qualifications and worthiness of having such gifts bestowed on them. On the contrary, the acts of transfer are in harmony with and fulfil his express intention declared in the will to bestow his property on those whom he regarded as entitled to inherit it. To my mind all the facts and circumstances point to the one conclusion; namely, that decedent by reason of his extreme old age undoubtedly lived in the thought of expectant death, and was thereby prompted to transfer his property to those on whom he expected to bestow it under the rules for the devolution of property, and that the gifts were in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and hence were subject to an inheritance tax as declared by the county court.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

HERMAN L. EKERN, Appt.,

v.

FRANCIS E. MCGOVERN et al., Respts.

(— Wis. —, 142 N. W. 595.)

Courts — power to review acts of governor.

1. Plaintiff, while commissioner of in-insurance for a four-year term, having three years to run, and prohibited by statute from "serving on or under any political committee or as manager of any political campaign for any party or candidate," was charged before the governor with violation of such duty, in removal proceedings under § 970 of the Statutes of 1911. Upon notice of less than one hour a hearing was had. Under protest of unfairness as to notice, time of and conduct of the hearing, that there was no proof of any breach of duty, and that witnesses were present to testify in the commissioner's favor on the subject, the governor, suggesting undisclosed personal information, and that haste was required in order to close the matter in the few moments to elapse before commencement of the legislative session, which would suspend the removal power, summarily closed the hearing entered an order of removal, and appointed a successor. Possession by the appointee having been refused, the governor, through his agents, sought to place him in possession of the office quarters and accessories by force. This action was commenced to prevent it, temporary injunction being granted, presently terminating the existing violent efforts. Later the trial court refused to continue the restraint except to enable plaintiff to remove the cause to this court. Upon its so reaching, an armistice was agreed upon pending the decision.

Held the following principles of law are applicable and rule the case:

As to mere error of judgment on the part of the governor in the exercise of his lawful authority, his acts are not reviewable by the court. Within his jurisdiction, both he and those who act by his direction are immune from judicial remedies.

Governor — power to remove officer.

2. The governor jurisdictionally has competency to remove the commissioner of insurance from office.

Same — installation of successor.

3. The power of removal does not include, or have incidental thereto, power to forcibly install a successor.

Officer — de facto — determination.

4. In an action by one in possession of an office, to prevent an adverse claimant or those acting in his support, from gaining possession by violence, it is competent to determine whether such person is de facto the officer he claims to be.

Same — trying title — equitable action.

5. An action in equity will not lie for the primary purpose of trying the title to an office, that being, as primary matter, a subject for legal relief.

Courts — equitable jurisdiction — source.

6. The judicial power of circuit courts in

Note. — As to power of court to review action of governor in removing officer, see note to State ex rel. Kinsella v. Eberhart, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788, and see also Germaine v. Ferris, post, 857.

the field of equity as regards injunctive authority, temporary or otherwise, is not solely referable to § 2774 of the Statutes of 1911. Such courts have all such authority possessed in chancery at common law and such in addition as the statute confers.

Injunctions — to prevent disturbance of officer.

7. An officer de facto, in good faith claiming the right to possession of an office, until the right de jure shall have been determined,—if in imminent peril of forcible disturbance by an adverse claimant or those acting in his support,—may maintain an action in equity to prevent such disturbance, and may, and should, have temporary injunctive protection pending determination of the right to permanent immunity from forcible dispossession.

Equity — trying title to office — jurisdiction.

8. An action in equity to try the title to an office is distinct from one under the foregoing rule. The former is equitable and permissible; the latter is legal, and not permissible.

Constitutional law — powers of government — separation.

9. Sovereign authority, under our form of government, is in the people and exercisable through three major co-ordinate agency departments, viz.: Executive, legislative, and judicial,—each being, within its particular jurisdiction, answerable only to the people, but subordinate outside thereof to the jurisdiction conferred by the people through constitutional mandate on its co-ordinate department.

Courts — jurisdiction — acts of governor.

10. When a judicial question arises, it is within the competency of the judicial department to deal therewith, not stopping, necessarily, to consider who are the parties. It is not bound to desist because of the alleged wrongdoer being the governor or a person acting by his direction.

Same — limitation of power.

11. The doctrine that the court will not reach the governor in the performance of his duties, or anyone acting under his direction and by his authority in respect to any matter, applies only to acts within the scope of executive authority; outside thereof the principle of equality before the law renders him and his agents liable to judicial remedies the same as any other person, except in so far as the dignity of the place should, and does, protect him and them to some extent from coercive interference by judicial mandate.

Same — coercion of governor.

12. On grounds of public policy the court will not act coercively as to the governor, except in case of extreme urgency.

Same — power over subordinate officers.

13. The public policy which protects the governor as a co-ordinate department of the government, from being interfered with by judicial mandate, except in dire emergency, does not apply with full force to subordinates acting by his authority.

Constitutional law — idea — officers.

14. The basic idea of the state Constitution is that this "is a popular representative government, the officers being mere agents, not rulers of the people,—one where no man is so high as to be above the Constitution, and no one so low as to be beneath its protection."

Action — immunity.

15. Consistent with the stated basic principle, no one is necessarily immune from judicial remedies in case of having violated, or being in an attitude of threatening to violate, the rights of another.

Officer — de facto — definition.

16. A person who is in possession of an office by color of authority,—that is, having that appearance, in that he is performing the duties of the office and is being commonly recognized as entitled to do so,—is an officer de facto, whether he has any valid title to the office or not.

Same — reputed officer.

17. "One who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, although he is not such in point of law," if he is in possession of an office, in good faith claiming to be entitled to perform its duties, is, subject to the exception noted in the next rule, an officer de facto.

Same — exception.

18. Any person in the good faith possession of an office, as stated in the foregoing rule, holding over after expiration of the term for which he was elected or appointed, is not a de facto officer so as to be entitled to equitable protection in his possession as against a person who shall have been, in due course, certified to have been elected or appointed his successor in the particular office, and holds the evidence thereof showing prima facie title.

Same — principle of exception.

19. The principle of the foregoing exception to the general rule is that, in the particular circumstances stated, the evidence of the title de jure to the particular office for the particular term, afforded by the certificate, on grounds of public policy, has, provisionally, the force of a judicial determination, leaving no room for a good faith resistance thereto, other than by judicial remedies which a court of equity should take cognizance of.

Equity — determining title to office.

20. The rule that an action in equity will not lie to determine the title to an office does not preclude the making of such determination in equity in case of that being incidental to some matter of primary right which is a proper subject for equitable interference, and for which the court has taken jurisdiction and acquired jurisdiction of the parties.

Same — settlement of controversy.

21. In case of an action for equitable relief in the nature of protecting the right of a person in possession of an office from forcible interference until the title de jure shall have been judicially determined, and it appearing that such title must be determined before the entire controversy between the parties can be set at rest, and as matter of fact the title may as well or better be settled in the pending action as in another commenced for legal relief, the court may, and should, proceed to settle the entire controversy.

Same — equitable rule — jurisdiction.

22. The foregoing is within the equitable rule that, where a court shall have obtained jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter for a proper purpose, it may proceed and determine the entire controversy connected with the primary ground for relief which the plaintiff has, or in planting his action in equity in good faith supposed he had.

Officer — unjust removal — protection.

23. An officer entitled to hold an office for a fixed term, subject to removal only for cause, is, by common-law rules, unless the same shall have been abrogated by statute, entitled to protection against danger of unjust removal,—being so entitled by due process of law, which excludes interference with personal or property rights except according to established principles of justice.

Same — right to notice and hearing.

24. The established principles of justice, except as otherwise constitutionally provided by statute, secures to every person the right, before being condemned, as to his person or his property, as to anything materially affecting his constitutional right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to reasonable notice of a hearing in respect to the matter, reasonable notice of the charges against him, reasonable opportunity to be heard by himself, his witnesses, and his counsel, to know the opposing evidence, and oppose it with evidence according to the principles of fair judicial investigation, and to have the final determination grounded on evidence in some reasonable view supporting it.

Same — property right in office.

25. The right to an office, though not a vested property right, is property in that broad sense which includes everything of pecuniary value to its possessor; but whether property in the broad sense, or merely a privilege, it is within the protection of the foregoing rule and within the constitutional guaranty of the state Constitution and the guaranties of due process of law and equal protection of the laws of the Federal Constitution.

Constitutional law — due process of law — definition.

26. "Due process of law" means according to the law of the land,—process according to the principles of natural justice, by the rules of the common law, except as constitutionally changed by statute.

Officer — removal — procedure.

27. If no proceeding is provided by statute for exercising a power of removal of an officer for cause, then the common-law method, which accords hearing before condemnation, is the guaranteed "due process of law." If such proceeding is provided, or the right of removal is by clear legislative intent exercisable at pleasure or in any particular prescribed method, then a proceeding in that manner is the "due process of law" so guaranteed.

Same — removal for cause.

28. In case of an express or inferred statutory right of removal for cause, of an officer holding for a fixed term, it is to be presumed to have been conferred to be exercised under the restrictions of "due process of law" in the common-law sense, unless the contrary expressly or by necessary implication appears to have been the legislative intent.

Same — due process of law.

29. Under the foregoing rule, the power of removal for cause established by "satisfactory proof," under § 970 of the 1911 Statutes, is subject to the guaranty of "due process of law," requiring a hearing and determination according to the principles of natural justice.

Same — procedure.

30. For exercise of the power of removal under § 970 of the 1911 Statutes, in connection with § 1966y, prescribing the duties of the commissioner of insurance, these things are essential:

(1) Jurisdiction of the subject, in general, by assignment of a ground for removal within the specifications of the statute.

(2) Jurisdiction of the particular subject-matter by reasonable notice to the officer of the time and place of hearing and of the charges preferred against him.

(3) Reasonable opportunity of the accused to defend against the case adverse to him in a manner "analogous, in its most essential features, to a judicial hearing and investigation."

(4) Fair judicial consideration of the evidence and determination thereon of the ultimate facts within the boundaries of reason.

Courts — review of removal of officer.

31. While the power of removal of an officer for cause established by satisfactory proof is administrative in character, as distinguished from that judicial power lodged by the Constitution only in courts, it includes that species of judicial power denominated quasi judicial, and, as to that element, the result of exercise of the power is reviewable by the court as to all matters of jurisdiction.

Insurance — commissioner — duties — political committee.

32. The terms "political committee" and "manager of a political campaign" in § 1966y of the 1911 Statutes, as regards the duties of the commissioner of insurance, have the same import as similar terms in the corrupt practices act, § 94-1 to § 94-39, inclusive, of the statutes.

Same — assisting legislator.

33. The terms "political committee" and "manager of a political campaign," as used 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the statutes, do not refer to mere efforts to assist, after election of members of the legislature shall have occurred, an aspirant for the position of speaker thereof to gain the position.

Same — definition.

34. The terms "political committee" and "manager of a political campaign," as used in the statute, refer to a committee for a political party or for a person, or manager of a political party or personal party campaign, such as would be required under the corrupt practices act (Stat. 1911, §§ 94-1 to 94-39) to file reports of expenses with the secretary of state.

Officer — removal — notice — due process.

35. Notice given one hour or so before the time set for a hearing in removal proceedings under § 970 of the 1911 Statutes, of the fact that such hearing will occur, is not reasonable. Neither is closing of such a hearing without affording opportunity for the person accused to present the evidence of his witnesses, and without according to him reasonable opportunity to testify fully and to be heard by counsel, and without affording him knowledge of all the evidence to be considered against him, and fair opportunity to oppose the same with evidence, reasonable.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County in defendants' favor in a proceeding to enjoin interference with plaintiff's possession of the office of insurance commissioner. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action for equitable relief respecting forcible disturbance of the plaintiff in the possession of the office of insurance commissioner.

The case, as primary matter, involved the right of peaceable possession by the plaintiff of the office of insurance commissioner pending determination of the validity of removal proceedings whereby he had been, in form, removed from the office.

The facts being regarded, in some particulars, as peculiar and without precedent, and also to some degree the propositions of law urged upon the court in support of the judgment,—the history of the entire matter as closed by the judgment complained of is given below in its logical order.

Circumstances leading up to the removal proceedings.

In January, 1913, appellant was in possession of the office of commissioner of insurance under § 1966y of the statutes, his term having some three years to run. The office, aside from some constitutional positions, is one of the most important in the administration of the government. The legislature so created it as to secure good expert ability for the place, by attaching thereto a salary incident of $5,000 per year, requiring of the appointee special knowledge of all subjects within the broad scope of the proposed administration, creating disability of the incumbent during his term of office for holding any other official position of any kind, requiring him to devote his entire time to his official duties, and prohibiting him from holding any position of trust or profit, public or private, or engaging in any occupation or business interfering with or inconsistent with his duties, or serving on or under any political committee, or as manager of any political campaign for any candidate or party. It was made a place of much honor and power,—subordinate in a sense to that of the governor, but a power greater, by far, than was ever before given in this state to an appointive officer. It took the place of a somewhat similar, but much inferior, elective office which for years had been classed in practical effect with constitutional state offices. It was made greater than any of them with the exception of the office of governor and that of member of this court, as regards the interests of the people to be conserved. It was made appointive by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate,—as an assurance that the legislative conception of fitness for the place would be most certainly satisfied,—with power to the executive to fill any vacancy occurring, for the unexpired term, subject to confirmation by the senate, the appointment, in any case, to be in force until acted upon by the senate. No specific provision was made for removal for any cause.

To fill the place the governor appointed appellant, as satisfying the calls of the statute. His fitness was so well known that doubtless the legislature expected such an event would occur when the system was adopted. Whatever provision exists for exercising executive power to remove an incumbent of the office is found in § 970 of the statutes, providing that any officer of the class to which the particular one belonged, “who are or shall be appointed by the governor by and with the advice of the senate, or by the legislature with the concurrence of the governor, may, for official misconduct, habitual or wilful neglect of duty, be removed by the governor upon satisfactory proof, at any time during the recess of the legislature.”

1913, there was much factional strife among those who, generally speaking, were opposed to the Democratic party, culminating in members of one faction, made up of persons antagonistic to their former associates in the Republican party, canvassing to effect selection of a speaker of the house who would be, as near as practicable, in harmony with their views. There were several candidates for the place, the contest being substantially factional; the governor was regarded as in harmony with the movement which aroused the particular strife. Members of the opposition as to such faction canvassed to secure a speaker in harmony with their choice. Appellant made publicly known his preference. It was antagonistic to the faction supposed to represent the governor. In that situation, the latter, on the day before the legislature was to convene, caused charges to be preferred by one of his office force against appellant, looking to his removal from office. These are the charges: “Deponent . . . charges, upon information and belief, that Herman L. Ekern is guilty of official misconduct and wilful neglect of duty as commissioner of insurance in this, that, on and between the 1st day of January, A. D. 1913, and the 7th day of January, A. D. 1913, both inclusive, at the city of Madison, Dane county, Wisconsin, the said Herman L. Ekern did serve as and under the political committee, and as manager of the political campaign for one L. L. Johnson, who was then and there a candidate for the office of speaker of the assembly of the state of Wisconsin, contrary to the provisions of § 1966y of the statutes.”

Mr. Ekern was served with notice of the charges having been filed, about 9 o'clock in the forenoon on the following day, and at such time, at the executive office, a hearing would be had in respect thereto, and that he should appear at that time.

Proceedings on the hearing.

Mr. Ekern, at the time stated in the notice for the hearing, appeared at the governor's office with Aylward & Olbrich, his attorneys. We will not attempt to give anything like a verbatim statement of what was said and of all acts done during the hearing. It will be sufficient to give the same in substance, so as to show, clearly, the circumstances affecting the rights of the parties.

Mr. Aylward: I object to these proceedings because § 970 of the statutes confers authority in such matters, only when the legislature is not in session. That includes the whole of to-day, though the legislature does not convene until 12 o'clock noon.

Governor: The objection is overruled.

Mr. Aylward: I call attention that the notice and charges were served but a few moments before the time for appearance; that up to now Mr. Ekern has not been allowed any time to obtain counsel and prepare for the hearing; that, inasmuch as the charges were procured to be filed by the one who is to sit in judgment, and the subject to be dealt with is, in reality, a co-ordinate branch of the government, and that the matter is very serious, in view of the near approach of the legislative session requiring special attention of the commissioner to important matters to come before it, forcing upon him such a speedy hearing is unjust; and that some reasonable time is necessary to advise with counsel and prepare to present the defense. I request such time to be granted in the interests of the accused, the people of the state, and the executive himself.

Governor: The application is denied. I do not agree with counsel as to the law. The proceeding will go on to a conclusion before 12 o'clock noon, the time for the legislature to convene.

Mr. Aylward: I am here to protect my client's interests. We are in court, are we not? I presume, whether the hearing is concluded by the time stated will depend upon whether the testimony is closed by that time or not.

Governor: I will hear no more argument on this now. If you think you are going to protract this hearing—

Mr. Aylward: For the purpose of preserving a record I wish it to appear that the governor's stenographer is taking down what occurs. May we not present our testimony?

Governor: I have ruled and you will desist from argument on the subject.

Mr. Aylward: I will take such course as I may think ought to be taken before an impartial judge, and to protect my rights as a lawyer.

Governor: I am governor, acting as a judge, and will not allow these proceedings to be unduly protracted.

Mr. Aylward: May we have the usual privilege of filing an answer?

Governor: You may dictate your answer into the record, but there must be no attempt to fritter away the forenoon.

Mr. Aylward: May I have a few moments to confer with our client?

Governor: Yes, sir.

After a brief conference, a verified answer on the part of Mr. Ekern was filed, putting in issue all of the allegations of the charges made against him.

Mr. Aylward: I request a reading of the record of the proceedings up to this time.

Governor: The request is denied.

Mr. Gifford having been called by the governor, Mr. Aylward interposed by insisting that Mr. Ekern had not yet been afforded any suitable time to prepare for the hearing, and protested against his being compelled to proceed without proper time to consult with his counsel, obtain his witnesses, and prepare to make his defense. The protest was overruled, and the witness testified in response to interrogatories propounded by the governor, substantially as follows: I am proprietor of the Avenue Hotel. On New Year's Day about noon Mr. Ekern inquired, by telephone, about two rooms on the first floor of the hotel, as he wanted them for January 6th and 7th. He did not say anything about the purpose. On the following Monday, he called and informed me that the rooms were for Mr. Johnson. Johnson was a candidate for speaker. They were held for him for the two days. The furniture was not changed, except a few additional chairs were supplied at Mr. Ekern's suggestion. Johnson was not present during my conversation with Ekern. The rooms were in use Monday and Tuesday as Mr. Johnson's headquarters. I do not know of anyone being in the rooms during that time except Mr. Johnson. After the conversation with Ekern I did not see him until this morning. The rooms are closed, but have not been paid for. They were closed last night by Mr. Johnson's orders.

In response to interrogatories propounded by Mr. Aylward, Mr. Gifford said: I did not know I would be needed as a witness until called to testify. The governor requested me to call last Monday in respect to the matter. Mr. Ekern only asked if the rooms were engaged, and, upon being informed they were not, he said to hold them. He had used them before as headquarters. He made no suggestion about them thereafter except what I have stated. Johnson took the rooms. He made the necessary arrangements. No one used the rooms but him, to my knowledge. Ekern made no suggestion as to being chairman of any political committee or manager of any political campaign or party. I supposed he engaged the rooms for some other person. He did not mention Johnson's candidacy. Johnson did not have any committee, so far as I know, nor any manager. I made no charge for the rooms against Mr. Ekern. I think he stepped into the hotel for just a minute, Monday night. When he asked for the rooms he did not say they were for a headquarters. They have been so used many times.

Mr. Wilbur, in response to the governor's questions, testified substantially as follows: I am clerk in this office. This was said in my presence between you and Mr. Ekern. He said Mr. Hull was hostile to him, because he was supporting Johnson. That he had the caucus nomination to a certainty. You said, Is his hostility because of belief that you are supporting Johnson? Ekern replied in the affirmative. You inquired as to what the fact was. He answered that he favored Johnson and Dr. Goff. You inquired as to what there was in the rumor of his having engaged rooms for the political headquarters of Johnson. He replied that he had engaged the rooms. You inquired whether it was true that he had discussed the speakership matter with members of the legislature, stating that there was a contest between yourself and Senator La Follette, and that, in the speakership contest, members must stand for or against the senator and for or against you, and that he represented those who were against you. He replied in the affirmative. You inquired as to whether he had stated to different members that you were not to have anything to do with the organization of the assembly. He replied in the affirmative. You then stated there was no fight or contest between yourself and the senator, save a fictitious contest used for political purposes by certain men for personal reasons. He replied that he was glad to hear that. You informed him that the statute prohibited the insurance commissioner from being politically active, and insisted that he conform thereto; that he close the headquarters which he had opened, and refrain from further participating in the speakership contest both on the surface and in fact. He replied that Johnson now had the headquarters, and he did not know what Johnson would do about the matter. You replied that you were not asking what Johnson would do. You were simply insisting that that night he close the headquarters which he had opened; that there was but one governor in the state and his offices were in the east wing of the State Capitol, and not the north wing. Then Mr. Ekern got up and said he would endeavor to comply with your wishes, and the interview closed.

The witness testified in response to interrogatories by Mr. Aylward: I talked the matter over with the governor before making the charges. I made the charges on information and belief. I have other information than what has been testified to. In the charges I conformed to the wording of the statute. I do not know as to Johnson having a formally organized committee. He had one in the sense that he had men working together to promote his candidacy for speaker,—a political committee as generally understood. Ekern was the most active person. Assemblyman Holmes was also active. I do not know definitely as to anyone else. They were acting as a committee for Mr. Johnson as I understood it. I do not know that any statement was filed under the corrupt practices act regarding Mr. Johnson's candidacy, and did not seek any information on that point before filing the charges. The activity I referred to in the charges referred to the actual handling of Johnson's campaign. His neglect of duty mentioned in the charges consisted of his supporting Johnson's candidacy, and of campaigning in his interest. Mr. Ekern came to the governor's office in response to a telephone communication from the governor, transmitted by me at the governor's request. There was some conversation as regards Senator La Follette's attitude in the speakership contest, but the general talk was as to whether the senator was interfering presently. The question came up as to Ekern closing the headquarters which he had opened. He did not say that he had not opened the headquarters. When the closing of the headquarters was demanded, he said Johnson was now in charge and he was not able to say what Johnson would do. The governor demanded that he close the headquarters which he had admitted that he opened. When he referred to Johnson being now in charge, the governor said he would have no splitting of hairs, and that Ekern must close the headquarters and refrain from further participation in the speakership contest, or there would be a new commissioner of insurance. Ekern said that if there had been any activity in the speakership contest on his part, it was unintentional, and he would refrain from anything further, and it was then that the governor assured him that there was but one governor in the state of Wisconsin, and he was located in the east wing of the Capitol.

Mr. Ekern testified in his own behalf, in effect, as follows: I had no substantial opportunity to prepare for this hearing. Just time to call my attorneys by telephone and make my appearance. I have called some witnesses since we appeared and made answer. I have had no opportunity to consult with my counsel prior to appearing at the hearing, nor with any witnesses. It is necessary for a proper presentation of my defense that I should have opportunity to consult with counsel, and to procure and consult with witnesses, and I protest against the hearing in advance of such opportunity. Mr. Johnson, in official work, has been much in my office. I think he was there on New Year's Day. I then talked with Mr. Gifford over the telephone at Johnson's request, in respect to the rooms. I supposed I was doing an act of ordinary courtesy. The next day Gifford asked me what was wanted in the rooms, and I replied, Nothing special except, possibly, some more chairs. I thought then that Johnson would see him right away, and paid no more attention to it. Johnson and I went to the hotel for lunch on Monday, the 6th of January. Gifford was told that the rooms were for Johnson. I never went near them, nor had anything to do with them, nor did I ever visit them while Johnson had them, nor send anyone there, nor assume any responsibility in respect to them. Johnson did not have any political committee to my knowledge or any campaign manager. I did not act in regard to the matter, directly or indirectly. I spoke favorably of Johnson for speaker, and that I personally favored him, and I spoke favorably for Dr. Goff. I asked Mr. Richards to call on me, which he did, and we discussed the speakership matter,—I making known my position in respect to it. I expressed the idea that Johnson was a strong candidate and was likely to win. In talking with members I referred to the general differences between the governor and Senator La Follette, but that was not intended to influence the speakership. It referred to a purely political contest which had been on for some time. When I referred to the subject of taking sides, it had reference to the general contest, the general political situation. What I said to the members of the legislature was not to influence them in favor of the man I wanted elected speaker. I had a broader purpose in mind. I may have mentioned the speakership matter in letters. I have not spoken to many people about Johnson's candidacy. I don't think I ever said that you [the governor] should have nothing to say in respect to who should be speaker. I claim I have a right to have my opinion, the same as anyone else. I never thought expressing of an opinion was managing a political campaign. I helped draw the corrupt practices act, and we didn't understand it would work that way. I have not served on any political committee or as manager of the political campaign for Johnson or any other person. At the conversation I had with the governor, he asked me if I thought Johnson was going to be elected. I replied in the affirmative. He then asked about my running his quarters for him, which I denied. I told him about my connection with engaging rooms at the Avenue Hotel. I confessed freely that I favored Johnson, and that I had said there was a fight on between him and La Follette. I also expressed the opinion that I did not think the governor ought to dictate in the speakership matter. He charged me with having violated the law, and demanded that I close the Johnson headquarters, threatening that if I did not he would remove me from office.

Governor: Did you do anything about closing the headquarters?

Ekern: Have I done anything about closing the headquarters? As I said that night, I had nothing to do with it.

Governor: You understood the question, don't repeat it.

Ekern: There was nothing for me to do about closing them.

Governor: The evidence is closed.

Mr. Aylward: I am not satisfied to have the evidence closed here at all.

Mr. Ekern: I appeal for fairness and justice. The governor has just brought out the first part of the conversation. As the governor delivered his ultimatum, as it has been called, which ended our interview, I said you don't mean that. I have been scrupulous in observing the law, and it is my intention to do so. I have complied with the strictest construction that anyone has put upon it, and I propose to do that in the future, and from you, as governor, I am willing to accept the strictest construction that you can put upon it. I am willing to do everything that can be properly done.

Governor: I don't care to hear any more. I know what happened. It isn't as though you were talking to a man not present at the time.

Mr. Ekern: I said I would call Gifford on the telephone, and tell him I had nothing to do with the rooms, if that was what you wished, and you said, No, that was not satisfactory, that I must go to the hotel and close the headquarters that night. I denied I opened the rooms; but you insisted, in spite of that, upon my closing the Johnson headquarters.

Governor: I said, if Johnson is there, you put him there. You opened those headquarters, and you must close them. If someone else opened them, I would ask him to close them. If it inconveniences Mr. Johnson I am sorry; but you must close the headquarters that you opened. I don't care to hear any more testimony, or take any more time in this matter.

Mr. Aylward: I haven't finished Mr. Ekern's testimony, and have present to testify, Assemblyman Johnson, Mr. Beedle, former insurance commissioner, and I want to also present the testimony of Lieut. Gov. Morris. I believe justice affords Mr. Ekern a right to have the testimony of his witnesses taken.

Governor: We would go into the matter more fully if there was time. We have heard all the testimony which time permits. It must be borne in mind I have personal knowledge which no testimony can modify concerning Mr. Ekern's own admissions on the evening he was here, as to his participation in the management of Mr. Johnson's campaign, and what he did in reference to it, so I shall find—

Mr. Aylward: Mr. Wilbur has testified to that conversation.

Governor: I was here myself and heard the conversation.

Ekern: You refuse to permit my recollection of that—

Governor: You have gone over the whole transaction. You were notified at the outset that the hearing would terminate before 12 o'clock. You were called at 11 o'clock. You have had more than three quarters of an hour to testify. I now terminate this hearing.

Mr. Aylward: One thing more, Governor; it won't take but a minute. The question is about Mr. Ekern being political manager for Mr. Johnson in the speakership contest. Mr. Johnson is present,—the one man above all others who would know.

Judge Rosa: My name has been brought into this, and I think I ought to testify to what happened, from beginning to end.

Governor: You may testify if it will not take over five minutes.

Judge Rosa: It will take more than five minutes.

Governor: A more extended hearing is not allowed now. I would be glad to hear the rest of the testimony, but, of course, you don't know any more about it. I have ended the hearing.

Mr. Aylward: Mr. Ekern has only had three quarters of an hour in which to present evidence respecting the question of whether he shall be dismissed from office. I move that the complaint be dismissed because there is no evidence to sustain the charges.

Governor: The motion is denied.

Mr. Aylward: A person accused, after testimony has been offered, is entitled to be heard by counsel.

Governor: Desist from further argument. It is perfectly apparent you are trying to protract the hearing till after 12 o'clock, and I shall not permit it. I don't intend anything to interfere. My decision is to sustain the charges,—to find Mr. Ekern guilty as charged, and order his removal from office for the reason stated in the complaint and evidenced by the proof submitted to me. I shall sign a written order to this effect as soon as it can be prepared.

An order of removal was duly prepared and signed.

Subsequent proceedings resulting in the appeal.

Defendant Anderson was appointed successor to appellant, and, having, in form, qualified for the place, demanded possession of the office quarters, books, and papers, and the demand was refused. Forceful compliance therewith, under orders from the governor, being threatened, and seeming to be imminent, appellant caused his complaint to be prepared, setting forth the facts aforesaid, his claim in good faith to be the commissioner of insurance, notwithstanding the removal order, and that such order was made without authority of law, and thereon applied for injunctive protection from being forcibly interfered with in his possession. Under the governor's order, defendant Essmann attempted to forcibly install Anderson in appellant's place. While Mr. Essmann was in the act of beating down the office door for the purpose of gaining entrance to the official rooms, and expelling appellant, and a serious breach of the peace to accomplish such result was impending, the temporary restraining order applied for was granted and served. The efforts to obtain forcible possession of the office thereupon ceased. Thereafter, the complaint was amended, and supplementary affidavits were filed which, in the whole, set forth the facts fully from appellant's standpoint, and that continuance of the temporary injunction was essential to prevent unlawful interference with his possession, and, on the whole record, asked therefor, continuing the injunction pending the final result of the litigation. Upon such record and numerous affidavits filed in defendants' behalf, not changing the appearance materially as to whether appellant was entitled to remain in the undisturbed possession of the office, and that forcible disturbance thereof could only be prevented by judicial authority, the case was submitted to the court, resulting in a decision thus:

The court will not assume jurisdiction to review the acts of a co-ordinate department of the government, unless power to do so be clearly given by law.

If the governor was without power or duty to forcibly dispossess Mr. Ekern in the manner attempted, the court has power to enjoin such interference, regardless of the official status of the offender; but whether such power or duty exists need not be decided because of the conclusion on another point fatal to plaintiff's application for protection.

The court will not interfere to protect a person in possession of an office from being forcibly dispossessed by another having the prima facie right, unless such person is at least an officer de facto.

Whether Mr. Ekern has a de facto right to the office depends upon whether Anderson has the de jure right. The court cannot determine the former without determining the latter by passing upon the validity of the removal, so the rule that precludes trial of the title de jure in the equity action also precludes trial of the title de facto, as ruled in Barendt v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 680, 118 Pac. 228. It follows that this case is ruled by Ward v. Sweeney, 106 Wis. 44, 82 N. W. 169.

From the order thus entered, the appeal was taken. After the cause was submitted for decision, a resubmission was ordered on these propositions:

Question 1. Does § 970 of the statutes require that due process of law, as guaranteed by the Constitution, be pursued in removing an officer?

Question 2. Does due process of law in such a case entitle the officer attempted to be removed to a reasonable notice of the hearing and of the particulars of the charge, a reasonable opportunity to be heard in person and by counsel, to know the adverse evidence to be considered, the right to cross-examine the opposing witnesses, and present all material evidence in his own behalf?

Question 3. If an order for the removal of an officer charged in such a proceeding be made, without according to him these privileges, is it valid?

Question 4. Is it a jurisdictional requirement of an order under the removal statute, that it be based on evidence taken according to the essentials of due process of law, which in some reasonable view sustain the charges against the person accused, which will warrant his removal, and if so, was such a case made as to Mr. Ekern?

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We will endeavor, so far as practicable, to discuss this case, separating it into logical order of subjects involved, and first give attention to the dominant reason assigned by the trial court for the order complained of.

I

There is no controversy before us but that the decision below, to the effect that the court should not, and cannot, properly interfere with the action of the executive of a state within the scope of his authority, is sound doctrine, as the language used was probably intended to be understood. For mere error of judgment on the part of the governor, in doing what he has a right to do, he cannot be judicially interfered with.

The claim of appellant below that the scope of the governor's authority did not extend to forcibly putting his appointee in possession of the office in dispute, and therefore no immunity of respondent from being dealt with by judicial remedies can be successfully claimed for the illegal act, seems to have been sustained in the course of the trial court's decision. Such an act was, seemingly, thought not to be within the rule above stated, but it was left somewhat involved at the end, and the decision placed wholly on the doctrine of Ward v. Sweeney, 106 Wis. 44, 82 N. W. 169, upon the supposition that, whether appellant was a de facto officer depended upon whether Anderson had the prima facie de jure right, and therefore neither question was triable in this action for equitable relief, such relief being dependable upon whether appellant occupied a status of at least the dignity of a de facto officer.

The idea that it is not competent in an action of this sort, to determine whether the plaintiff is a de facto officer, is quite novel. We venture to say neither principle nor authority supports that feature of the trial court's decision. The question of de facto right was decided in Ward v. Sweeney, sufficiently for the case, and was one of the grounds for the result, and regarded sufficient. The trial court grievously erred in supposing that Barendt v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 680, 118 Pac. 228, supports the conclusion. There the person out of was endeavoring to regain possession by a suit in equity against his adversary. The court proceeded far enough to determine that the defendant was at least an officer de facto and was in possession. So, it will be seen the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case is authority against, rather than in support of, the position that, in this suit, it was not competent to solve the question of whether appellant had at least a de facto right to possession of the office. To determine that did not necessarily involve trying the title de jure at all.

Having committed the error aforesaid, the court easily misapplied Ward v. Sweeney and misconceived its purport.

The facts in Ward v. Sweeney were these: There was an officer in possession claiming a de facto status. He entered equity against one claiming the title de jure and threatening to take possession by force, to determine the question of who had the better title, and, incidentally, to prevent being forcibly dispossessed in the meantime. The case turned on the following points: (a) Can an equity action be maintained to try the title to an office? (b) Is a temporary restraining order proper except under § 2774, Stats., to preserve the status quo, and in a proper action to try the title to the office? (c) Is temporary protection by injunction in such an action proper at all, except in case of imminent danger of a forcible disturbance of the officer's possession, detrimental to the public interests? (d) Should such protection be afforded at all in favor of the one in possession, and not appearing clearly to be at least a de facto officer?

The writer, with the late Justice Bardeen, dissented from the decision of the court, so far as it might be regarded as holding that equity will not freely protect a de facto officer from imminent danger of being forcibly dispossessed by an adverse claimant, in an effort to settle his right by wager of battle, and so far as it was held that the power to grant injunctive protection, under all circumstances, is referable to the statute, and so not proper except as ancillary to an action to try title. Without questioning the decision itself, it is conceded by the court now that some of the reasoning upon which it was based is unsound.

An action in equity, whether instituted by one in or one out of possession of an office, to try the title, is one thing; an action by a person in possession of an office, having at least a de facto status, to compel an adversary to vindicate his claim by lawful methods, and restrain him from disturbing the existing state of things in the meantime, is quite another affair. The one involves the adjudication of the title de jure. The other merely involves the right de facto and to have the claimant proceed lawfully to settle his claim of title de jure. All the relief necessary in the latter is within the competency of a court of equity to grant, leaving the real right of the matter respecting the title to the office, if thought necessary or advisable, wholly unsettled.

That an equitable action for the protective measure of relief mentioned is proper was vigorously maintained independently in the Sweeney Case, and not questioned in the opinion of the court, except as applicable to the particular circumstances there dealt with, and, further, upon the theory, that the power to grant temporary equitable relief is restricted to the scope of the Code provision, § 2774 of the statutes. It may be safely affirmed that, in general, an officer de facto in possession is entitled to equitable interference to prevent forcible disturbance thereof other than in judicial proceedings. The authorities cited in Ward v. Sweeney would seem ample in support of that doctrine. 2 Beach, Inj. § 1380; 2 High, Inj. 4th ed. § 1315; Sullivan v. Haacke, 5 Ohio N. P. 26, 7 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 113; Parsons v. Durand, 150 Ind. 203, 49 N. E. 1047; Harding v. Eichinger, 57 Ohio St. 371, 49 N. E. 306; Goldsworthy v. Boyle, 175 Pa. 246, 34 Atl. 630.

Nothing of moment to the contrary of the foregoing is cited by counsel for respondents, while in support thereof appellant's counsel cited many authorities, the following being a few of the most significant: Stenglein v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 440, 87 N. W. 449; School Dist. v. Weise, 77 Minn. 167, 79 N. W. 668; Palmer v. Foley, 45 How. Pr. 110; State ex rel. Fairbanks v. Superior Ct. 17 Wash. 12, 61 Am. St. Rep. 893, 48 Pac. 741; Neeland v. State, 39 Kan. 154, 18 Pac. 165; Parsons v. Durand, 150 Ind. 203, 49 N. E. 1047; Landes v. Walls, 160 Ind. 216, 66 N. E. 679; State v. Alexander, 107 Iowa, 177, 77 N. W. 841; Reemelin v. Mosby, 47 Ohio St. 570, 26 N. E. 717; Jackson v. Powell, 119 La. 882, 44 So. 689; Lucas v. Futrall, 84 Ark. 540, 106 S. W. 667; Hollar v. Cornett, 144 Ky. 420, 138 S. W. 298.

A de facto officer has no need of instituting an action of quo warranto or any other action to try a controversy over the title to the office, in order to protect his possession. It is the business of the claimant who is trying to break in to resort to such remedy. The one in possession may use physical means, reasonably, to prevent being dispossessed, or he may resort to the more peaceful remedy of an action in equity for that purpose, as appellant did. The latter is to be preferred, and the court should not do anything to encourage a resort to the former. As remarked in Palmer v. Foley, 4 Jones & S. 14, referred to in Ward v. Sweeney, and often quoted with approval: "The earliest jurisdiction, if not at" one "time the chief business, of the court of chancery, was in assault, trespasses, and a 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) variety of outrages. . . . In respect to the use of preventative process, the jurisdiction ought to be, and therefore is, the same; and if it is proper in one case to exercise the jurisdiction to prevent a wrong threatened to be done to mere property, how much more proper is it to use the same power to arrest premeditated wrong to the person or personal rights?"

The following from Sullivan v. Haacke, 5 Ohio N. P. 26, 7 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 113. is quite appropos to the case in hand:

"The action shows itself to be that, familiar to equity practice, wherein an individual in possession of an office seeks to restrain another who claims the office from by force and violence ejecting him, instead of resorting to the dignified, peaceful, and orderly methods provided by law for gaining possession. . . . A claimant to public office, even though he have title, cannot, through the exercise of physical force and personal violence, divest possession from his predecessor. . . . The spectacle of claimants to high and important public office charging themselves at fistcuffs over who shall have possession, and this at the very portals of the public courts, is not in harmony with the policy of the law, and is not one whereon a peace-loving, law-abiding public delights to gaze; and . . . the courts in the name of the public, for the preservation of the public peace, and in vindication of public dignity, will command peace and obedience to the orderly forms of law."

This further from Palmer v. Foley, supra, is quite appropriate to the case: "The defendant is not in possession of the office. . . . He stands in no better attitude than a mere stranger, except that he may invoke the aid of the attorney general to proceed against the present incumbent to try the title of the office. But at present he cannot have possession of the office, nor can he enforce a recognition of himself as the legally constituted officer. He must wait until the disputed question is determined in his favor by a judgment in a proper action. . . . The plaintiff desires that he . . . may be undisturbed in the office" he claims to legally fill, "and instead of asserting his right by bringing to his aid the maxim of the law, domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium, he had adopted a measure more conformable to peace and order."

The unfortunate occurrence giving rise to this litigation, of the attempted taking of law into one's own hands,—making an assault upon the commissioner's quarters and threatening to use physical violence in a more personal way, to enforce submission, while he was performing his duty as he saw it, and his duty, in fact, so long as he honestly believed he had not been legally removed from office, a duty not only to himself but to the public,—to defend his possession against an unlawful intrusion,—and what might be the result in the future of the court adopting, as a principle, the idea that it cannot, or will not, exercise its power to compel the settlement of such controversies by lawful methods, must drive conviction home to the judicial mind that what was said independently in Ward v. Sweeney, and so emphatically supported in the authorities above referred to, and practically by universal authority, both elementary and judicial, is sound beyond any room for reasonable controversy. The court not only can interfere with its strong injunctive are in such cases, but it would be recreant to its duty not to do so, promptly and firmly. There should be no hesitation in that regard, giving encouragement to such conflicts as occurred in the particular instance, tending to bring the law into disrepute and inflict harm upon the state. The doctrine of Sullivan v. Haacke is a very salutary one, that an office is a franchise, and is separate and distinct from the mere office quarters, and that the attempt of a claimant thereof to possess himself of it, by forcibly dispossessing his adversary, should be regarded so odious in a court of equity that, in case of the physical possession of such quarters being so obtained, the act should be regarded, practically, as not placing the offender any nearer the real thing sought after,—the office itself,—than as though he had not committed the unlawful act.

In the foregoing, we have assumed, without discussion or reference to authority, that the governor's official duty did not extend to forcibly putting Mr. Anderson into possession of the office of commissioner of insurance. Neither principle nor authority can be found to support any such exercise of authority. We will not dignify the matter by even discussing it. It is really too plain for reasonable controversy that the governor does not possess any such authority. The learned circuit judge was evidently convinced of that, notwithstanding he left the matter of whether the executive could be interfered with in case of his usurping such authority, undecided, choosing to rest the decision of the case upon a supposed, but not real, fatal infirmity in appellant's competency to obtain in equity the relief sought.

The suggestion made in the Sweeney Case, of want of jurisdiction to grant temporary injunctive protection except as given by statute, is so obviously wrong that the court will not let this opportunity for correcting it go by without doing so. It was doubtless permitted to go into the decision before by mere oversight. We are constrained to say that, since it is contrary to the law as well understood ever since our judicial system was established. Power in equity, as it existed at common law, was lodged by the Constitution in the court. The legislature is powerless to restrict it, and has never attempted to do so. The practice has been in harmony with this from the first. The court as early as German Evangelical Cong. v. Hoessli, 13 Wis. 348, held that, "when the complaint lays a foundation for an injunction, it will be granted whether [asked for] as a final judgment or as a provisional remedy, in all cases where it would have been allowed under the old chancery practice." The statute on the subject enlarges rather than restricts the power of the court over the remedy by injunction. See also Lutheran Evangelical Church v. Gristgau, 34 Wis. 328. In De Pauw v. Oxley, 122 Wis. 656, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 173, 100 N. W. 1028, the court remarked on the same subject: The statute "confessedly was intended to enlarge the duty of the court as it existed under former chancery practice."

In the case last cited it was held that, not only all the power existing at common law regarding injunctive relief was vested in the court by the Constitution, but an added power was afforded by statute, and, it was remarked, following previous cases on the subject, where the papers on an application for an order preserving the status quo pending the final result of the case show a reasonable probability of plaintiff's ultimate success, it is well nigh an imperative duty of the court to grant such relief. "Not only does the discretionary power exist to protect a party" in such circumstances, "but the duty exists to exercise it." To the same effect are Valley Iron Works Mfg. Co. v. Goodrick, 103 Wis. 436, 78 N. W. 1096; Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 84 N. W. 870; Bartlett v. L. Bartlett & Son Co. 116 Wis. 450, 93 N. W. 473.

There is nothing to the contrary of the foregoing, we venture to say, to be found in our books, except as suggested in the Sweeney Case. Had it not been for the inadvertence there made, and now criticized, possibly this unfortunate litigation would not have arisen. Denial of power, or hesitation to use it until some calamity shall have occurred, are both unfortunate. Power should be used discreetly and efficiently, neither denied where it exists, nor used with such timidity as to bring the administration of the law into contempt and encourage infractions of it.

We may now safely restrict Ward v. Sweeney, to this: (a) The court will not recognize a controversy as to title to an office as a primary right constituting a proper major subject for adjudication in equity; (b) the right in such a case being strictly legal, as a primary matter, it must be dealt with by legal remedies; (c) the right of a de facto officer to remain in undisputed possession of an office as opposed to forcible efforts of an adverse claimant to gain possession, until the de jure right of the latter shall have been judicially established, is a proper primary subject for equitable vindication with all the judicial instrumentalities essential to that end; (d) whether the circumstances in any given case are such as to render use of the injunctive power of the court advisable or demandable is matter of administration, and not of power.

The foregoing is as far as it is necessary to go to demonstrate that Ward v. Sweeney does not, as the trial court supposed, rule this case, if the appellant, at the time of the forcible disturbance of his possession, was a de facto officer. The court did not there decide, nor has any court decided, and it would be contrary to elementary principles if any court should decide, that, in such circumstances as here, it is not competent to judicially protect the party in possession, if a de facto officer. Even if the court would indorse now the degree of hesitancy suggested in Ward v. Sweeney to protect an officer in his possession against being unlawfully ejected, all the elements of imminent peril to personal security and public interests, which were supposed to be absent there, or not clearly shown to exist, were present here in a high degree.

So, if appellant was a de facto officer,—and of that anon, the circuit judge, as said, did not pass upon the matter, and the fact that the author of the disturbance was the governor did not change the ordinary rule, and of that we are about to speak,—the court not only had power and duty to act as it was invoked to act, but Ward v. Sweeney rules the case in appellant's favor, instead of in respondents' favor, and entitles appellant to a reversal as regards any question decided by the circuit court adversely to him.

II.

Thus, it will be seen demonstrated that the supposed safe basis for the judgment appealed from has no sustaining quality, and, unless the result be right because of some question of law erroneously decided by the trial court against respondents, a reversal must follow. Counsel who stand for the judgment appreciate that seemingly, and confidently press upon our attention a proposition of radical character which does not seem to have received any favor below further than is indicated by the suggestion in the learned judge's decision that "this court has refused to issue temporary restraining orders which would in any way interfere with the exercise of the broad powers vested in the chief executive of a state. The governor is responsible to the people, and not to the courts, for the manner in which he exercises these broad powers." Citing Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513. 522.

The broad language thus used might be very misleading to the casual professional reader, and particularly so to the nonprofessional, without having definitely in mind some important legal principles which will be mentioned. Confined to the literal sense of the words, "exercise of the broad powers vested in the chief executive of a state," illustrated by Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, which involved the exercise of a power so vested, the language is accurate; extended to the exercise of power not so vested,—to the usurpation of power,—the language rather points favorably to the contention of counsel for respondents which we are about to discuss.

We hesitate to think the learned court intended to go further than to hold that the executive of a state is only answerable directly to the people in respect to the exercise of the power which he possesses; his conduct in that respect being a subject for political consideration at the bar of public opinion and the people at the polls,—leaving him answerable at the bar of the court, as the representative of the people, in respect to violations of law by assumption of power which he does not possess. It is quite certain that the learned circuit judge did not mean "this court will refuse to issue a temporary restraining order which in any way interferes with the exercise" of power assumed "by the executive of a state" to be vested in him, but which he does not in fact possess, and the exercise of which could not occur except by a violation of law,—a usurpation,—because the judge proceeded to consider the subject, and held that the "broad powers vested in the executive of a state" do not include power, personally or by his agent, to violently eject a person from an office when he shall have declared it vacant, and to install his appointee therein as the successor, and to further hold that, in a proper case, an injunction will lie to prevent such an interference, though that was left somewhat involved later.

It were better if the learned judge had carefully, expressly, differentiated between "interfere with the exercise of the broad powers vested in the chief executive of a state," which plaintiff's counsel was not urging, and interfere with the exercise of assumed power not possessed in fact, which was the subject of complaint. The failure to thus differentiate left the initial decision liable to be considered obscure or contradictory, which has called for this exposé in order to do justice thereto.

The full scope of the proposition dealt with below, as above indicated, and now urged with great confidence, is this: The governor of a state, acting in the name of his office, regardless of whether what he does or the manner of doing it is within or without the scope of his authority, cannot be interfered with by the courts. He is answerable only to the legislature under the impeachment feature of the Constitution, or to the people. He is entirely independent of the courts, in acting as governor, regardless of whether his acts be legal or illegal. If he violates private rights, acting as governor, there is no jurisdiction in the court to afford redress for the wrong by interfering with him or his agents.

That is a striking proposition, as it is put up to us for consideration, though not a novel one even here. The boldness with which it is pressed upon our attention, in view of the fact that it was most emphatically condemned here more than fifty years ago, is strange, passing strange. Some authorities are cited to our attention supposed to give some support thereto, without appreciating seemingly that in general they deal with matters decided by the governor within his jurisdiction, and that, anything said suggesting authority outside of it regardless of judicial restraint is mere obiter, and not supported by any principle grounded in our system of government; and, further, not appreciating, apparently, that the matter is really not open to discussion here, unless the law is most solemnly declared in 1855 on one of the most, if not the most, significant occasions in the history of the court, is to be overruled.

A brief discussion of our system of government will not be amiss at this point. When it was established, the people had in their keeping the whole power of sovereignty, which was, of old, deemed to be centered in a personal head as the agency of God on earth. Their effort to form a government, to exercise that power, contemplated a new system,—one essentially different from any existing in the Old World. The courts were no longer to be the agencies of a personal sovereign, deriving authority from on high, instead of from the people, but they were to be agencies of the latter. Sovereign authority was to be regarded as in the people, ex-ercisable by the people through their chosen agencies, and for the people. It was divided into three grand divisions, viz., executive, legislative, and judicial; each to be the supreme agency within its particular sphere, and to be subordinate outside of it. So the structure was builded. So it exists, and must continue to exist until the people who wrought it see fit to change it.

No right is more sacred under such system than that of an individual to appeal to the judicial forum of his country for redress of any wrong perpetrated upon him. Without that right neither life, liberty, nor the pursuit of happiness would be secure, and the very purpose for which, in contemplation of our Constitution, "governments are instituted among men," would fail utterly. To conserve that purpose, not to destroy it, executive power was conferred on the governor, coupled with the restraint and balance afforded by judicial authority to confine it within its jurisdiction, not to regulate it, by dealing with all judicial questions,—a guaranty which distinguishes our constitutional liberties from the system of old. The executive is absolutely free from judicial interference within the scope of his duties. To that extent, the court will not attempt to invade his realm to enjoin him, to mandate him, or prohibit him. There are a multitude of authorities on this. But when he steps aside from the sphere of his duty, and violates the law, he is amenable to the law, the same as any other person. The scope of his duty does not extend to breaking the law. Within its scope, acting as governor, he is powerful, but outside thereof, though pretending to act as governor, he is but an individual, and must bow to the underlying principles of our system, that all men are equal before the law,—the humblest with the most exalted, the lowliest in legitimate industry with the highest surrounded by all the power which wealth can give, or the highest in agency authority referable to the people; there is no difference in contemplation of our system, and, if courts do their duty, there can be no difference in fact. The courts must settle rights in any controversy respecting violation thereof, whether the violator be the governor or a private individual.

Anything contrary to the foregoing is a relic of an ancient system where there were no private rights, strictly speaking,—only privileges. In the separation from Old World systems and the erection of a new one in this country, the former, contemplating merely graces, was succeeded by the latter, contemplating inherent rights, and among those rights those of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,—a system of real rights in place of a system of mere privileges enjoyable only through grace.

We must go on at some length, not attempting, however, any full exposition of the Constitution from an original standpoint, as to questions which were long ago supposed to be set at rest, and must now be so regarded, no matter what other courts have said or may say on the subject. To go over it anew and in detail at this late date would be a work of supererogation, and reflect upon generations of our judicial history and those eminent men who embellished it,—Carpenter, Randall, Howe, Orton, Arnold, Ryan, Knowlton, and others at the bar, two of whom subsequently became chief justices of this court, and Cole, Whiton, and Smith from the bench, who so logically placed the matter on record beyond room for reasonable doubt.

The subject in hand is so important in every way, and it is of such moment to refresh the memory of the older members of bench and bar, and to inculcate upon the minds of those of lesser experience the great truths spoken in this court before the days of those now in service, that we feel justified in restating such truths in a general way, and quoting at some length the inimitable, forensic, and eloquent logic with which they were in those early days spread upon our pages.

Under our system, when a judicial question arises, it is within the competency of the court to deal with it, not stopping to consider, necessarily, who are the parties. Whenever there is a violation of law perpetrated or threatened, it is competent for the courts to apply a remedy. It is not bound to desist—indeed it has no right to desist—because, perchance, of the violator being the governor of the state or his agent, for then the offender is outside the scope of his duty, and, as before indicated, he is a mere individual regardless of his name or title.

In the foregoing, as we have already sufficiently indicated, it is not doubted that the governor, within the scope of his authority, is beyond the reach of the courts, but a violation of private rights, we reiterate, is not within such scope, and when that occurs by him or his agents, the wronged party may appeal to the courts of his country for redress.

As said by this court in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow, 4 Wis. 742, so long as the court merely proceeds “in the discharge of its appropriate duty of determining and settling the rights of parties, and not creating these rights, then it must go forward to judgment, however unpleasant and delicate a duty that may be, and regardless of any and all consequences that may result from its constitutional action. . . . Here 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

we must firmly stand to our posts of public trust, until the Constitution fall about us in ruins.” Those words, evincing a lofty conception of judicial duty and courage to do it, after the lapse of over half a century in the history of this court, might well be repeated with emphasis. The idea so eloquently phrased by Justice Cole in those early days, and on that memorable occasion in the court’s administration, is no less pervading here now than then. Notwithstanding assaults upon it then or since or now, upon the theory of a sort of kingly authority vested in the executive department enabling the one chancing to be there to infract the law, and be so above the agency of the people to remedy and prevent wrongs by applying the law that any attempt to question his acts by such agencies would be usurpatious,—it has been and is now no more in danger than “a star in maw of the clouds.” It is grounded on the sovereignty of the people vitalized by a constitutional appointment of the judicial department to vindicate it.

How can one be familiar with Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow and doubt, for a moment, that the governor, as a violator of law, stands no different than any individual? Arguments similar to those we have heard to the contrary in this case were made then with a logic, eloquence, and force unexampled before in this court, and never equaled since. There the record stands,—an inexhaustible fountain of wisdom on the subject discussed. All the actors at the bar realized that they were engaged in a contest which was to settle for all time in this state the underlying principles of our governmental system,—settle them untrammelled by any false notion which had obtained elsewhere under the misconception that foreign systems furnished a model for it. They were too near the time and circumstances of origin to need to look for precedents. In fact there were no precedents. They were familiar with the systems of the ancients. They knew the purpose of the builders here was to displace it. In the light of the monumental purpose, and with the experience which the official expounders themselves gained in making our Constitution, there was wrought out and pronounced a result which no one need misunderstand.

How the sentiments leading up to and characterizing the final result in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow grow as we contemplate them, and fill the soul with admiration for our form of government, and gratitude to those who placed its dominant principles on such an enduring foundation. Some of those sentiments, in the language of that day, may well be repeated here as best voicing our own conception.

"This government is nothing but a division of the powers of the government, nothing more." "Sovereignty is not in one of the departments, but in all of them." This is not only a popular government, but it is a representative government,—one where the officers are but agents, and not rulers, of the people,—one where no man is so high as to be above the Constitution, and no one so low as to be beneath its protection. That was the first significant official evidence here of full appreciation of how widely our system varies from those of old, by which many courts have set the judicial compass to determine the real nature of constitutional rights. It has been followed, with few lapses since. It was followed in Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 Ann. Cas. 711, in rejecting the heresy that found early lodgment in the jurisprudence of this country, that there is no natural right to transmit property by will or inheritance; and again in Dardis's Will, 135 Wis. 457, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1033, 115 N. W. 332, 15 Ann. Cas. 740, and again in Rice's Will, 150 Wis. 401, 136 N. W. 956, 137 N. W. 778, rejecting the notion that competency to make a will rests in privilege instead of in a right, and again in State ex rel. McGrael v. Phelps, 144 Wis. 1, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353, 128 N. W. 1041, repudiating the claim that there is no natural right to participate in the usual way in making a choice of agents to vitalize the sovereignty of the people in governmental affairs.

It is somewhat strange that, notwithstanding the real logic of the change effected by the declaration and successful conflict or independence on our shores, courts sometimes seem to have failed in appreciation that it was independence of the system of government characterized by individual possession of mere privileges emanating from a personal sovereign, which was declared for, fought for, and won in the smoke and din of battle and by the sacrifice of blood and treasure,—a substitution for the old system, of one based on inherent individual rights, recognizing nothing in the nature of sovereign authority but that inherent in the people, and delegable by the people to co-ordinate departments in such manner as the people might see fit, coupled with constitutional restrictions and guaranties.

Notwithstanding the light of the old notion of personal sovereignty and the system upon which it rested was extinguished in the struggle characterizing the birth of the new system on our shores, which arose in all its unspeakable beneficence from the ashes of the old, like the beautiful flower 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from the ashes of Hyacinthus, and has ever since pervaded the land and is fast extending its blessings to include all mankind, the old, like Banquo's ghost, appears in apparition from time to time, called forth, as it were, from the human tendency—product of heredity—reaching back through the ages, to bow at a personification of personal sovereignty. It would be most lamentable if such false conceptions should find any place in our jurisprudence after the early most emphatic rejection of it, and the frequent affirmances of such rejection.

We do not fail to note, at this point, the personal expression of doubt in State ex rel. Peck v. Rusk, 55 Wis. 465, 479, 13 N. W. 452, as to the competency of the court to send its writ to the governor of a state or in any way review his acts. But it was not an authoritative saying. It was a mere passing and wholly personal, and, we are constrained to think, rather inconsiderate, remark. It is well to eliminate it expressly from having a cast of judicial decision.

It must not be understood that there is any want of appreciation here of the fact that much deference is due to the co-ordinate department of the government, vitalized by the governor. It is the pleasure and the duty of the courts to pay that deference, and, perhaps, to resolve reasonable doubts as to where mere deference ends, in favor of the executive department. But the court must not go so far as to cast any doubt upon its own authority to deal with all judicial questions, regardless of whether it may necessarily call in question some act of the governor. It may very properly hesitate, and even decline, to use its authority in any coercive way as to him, where there is any measure of discretion to do so, but not even venture to doubt that it possesses the power to act when action is necessary. No one can tell how soon action may be necessary to stay the hand which might accomplish most serious mischief, as was the case giving rise to Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow.

Some courts have given the weak excuse for doubting their right to send a writ to a governor directly or indirectly questioning his executive act, that the court might be powerless to enforce obedience,—even suggesting the possibility of executive control of the militia having to be contended with; as if a court with knowledge of its constitutional authority would be justified, under any circumstances, in not using it merely because the one who would be otherwise acted upon, even though he be the chief conservator of the law, might commit treason, as it were, rather than submit to duly constituted authority. This court has never yet acknowledged the existence of either the want of power to enforce its writs, or want of courage to vindicate it.

Judges of great eminence and text writers the most learned have discoursed along the same line as the foregoing. Justice Field, speaking for the court in People ex rel. McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 39, said this: "There is nothing in this distribution of powers which places either department above the law, or makes either independent of the other. . . . There is no such thing as absolute independence." And further in effect, where power is given a department, it is to be implied that there is independence within the scope thereof. If it oversteps its line, the judiciary will vindicate the violated right.

For a further example of the many illustrations in the books of what has been said, Justice Valentine, speaking for the court in Martin v. Ingham, 38 Kan. 641, 17 Pac. 162, thus expounded the constitutional system: "There is no express provision in the Constitution nor in any statute, exempting any member of the executive department, chief or otherwise, from being sued in any of the courts, . . . and if any one of such officers is exempt, . . . it must be because of some hidden or occult implications of the Constitution or the statutes, or from some inherent and insuperable barriers founded in the structure of the government itself. . . . In all other cases it is not the rank or character of the individual officer, but the nature of the thing to be done, which governs. No other officer is above the law. . . . The different departments of the government are not independent of each other. . . . It is said that if the governor opposes the order or judgment of the court, it cannot be enforced. . . . But are the courts to anticipate that the governor may not perform his duty? . . . No one should suppose that he would fail to perform his duty. . . . No department should ever cease to perform its functions for fear that some other department may render its acts nugatory. . . . Each of the different departments . . . is superior to the others in some respects. . . . Each department in its own sphere is supreme. But each outside of its own sphere is weak and must obey."

Courts which hold contrary to the foregoing, as said by some text writers, do so without any sound basis for their conclusion. They do so, as before indicated, largely from a false conception of the system of which they form a part.

We indorse, without qualification, the sentiments of the courts to which we have alluded. We refuse utterly to follow those jurisdictions which would place the gubernatorial office above the law, speak of it as entirely independent of either of the other co-ordinate departments of the government as regards their respective jurisdictions, or hold that it is not subordinate to and subject to obey when the court within its jurisdiction commands. We must refuse to follow the lead which would either deny possession of the authority delegated to courts by the people, or hesitate to exercise it for fear of being efficiently opposed by a breaking of the law by the officer who stands as the ideal personification of government by law. We hold firmly to all the court said and decided on the subject in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow. To deny possession of the power plainly lodged in the court by the Constitution, and which is inherent in the system itself, either from want of appreciation of the principle distinguishing such system from the one it displaced, or supposed want of power, on the ground that the governor, from his position, has greater physical power of resistance to the enforcement of the law than the court could lawfully overcome, would be a failure of judicial duty characterized by want of judicial courage. Those who would lean on the latter reason fail to appreciate that no government can be stronger than the people, and that the people may be depended upon to efficiently strengthen the arm of either one of its co-ordinate departments, as necessary to enforce submission to duly constituted authority. The people may always be depended upon, in the last analysis, to support firm vindication of official trust.

We contemplate with much satisfaction that, in the early history of our court, its personnel possessed the learning, the comprehension of the judicial trust, and the courage, to take the firm position on the subject under discussion recorded in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow. Then it was suggested by counsel that the court might render a judgment which it would be unable to enforce, and other counsel replied in sentiments indorsed by the court: "I have not seen fit to point the court to the possible consequences of its judgment, still I say it may or may not be executed. The only judgment to be pronounced is the one which law and justice dictate, not that which the executive arm can most easily execute." Three members of this court, two having been fathers of the Constitution, placed upon the records each his exposition of our form of government. With perfect harmony they proclaimed the subordination under the Constitution of the executive office to the sovereignty of the people, represented by the judiciary, on all judicial questions. The masterly treatment of the matter, and unanswerable logic with which the conclusion was supported, have rendered it unnecessary to rediscuss the subject, and almost inappropriate to attempt it. Such attempt would not have been made even briefly, had not the proposition under discussion been presented and urged with such confidence as to indicate advisability at least of reaffirming the early decision. If the writer could make plainer what was before so clearly pictured, he would gladly embrace this opportunity to do so, but confesses inability in that regard. There stands the picture of our system painted by master hands more than fifty years ago. With the unqualified repudiation then of the claim that executive action, under all circumstances, is beyond reach of the court, we have marveled somewhat that the idea should at this late day be seriously advanced, supported by the same infirm logic as before, with added sanction of some courts which have fallen into error.

Before it was contended upon the one side, in harmony with the ancient system, that the governor occupies a sort of sovereign status removed beyond the reach, directly or indirectly, of the court, and answerable only to the people; that "in city or in the country, in the battle or at the banquet, in anger or in love, he is the governor still."

"The attribute to awe and majesty

Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings."

On the other hand, it was contended that sovereignty was in the people and only there, the governor being a mere agent to do the people's will, answerable to them within his jurisdiction, but amenable to the court as the superior agency of the people on all judicial questions, the same as any other individual; that any infraction of the law by him is neither justifiable nor defensible by his mere status as governor, and that what is the law, what a violation of it, and the consequences thereof, are judicial questions.

With inimitable power of logic, the proper place of the judiciary in our system and importance of maintaining it were pressed upon the attention of the court to nerve it to the uttermost in solving the controversy, —these inspiring words being indulged in from the bar: "When discontent, violence, and anarchy shall succeed to law and order, when the people and public officers shall depart from the Constitution and desert the ship of state, I have a hope that the last glimpse that will be caught of organized government will be the judiciary, that courts may be seen as long as any vestige of a state shall remain, still ready to direct, still speaking the law with an even mind, dispensing justice with an even hand, sitting serene and unmoved above the influence of fear and of faction, still abiding by that motto so peculiarly their own,—Fiat justitia, ruat cælum."

The result was, as before indicated, unqualified support of the contention for the supremacy of the courts on all questions appertaining to the violation of law and the protection of right, the court saying in terms or effect, "To talk of sovereign departments created by our Constitution is to simply talk, and not to think, and much less to think rationally. We have no sovereign department. We have no triple sovereignty." "Our government is founded on principles not known to the law of any other country. The sovereignty of the commonwealth remains in the people." Each co-ordinate state agent stands for the whole people within its proper sphere. When the court speaks within its sphere, it is not the justices who speak, but the people through their chosen agent, the court. To it is delegated all judicial authority, whether it concerns the executive or any other individual. To that authority all must bow. In that there is subordination, not to the court, not to the justices of the court, but to the sovereignty of the people. Such is the Constitution, the collective voice of the people from whence the sovereign command emanates through each of its agencies, giving to each its measure of representative authority,—to the court all that appertains to the redress of violated rights.

Can there be any doubt in view of the foregoing, of the power and the duty of the court to deal with every question in this case of violated right? Is not the idea that such duty stops at the threshold of the executive office, or anywhere short of its full performance, the veriest heresy?

Many of the authorities cited to our attention in support of the proposition under discussion, rightly understood, are in harmony with what has been said, and, as to those which are contrary thereto, they are not worthy of being followed. As has been clearly indicated in this opinion, Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513, upon which some reliance has been placed in support of the proposition urged by counsel for respondents, is in the same class with People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, 156 N. Y. 136, 41 L.R.A. 231, 66 Am. St. Rep. 547, 50 N. E. 791; Jonesboro F. B. & B. Gap. Turnp. Co. v. Brown, 8 Baxt. 490, 35 Am. Rep. 713; Hawkins v. Governor, 1 Ark. 570, 33 Am. Dec. 346, and many other cases cited, and still others which might have been.

Therein, with varying phrasings, is found the expression upon which counsel have builded their hopes: "The governor is not answerable to the court for how he has performed or failed to perform his legal or constitutional duties. He cannot be judicially coerced into performing, or controlled as to the manner he shall perform, or prohibited from performing, his judicial duties." True, but is it his duty, acting as a quasi judicial tribunal, to go outside of his jurisdiction and violate the constitutional right of due process of law? The distinguished courts which have so much revealed, so to speak, in language similar to that quoted, have not intended, in general, to be taken as meaning that the executive of a state may not be reached by the department charged with remedying violated rights, in case of his doing something which he has no right to do, or doing what he has a right to do in an illegal manner.

We do not need to go into the subject at length, as to the extent to which the executive may directly or indirectly be reached within the scope of his duties. That he can be as to mere ministerial matters in case of clearly violating a duty, but not in the field of discretion, is strongly supported. Here there was neither ministerial nor discretionary duty to do the act sought to be enjoined; that is, the forcible instalment of Mr. Anderson in the office of commissioner of insurance. Besides the question is raised as to whether there was not actual usurpation in the proceeding itself for the removal of appellant, which will be discussed further on. So the case as to the primary right involved really only deals with matters of jurisdiction. In general, where it is suggested that neither the governor nor his agents can be dealt with whether within or without the scope of executive authority, that the alleged offender being governor or the agent of the governor the gubernatorial office is an efficient shield,—the real point involved did not warrant the argument made in support of it. It was made without thought that jurisdictional defects render an act void, regardless of the tribunal to which they are referable. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60 is often cited, often misunderstood, and often not followed. The real logic of it is that the courts may reach the executive indirectly as to ministerial or jurisdictional matters, and in case of the head, the impediment is referable to matter of policy rather than competency. In High, Injunctions, at § 1326, after reviewing at length the authorities, the author remarks: "If the acts which it is sought to restrain are of a strictly ministerial, as distinguished from an executive or political, nature, the fact that they have been committed to executive officers such as the governor of a state, etc., will not prevent relief by injunction in a proper case." Matters jurisdictional, manifestly, are no further beyond reach than matters ministerial, but, as we have seen, the law for this state is firmly entrenched in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Bashford v. Barstow, supporting competency of the court to deal with the governor directly or indirectly for any violation of law.

III.

Counsel for respondents do not seem to insist very confidently or particularly that appellant was not a de facto officer. But since, under some circumstances, that question might be very vital to this litigation, it seems best to treat it briefly.

Much might be said as to what is the precise nature of that special status denominated de facto. A person may be a de facto officer, and have no real title at all to the place he assumes to have the right to. If one is in possession of an office, performing its duties, and entered by right, or such claim of right as not to be classable as a usurper, or has been in undisturbed possession so long as to be equivalent to an entry under claim of right, and still claims in good faith to be entitled to the office, and all surroundings afford an appearance of de jure official status, he is, as a general rule, de facto what he claims to be. What gives him that status is color of authority,—color of title is not essential, strictly speaking. The latter term is often used, but its infirmity was exposed in the leading case of State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409.

This broad definition of what constitutes an officer de facto, formulated by Lord Holt in Parker v. Kett, 1 Ld. Raym. 658, 12 Mod. 467, and given special significance by Lord Ellenborough and the full King's bench in 1865, Rex v. Bedford Level Corp. 6 East, 356, 2 Smith, 535, was demonstrated in State v. Carroll, to cover the subject under discussion, as it has ever since stood in England, and, generally in this country: "One who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, although he is not such in point of law." The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts added the weight of its sanction thereof in Petersilea v. Stone, 119 Mass. 465, 20 Am. Rep. 335. The text writers give like sanction, expressing the American view to be, that it is color of authority, not color of title, which distinguishes an officer de facto from a usurper. Throop, Pub. Off. § 623; Mecham, Pub. Off. § 317.

The question of whether a person in office has a de facto right thereto, it would seem from the foregoing, can, in all ordinary cases, only safely be solved by principle. It is not best to rely on case law, and tie to some particular adjudication involving facts somewhat similar to those to be presently dealt with. The principle governing the matter is definitely settled in the unwritten law, is plain, simple and easily understood. If one finds another in the apparent enjoyment of an office, having entered by right, or a good faith claim of right, or been in possession so long that there is a presumption in his favor in that regard, that one need not, in general, investigate the title of such other to the office before venturing to transact business with him. He may act on the appearances of official status. For all practical purposes such other is an officer de jure. There is no other safe rule to go by. Variations here and there, seemingly without appreciation of the prevailing principle, or moved by the necessity of a particular situation to ingraft an exception thereon, have made some confusion in the authorities.

Prior to State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912, 57 N. W. 296, no attempt had been made here to state any general or even particular limitation of the customary rule; the court being content to deal with each particular situation as it arose. It is significant that, though in many instances prior thereto, commencing with Tolle v. Stone, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 230, whether the particular status involved a de facto officer was important, the answer was most always in the affirmative. They were not referred to in State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, but a rule was made for the peculiar situation in hand in the nature of an exception to the common rule.

One would assume from examination of the many cases preceding State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, and the many others subsequent thereto, that there could hardly be conceived a situation of an office de jure, and an entry and retention in good faith with all the environments of an officer of that character, without the person in possession being at least an officer de facto until such time as an adjudication of his title should occur, so the precise situation giving rise to the particular case is important.

These are the facts of the Oates Case: The incumbent of the office and his adversary were rival candidates for the place for a new term. The latter, in due course, obtained the regular certificate of election, his majority being 1 out of a poll of 4,645 votes. The former refused, upon due demand, to surrender possession, claiming, notwithstanding the official canvass, to have received a majority of the legal votes cast. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mandamus proceedings were instituted to settle the controversy. Thus, the question arose whether an officer holding over after the expiration of the term for which he was elected, and in defiance of the result of an official canvass certifying another to have been duly elected as his successor to the particular place, is an officer de facto, and as such entitled to retain possession until the title shall have been judicially settled in proceedings to that end. In short, the question was, Is a person whose term has expired, who really has no right except pending the appearance of a successor having a prima facie right to take his place,—one who holds on claiming to be the one elected notwithstanding the legal canvass and declaration of the demandant to have been duly elected to the particular office and for the particular term,—a de facto officer?

For the particular situation it was apparent to the court that an affirmative answer might lead to very serious consequences,—that it might make a very harmful rule. The court felt warranted in determining the matter in the negative and without precedent, proceeding to that end to meet the particular emergency by this process of reasoning: "A de facto officer is one who is in possession of an office and discharging its duties under color of authority. . . . By color of authority is meant authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal, so that the incumbent be not a mere volunteer. . . . Tested by this rule it is apparent that the defendant is in no proper sense a de facto officer as against the relator. There has been no canvass or determination by anyone in his favor, nor has he any certificate, commission, or authority from any person, officer, or board purporting to authorize him to discharge the duties of the office."

Thus, it will be seen the opinion in State ex rel. Jones v. Oates was confined to a very narrow compass, namely,—Is a person in possession of an office, having no certificate of election or of appointment covering the period of his possession, in opposition to one who has been duly certified to have been elected to take his place in the particular office for the particular term, and the one in possession having no right whatever to the place referable to any evidence he possesses, except to hold the accessories of the place in trust to deliver the same to his successor upon demand, a de facto officer?

The case was quite different, it will be observed, from one involving a claimed forfeiture of a term of office by removal for cause, the person in possession of the place, and alleged to have been removed, having his commission entitling him to remain, and insisting in good faith that the proceedings to annul such commission are invalid.

The general rule, that possession with color of authority and performance of the duty of the office creates the de facto status, was not denied in the Oates Case, but rather affirmed, though there was a suggestion that color of authority means "authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal." It may be that the court, arguendo, went rather farther than was necessary in an effort to state a sound basis for the decision, instead of resting it upon the exigencies of the particular situation and upon a permissible exception to the general rule. As said before, courts in general distinguished color of title from color of authority, holding that the former may exist without the other, and that no election or appointment is essential to a de facto status,—only those general appearances suggesting and giving confidence to people having occasion to perform official business with the office, that the one in possession, performing the duties thereof and claiming the right in good faith to do so, is the officer in fact which he appears to be. To harmonize with the current of authority, the decision would need to be restrained to the idea that, in the particular circumstances, there can be no color of authority where there is no color of right. That makes a good exception to an old rule, to meet the particular species of mischief the court dealt with in the Oates Case. The effect of it, as there suggested, must be that one may, in some circumstances, have a de facto status as to the public,—for example, when he is within the stated exception,—though not such status as regards his personal right.

The first instance of rival claimants dealt with here after State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, and where that was cited, was in Deuster v. Zillmer, 119 Wis. 402, 97 N. W. 31. The officer there held over in defiance of the person who had been elected his successor. The former was held to be an officer de facto, though his term had expired, because the latter had not been "declared," as in the Oates Case, "duly elected to that identical office as his successor." It was distinguished from the former case on that ground. The Oates Case was again referred to in State ex rel. Rinder v. Goff, 129 Wis. 668, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 109 N. W. 628, but the person having the prima facie right was in possession of the office. It was again mentioned in State ex rel. Manitowoc v. Green, 131 Wis. 324, 111 N. W. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

519. There was a successor in that instance, and a holding over without right as against the prima facie title, though not under the precise circumstances of the Oates Case. The person so holding over was held to be the officer de facto. Thus, it will be seen, the tendency has been to restrain the Oates Case to its particular facts, and the exception those facts gave rise to.

Applying the foregoing here, it is considered that appellant was the commissioner of insurance, at least, de facto, when he sought protection against the efforts to forcibly disturb his possession of the office rooms and records. The case is not within the exception created by State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, because the term for which appellant was appointed had not expired by operation of law, and he had in his possession the commission covering some three years' time yet, which was still in force unless the attempted removal was valid. Anderson had not been certified to have been appointed to the particular office as successor to appellant for a new term, but to take up and continue the work of the term covered by appellant's appointment. The latter was still in office, with all the appearances of still being entitled to the place, and insisting in good faith, upon having such right, and there was a serious question, from a private and a public standpoint, as to whether he was not so entitled,—so serious that it has taken a long time and much labor of two courts, assisted by the industry of eminent counsel for the respective parties, to solve it.

IV.

If the foregoing conclusion be not correct, in my opinion, that did not warrant leaving the rival claimants,—one in possession claiming in good faith to have a right to remain, and the other out of possession claiming the right to enter,—to contend and settle the matter by physical force. The course in State ex rel. Jones v. Oates was by orderly judicial proceedings, not by violence. If the rule there be applicable here, then Anderson had a clear legal right to possession, and a clear legal judicial remedy by mandamus to accomplish that which was sought by an assault upon the office quarters and threatened assault upon appellant himself, if necessary to cause his submission. Would it not be a most serious reproach to our system to hold that, under such circumstances, the courts must, or will, stand idly by and see a respectable, distinguished citizen, in high station, in good faith, possession of one of the most important offices in the state, and convinced of his duty to retain the place, subject to judicial remedies, treated as an outlaw, while the one seeking possession, and the one seeking to assist the claimant to gain possession, have but to ask in order to have the right vindicated by a judicial remedy, as in the Oates Case, and violently ejected, regardless of the good faith of the aggressors? In such a situation is it not in the interests of all parties concerned, especially under the particular circumstances of this case, in the interests of public order and public welfare and public dignity, that the court should intervene with its "even mind and hand" efficiently commanding peace? No such proceedings as were brought to a close by the temporary injunction in this case should be sanctioned by the courts for a moment, in my opinion, unless in some special circumstances of a person holding possession in a most unreasonable and contemptuous manner, akin to that of an outlaw, who deserves no consideration whatever in a court of equity. If there is a reasonable question whether the retention be right, the rule that there is no wrong without a remedy should apply, and the rule, also, that in a case of legal and equitable remedy as well, the latter should be permitted if the former is not as full and adequate. That is the universal doctrine. It has been vindicated in this court to prevent breaches of the peace and detriment to public interests, where small amounts of money were involved. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 84 N. W. 870. The logic of that case demanded injunctive protection in this one, unless appellant is to be regarded as a person who is entirely outside the scope of the law's protection. That the doctrine of protection by law, under all circumstances involving any merit, is the rule of this court, is well evinced by the quotation in Chain Belt Co. v. Von Spreckelsen, 117 Wis. 106, 94 N. W. 78, from Ward v. Sweeney. The great power intrusted to the court to command and enforce peace should be used in such circumstances regardless of who is the actor.

Thus, I cannot escape the conclusion that, from any fair viewpoint, appellant had a cause of action in equity when he initiated these proceedings. If he was a de facto officer, that must be true. If there was a fair question as to whether he had that status, and he was acting in good faith, of which there can be no manner of doubt, then, in my opinion, it is likewise true. I permissibly step aside momentarily, to express this as a personal opinion. I wish it to so be recorded. I am conscious of some support in such view, though others may not wish to join of record, because what has preceded and what will follow, or either, is sufficient for the case. As to my brethren who did not join with me on the record, or at all, in this, I have endeavored to speak so as not to cause them any embarrassment.

V.

At this point, it seems best, since a majority concur, to consider the broad question of how far a court of equity may or should go in a case of this sort. That involves the mixed question of how far the court may go as matter of jurisdiction in the technical sense, and how far in the more limited sense of judicial policy; and perhaps the still further element of how far as matter of broader judicial policy, not trenching upon jurisdictional grounds in any sense. True, in view of the decision reached on other questions, this subject might be passed without expression of opinion, but as circumstances might have existed rendering it vital, those who concur on the particular points have concluded that the subject might well be dealt with, and with due deference to those who do not agree with final result, and those who do, yet might prefer not to join in an opinion either way as to the particular matter. It is thought that what is here said is appropriate to the case, will be helpful hereafter, and will not embarrass any member of the court in any event. If it were not thought such could be accomplished, out of deference to anyone who does not agree as to the particular question, or wish to express an opinion thereon in this case, though concurring in the general result reached, the writer and all of the majority would pass the subject without treatment.

The question is this: Should the court rest in a case of this sort, having reached a point calling for judgment vindicating the primary right,—the right to immunity from being forcibly dispossessed by illegal methods,—leaving the more important question, the right to the office, undetermined?

That is an important question. It has been taken largely for granted that either the court is without jurisdiction to, or, in any event, should not, try the title de jure in an equity action to quiet the right of possession against forcible attempts to disturb it. Must parties in such a case, though in the court having jurisdiction to settle the whole controversy, depart with but partial relief, and none as to the ultimate matter, and come back, not really in another form of action, because we really have but one, but asking another form of relief,—a part of the same form as before, and, from a practical standpoint, including it? Under our liberal Code of Procedure, rightly understood and administered, is it true that such devotion to mere form is necessary, commendable, or really right? If there are expressions in opinions which would sustain such course, or even precedents, and there be no jurisdictional impediment in the way, has not the time come, and is this not a good opportunity, to eliminate them from our jurisprudence, and go back to the conception embodied in the Code?

The learned court below supposed its power was included in very narrow limits by the mere form of relief appropriate to satisfy the primary subject of the litigation, the mere right of immunity from forcible ejection, and, even, as we have seen, supposed there was incompetency to determine the matters of fact essential to that right. So it was decided that there was no jurisdiction to look into the merits at all, respecting the right de jure between appellant and his adversary. It was supposed at the circuit, and contended here by counsel for respondents, that such was the infirmity of judicial authority in this equity action. Counsel for appellant passed up that phase of the case as to the de jure right, on the oral argument, and as was thought at first, in the printed argument, in such a way as seemingly to concede that the court below was right on that question, and that this court would not go into the subject further than to see whether appellant had such reasonable ground for his claim as to entitle him to protection in his possession pending a trial of the title in some other action.

The circuit court relied evidently on Ward v. Sweeney, and similar cases, without taking note of the fact that in all such the primary right involved in the litigation was the actual title to the office. Counsel for respondents have been unable to discover any authority on that, as indicated by their few cited examples, other than such as to show that an action in equity will not lie to try title. That must be admitted, but it does not meet the question. This action is not to try the title, but to protect the possession pending trial as to the de jure right. As we have before indicated, such right is legal in character, and whenever a judicial question is raised in respect thereto, primarily it is a legal question, and a subject for the appropriate legal remedy. But while a legal right, in case of there being an adequate legal remedy to vindicate it, can only be the subject of a legal action and legal relief, where the right is equitable, or the title is legal and of necessity no legal remedy will reach the mischief of its violation, or threatened violation, or where a legal right is incidental to an equitable cause of action, then the boundless resources of equity will meet the case, and such is the perfection of our system that there is no wrong within the competency of the individual to commit, which is above the grade of those mere moral infractions which are not recognized as judicially remediable, that equity cannot prevent or redress, if there is no legal remedy to adequately fit the case. That is elementary, and has been declared here over and over again.

Thus, it is plain that the right of possession was the primary right here, not the title to the office. So the ground of the decision below, and of respondents' position here, fails. Another elementary principle comes in at this point. Where a court of equity has acquired jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter for one purpose, it may properly adjudicate all cognate questions and settle the whole controversy, though the connecting matters would not, of themselves, form a primary subject for equitable interference. The mere statement of this would seem to be sufficient. There is no principle of equity jurisprudence with which the profession is more familiar. We therefore pass it without citation to support it.

In view of the foregoing principles, it seems very clear, without reference to authority, that there is no jurisdictional difficulty in the way of the trial court finally disposing of the whole controversy between the parties. The right to protection against violent disturbance, pending settlement of the title, was the primary right. The right to the office was incidental thereto, and had to be judicially settled sometime. The questions involved were practically all questions of law. No possible prejudice could arise because of absence of legal methods of reaching the final result. Why then turn the parties out of court to come back upon the same facts and in practically the same action under a different name, and seek primarily a different form of relief? It seems that such a course would be contrary to the letter and spirit of the Code, and contrary to the light in which it has been viewed here in recent years, though it may have been overlooked somewhat at times. When the framers of the Code abolished all old forms of action, and with them the system of distinct courts, and substituted in place thereof unity in form,—one form of action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs, denominated a civil action,—no matter of jurisdiction, in the technical sense, was left to vex the courts, and embarrass one in quest of justice as regards whether to ask for relief in any particular form of action, and no matter of right, in the technical sense, subject to violation, except as regards whether the kind of relief necessary to fit the case required, by common-law rules, jury interference. That right, at common law, did not exist where the controversy, though a proper subject-matter for legal action, was connected with and germane to the primary subject of the appeal for equitable relief. The court, having jurisdiction of the parties and of the primary subject-matter, was competent to settle the whole controversy,—the main issue and all the incidental controversies connected therewith,—in a single decree. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64; Prescott v. Everts, 4 Wis. 314; Akerly v. Vilas, 15 Wis. 401.

That stated principle has been considered so grounded in our jurisprudence that it has been customary, from an early date, to merely state and apply it as occasion arose, without hesitating to justify the application by reference to authorities. The constitutional guaranty of the right of trial by jury was "that such right shall remain inviolate." So it has been held that it extends no further, and restricts the freedom of equity authority no more, than was the case at common law. Thereby, and by removal, through the Code, of jurisdictional difficulties as regards the particular form of action and particular court to vindicate a particular right, all substantial interferences with settling the rights of parties, regardless of the nature of the relief required, once they were in court in good faith, and it had acquired grasp upon the general controversy required to be settled, to do full justice between the parties vanished. Gates v. Paul, 117 Wis. 170, 94 N. W. 55; Luetzke v. Roberts, 130 Wis. 97, 109 N. W. 949; Knauf & T. Co. v. Elkhart Lake Sand & Gravel Co. 153 Wis. 306, 141 N. W. 701.

We see no reason why the principle stated may not be applied to a case of this sort. The fact that there has been no such application heretofore here makes no difference. Principles should rule in the judicial field, not mere precedents. In no other way can the law preserve anything like the cast of a science. In High on Injunctions, after discussing the rule that an equity action is not maintainable for the purpose of trying the title to an office, it is said, as a result of reviewing the authorities, the rule applies "only to cases where the title to the office is the sole issue involved, and where the bill is filed for the primary purpose of determining that issue. And where the question as to the title to public office arises merely incidentally to the determination of a suit of which a court of equity otherwise has jurisdiction, the rule has no application." Section 1315a, 4th ed. The author ventures to state that as a logical deduction from the ruling principles of equity jurisprudence. While it is rather against the generally accepted theory, we see no escape from the conclusion.

In the circumstances of this case, it seems that establishment of the real status of the office is peculiarly within the field of equity jurisprudence. Appellant is in possession. To prove his right, the facts aliunde the record had to be examined. No possible prejudice can occur to respondents or to the public by the title being finally quieted in this action. On the contrary, every legitimate private, as well as every public, interest would be best promoted by the entire controversy being brought to a termination at the earliest practicable moment, and without the useless expense and expenditure of money and time which would be involved in another action. Why then should the idea that equity cannot take jurisdiction to try the title interfere with undoubted competency to do so, where it is germane to a proper ground of equity action? The extreme of technicality which would adhere to an idea beyond its necessary limitations, to the manifest useless delay in the administration of justice, is foreign to the modern conception of the requirements of the Code, and inconsistent with the trend towards a restoration of those beneficent features intended by its framers to be incorporated therein.

It seems the court should decide in this case, and as an established principle of our practice, that where the controversy as to the title to an office is incidental and germane to a proper subject of primary right in a suit for equity relief, and the court having the case in charge has all the parties interested before it, it has competency to, and will, settle the incidental, as well as the primary, controversy, where it clearly appears that justice will be best subserved thereby.

VI.

In view of the probability of the last question discussed taking the course indicated, the reargument was had on the question of whether the executive, in administering the power of removal under § 970 of the statutes, is required to proceed by due process of law; whether that, in the circumstances of this case, entitled appellant to reasonable notice of hearing of the particulars of the charge made against him, reasonable opportunity to be heard in respect thereto in person and by counsel and by his witnesses, to know the adverse evidence to be considered, exercise the right of cross-examination, and present all material evidence in his behalf; and, if so, whether such right was denied to appellant, and, if so, whether the result reached was valid; and, further, whether it is a jurisdictional requirement to competency to render a judgment of removal in such a case, that the evidence in some reasonable aspect warrants finding existence of the cause for removal charged. We will now proceed to discuss the case in respect to those matters.

If results already reached were not sufficient for the case, there is a still broader one than any heretofore discussed, except, possibly, that of the constitutional power of this court in its relations to the executive department of the state. As the case developed in our consultations, it assumed such magnitude and character that the particular right involved sank somewhat into insignificance. The constitutional question before referred to, and the general features of the case, challenged our attention to the right of the individual as guaranteed by the fundamental law. So, on the one hand, there was questioned the power of the judicial department to deal with violations of private rights when it came to questioning the validity of executive action; and on the other, there was raised, by the very nature of the transactions in evidence, the question of whether the constitutional guaranties of private rights had not been violated. If we passed the danger respecting the proper place of the judicial department in our system being invaded, there was left the danger of private rights being held successfully violable, and a precedent being established greatly weakening the dignity of such rights, at the very foundation thereof. Neither of the parties in this litigation would wish to prevail as to the particular right at so great peril to the public welfare as that of having that question decided wrong or even passed unnoticed. The distinction and high character and patriotic devotion to the people's own high ideals of government by the people through their chosen agents, which they must be assumed to conceive to be founded in our fundamentals, is proof enough for that. So the parties and the particular alleged violated right seemed to form but a mere background to the questions the situation gives rise to, and to almost be obscured by the paramount importance of the inquiries to be solved in reaching a final result being solved right. In appreciation of that, the court rested from the labor of considering the case as at first submitted by counsel for the respective parties, and ordered a resubmission upon four propositions which appear at length in the statement of facts, and may be epitomized to this:

1. The validity of an order of removal under section 970 of the statutes dependable upon the constitutional guaranty of due process of law being observed, and, if so, are the common-law requirements a part of the statute as to hearing upon reasonable notice to the party interested of time, place, and questions involved, and proceeding with substantially the essentials of a fair judicial investigation and determination, to and inclusive of a result supported, in some reasonable view, by evidence,—especially in case of an office for a fixed term?

If the stated proposition be resolved in the negative, then we manifestly have a condition in this state not dreamed of when our system of statutes was originated. Then there were but few officers within the particular removal provision. Now there are hundreds. A system of government, largely by commissions with membership both as to the major and subordinate factors, composed of men of high character and special attainments, has been developed. A maximum of special knowledge on the part of the incumbents is required, with a minimum of political interference, if the complicated system is to have any fair opportunity to attain somewhere near to the ideal of efficiency its originators designed to accomplish, and all hoped for. In view of that, as well as of the overshadowing importance of preserving the integrity of constitutional guaranties of private rights, the question of whether the executive possesses the power of summary removal as to the vast number of important public offices, unrestrained by those principles of natural justice which characterize the common law,—a power which might be used to build up a personal following from the utter dependence of the individuals upon the discretion of the head,—is of immeasurable importance.

The proposition, as stated, might be further narrowed without sacrificing any of its essentials, and might be greatly expanded so as to develop many important details. To take the latter course, and discuss each of such details at length, would extend this opinion to a very great length without, perhaps, any corresponding added dignity or element of demonstrated truth as to the result. However, the discussion will unavoidably extend to considerable detail, though attempting to tie as closely as practicable to the real gist of the matter as indicated in the proposition stated.

Notwithstanding expressions here and there which would give rise to doubt if one were not grounded in the real philosophy of the law, courts in general hold, and this court has held, as we shall see in the course of this opinion, that neither any personal nor property right, in the broad sense of those terms, not even a status, or anything which can be the subject of rightful, private possession to enjoy, valuable in a pecuniary sense, or in promoting any fundamental right, except in case of a mere granted privilege, subject to be recalled by the terms of its acquirement, can be taken from its possessor against his will, without the due process of law of the Constitution,—a proceeding, judicial in character, characterized by the common-law safeguards against injustice,—unless some other procedure is provided by the written law. Why does that not apply to the right to hold and enjoy an office, with its honor and emoluments, to which one has been elected or appointed?

Counsel for respondents answer the foregoing in the negative, in part upon the theory that an office is not property, and therefore that the due process of law of the Constitution does not apply, and that such contention has support in State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior, 90 Wis. 612, 64 N. W. 304, where, it is said, Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 112, much relied on here by counsel for appellant, was not followed.

Much confusion, it seems, has arisen from a confusion of terms in the cases dealing with the subject under discussion. True, in the Starkweather Case, to show that one of a statutory removal tribunal is not disqualified because he is not so circumstanced as to be competent to exercise that judicial power conferrable only on courts after the manner of the common law, it was said that the power to remove public officers is not judicial, but administrative, to be exercised in a judicial manner, and that the right to an office is not property or a vested right,—evidently meaning, not property in the sense that it is not of such a nature that it cannot be taken away arbitrarily and except upon rendering just compensation, but may be taken upon any condensation of its bestowal. The opinion of the court, when carefully read, seems to express that idea very clearly. That is in perfect harmony with Dullam v. Willson, as will be seen, by a careful study of that case. There the power of removal for a cause specified in the written law, and established by investigation, and found by application of judgment to proof, was said to be judicial, and that such essentials, by necessary implication, and as plainly as if written into the law in unmistakable words, require the power to be exercised with all the common-law and ordinary safeguards, founded in natural justice, for the protection of private rights so required by the constitutional guaranty of due process of law,—hearing upon reasonable notice of time, place, and charges, and after the manner of fair judicial investigation. What was called judicial power in the one case was called administrative power exercised judicially, in the other,—the power generally denominated quasi judicial; and what was called property in one, because a valuable right of which one could not be deprived except in some manner constitutionally provided by law, was said not to be property in the other. It was thus said evidently to distinguish the right to an office from a thing which is subject to absolute ownership, and not for the purpose of expressing the idea that such right is not of any pecuniary value. On the real essentials, as regards this case, the Starkweather Case and Dullam v. Willson are in harmony. More will be said later in respect to the character of the power of removal, and the nature of the right to an office as regards whether classable as property or not, though, as we shall see, that is not very important in this case.

The broad principles of natural justice, which, as indicated, require hearing before condemnation, are older than this court or the courts of this country. They obtained here before the Revolution through grace of the sovereign, embodied in Magna Charta. "No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseised or outlawed or banished, or in any ways destroyed, nor will we pass upon him, nor will we send upon him, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land." It was incorporated into our fundamentals by the general declaration upon which the Constitution was grounded, and pervades in its spirit the whole instrument. It is inherent in the very system, as said by an eminent text writer. Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1938. No special guaranty was necessary, as in the 5th and 14th Amendments to the national Constitution, as regards the inviolability of liberty or property except by due process of law, and under the protection of the principle of equality before the law.

No court has dignified the ideas above expressed more constantly or conspicuously than our own, as we shall see in the course of this opinion. When we carefully analyze our adjudications, avoiding mere reference to any expressions here or there or a particular case, to fit a particular matter in hand, harmony will be found throughout, as what follows will indicate.

What is due process of law? There is nothing very technical about it when we view the subject broadly. Due process of law means, in brief, the law of the land,—including the unwritten law. It is simply that which must be followed in depriving anyone of anything which is his to enjoy until he shall have been devastated thereof by and according to the law of his country. Whether the proceedings relate to liberty or property in the technical sense, and be of a strictly judicial nature, or to mere privilege, immunity, status, or anything else of value, which commonly are of a quasi judicial nature, incidental to or as a part of administrative authority, and reviewable by courts as to jurisdictional matters, or, of a purely ministerial nature where the thing is a mere creature of the law granted upon condition of being so dealt with,—due process of law pervades and rules them all.

The mistake has influenced some courts, that due process of law calls for the interference of a court—judicial proceedings, in the technical sense,—and therefore that it only appertains to property in the sense of things of absolute ownership, things which may be bought and sold and passed by will or inheritance. By or according to the law of the land covers the whole field,—everything appertaining to right is to be dealt with according to law, administrative power, such with the concomitant of quasi judicial authority, legislative methods, judicial power in the technical sense,—each in its proper sphere,—is due process of law. In Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 481, 23 L. ed. 478, 479, in dealing with a fixed term of office and power of removal for cause, on appeal from the state court presenting questions similar to those discussed here, the test applied was whether a hearing had been afforded to the officer according to the essentials of the common law, except as the same might have been changed by statute, it being taken for granted that such was necessary in the absence of some clear, constitutional provision in the written law enacted to take its place. Due process of law is, as the court said approvingly "due course of legal proceedings according to the rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." It was not doubted there that the right to an office not terminable at the pleasure of some legislative agency is within the protection of the fundamental law and the methods established in the common law or expressly by statute, including the right of a fair hearing according to the principles of natural justice. The general effect of the decision, in harmony with the authorities in general, is that due process of law contemplates legal proceedings of the sort provided by the unwritten law, in case of there being no abrogation thereof by written law, but not necessarily confined to proceedings in courts.

Further illustrating the subject, the supreme court of Michigan in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Rich v. Jochim, 99 Mich. 359, 23 L.R.A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606, 58 N. W. 611, said, in effect: If one accepts office from which, by the law of the land, he is subject to be removed in any particular way, then deprivation that way is due process of law. If he takes an office which is in the power of the legislature to abolish, and he is thereby deprived of it, his removal is by due process of law.

The suggestion that the special guaranty as to liberty and property does not extend to the right to an office because it is not, strictly speaking, the one or the other, is far too narrow a view of the constitutional idea, as what has been said, sufficiently shows. The special guaranty, as phrased, was adopted, doubtless, as distinguished commentators have said, to cover in a particular way all that is included in the general declaration forming the substructure of all American Constitutions. Under the general and the special guaranties as well, no right of an individual, valuable to him pecuniarily or otherwise, can be justly taken away without its being done conformably to those principles of natural justice which afford due process of law and the equal protection of the laws,—a fair hearing and judgment upon evidence, unless the written law constitutionally otherwise provides. For emphasis, we reiterate this idea. The interference, as before indicated, may be by that quasi judicial authority which the legislature may delegate to an individual or a board, but whether the power be exercised by a court or a quasi judicial tribunal, unless otherwise clearly provided, the essential features are substantially the same.

That the protection of due process of law extends to rights, in the broadest sense of the term, has always been fully recognized here, and most significantly in State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 468, 107 N. W. 500. The court there said: "One of the fundamental principles of our system of government is that no one shall be condemned, as to his person or property, without due process of law. That is well within the letter, and manifestly within the spirit, of the 14th Amendment to the national Constitution, within our constitutional guaranty as to a firm adherence to the fundamental principles of justice (§ 22, art. 1, Wis. Const.) and that comprehensive, basic guaranty making the Constitution as a whole a recognition and pledge for the preservation of all [inherent rights, and especially] the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. . . . Due process of law does not mean merely according to the will of the legislature, or the will of some judicial or quasi judicial body upon whom it may confer authority. It means according to the law of the land, including the Constitution with its guaranties and the legislative enactments and rules duly made by its authority, so far as they are consistent with constitutional limitations. It excludes all mere arbitrary dealings with persons or property. It excludes all interference not according to the established principles of justice, one of the most worthy of them being the right and opportunity for a hearing, to meet opposing evidence and oppose with evidence, according to the established principles of fair investigation to determine the justice of the case, before judgment affecting personal or property rights shall be pronounced."

The foregoing only puts in another form the idea as phrased by the most eminent of our elementary expounders of the Constitution as to the scope of the constitutional guaranties. At §§ 1928 and 1950, Story on the Constitution, 5th ed. it is said: Due process of law "covers every right to which a member of the body politic is entitled under the law. The limbs are equally protected with the life, the right to the pursuit of happiness in any legitimate calling or occupation is as much guaranteed as the right to go at large and move about from place to place. . . . The word 'liberty' . . . implies the opposite of all those things which, besides the deprivation of life and property, were forbidden by the Great Charter. . . . None . . . [of our liberties] are to be taken away except in accordance with established principles; none can be forfeited except upon the finding of legal cause after due hearing."

It would seem that what was said by the court in the Chittenden Case should be considered a sufficient answer to any contention which is or could be now made, that the right to a public office, whether considered as property in the technical sense, or merely in the broader sense of a thing of value to the possessor, or just a right which the possessor is at liberty to possess and which is promotive of his legitimate desires and his happiness,—a right not within the field of property at all,—is under the protecting guaranty of the Constitution.

From the foregoing it will be seen that we must distinguish between an office held subject to summary right of removal for cause satisfactory to the removal officer or tribunal, and an office having the incidents of a fixed term, but subject to be terminated for due cause, or some particular cause, required to be established by proof. Due process of law in the one case may not require a common-law hearing, while it does in the other; that being supposed to have been in contemplation of the lawmaking power as an absolute requirement of the common law, and to be regarded as read into the statutes, in the absence of any ex-

The distinction mentioned is noted by all the text writers. For example: "The general rule is that where a definite term of office is not fixed by law, the officer or officers by whom a person was appointed to a particular office may remove him at pleasure, and without notice, charges, or reasons assigned. . . . It is conceded, in all the cases, that where a fixed term is assigned to the office, the appointing power has no absolute power of removal." Throop, Pub. Off. § 354. At common law in all cases except where an office is held absolutely at pleasure, "an officer could be removed only for cause and after a hearing." Throop, Pub. Off. § 362. "In this country, the rule is that where an officer holds his office for a certain number of years, 'if he shall so long behave himself well,' he cannot be removed, even for misbehavior, without notice and a hearing. So where he is appointed for a fixed term, and removable only for cause, he can be removed only upon charges, notice, and an opportunity to be heard," Throop, Pub. Off. § 364. To the same effect are Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 473; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454.

One might call the roll of all the highest courts of the country which have dealt with the subject in support of the foregoing. It is no exaggeration to say, as was said at the bar, that there is practical unanimity in the adjudications in this country in respect to the matter, that courts which started wrong have retraced their steps and taken a position in harmony with courts in general, and that the instances now and then where a court still stands in opposition are inconsequential,—so much that way as not to be entitled to any consideration whatever. Counsel for appellant have cited to our attention a large number of well-selected judicial authorities, a few of which, and some others, we will incorporate herein. People ex rel. Schumann v. McCartney, 34 App. Div. 19, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1047; Murdock v. Phillips Academy, 12 Pick. 244; United States ex rel. Turner v. Fisher, 222 U. S. 204, 56 L. ed. 165, 32 Sup. Ct. Willson*, 53 Mich. 392, 19 N. W. 112, 51 Am. Rep. 128.

For the better appreciation of the cited cases we will quote from a few of them.

In Page v. Hardin, while the power of removal was held exercisable by the governor, it was nevertheless said that the proceedings, in conformity with fundamental principles of justice, were required to be judicial in their general characteristics. "We shall not," said the court, "argue to prove that in a government of laws a conviction whereby an individual may be deprived of valuable rights and interests, and may, moreover, be seriously affected in his good fame and standing, implies a charge and trial . . . with the opportunity of defense and proof. . . . Such a proceeding for the ascertainment of fact and law, involving legal right, and resulting in a decision which may terminate the right, is essentially judicial, and has been so considered here and elsewhere."

This language, spoken for the court in State ex rel. Reid v. Walbridge, is particularly applicable here: "In the case presented, the power to remove the officer is 'for cause,' and no notice is mentioned as requisite to be given to the officer to be proceeded against. But the law, in accordance with the principles of justice,—principles which are fundamental and eternal,—will require that notice be given before any person be passed upon, either in person or estate or any other matter or thing to which he is entitled. And though the statutes do not in terms require notice, the law will imply that notice was intended. . . . And what the law will imply is as much part and parcel of a legislative 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) enactment as though set forth in terms. . . . Notice in this case . . . had been given and charges preferred, and this court, following the authorities elsewhere, has decided that even where the removal is 'for cause,' that still notice must be given. . . . But . . . if an officer be removed, it belongs to the courts to determine the sufficiency of the cause alleged."

Further on the same subject from People ex rel. Schumann v. McCartney, quoting from People ex rel. Kasschau v. Police Comrs.: "The relator . . . was not subject to removal except for some legal cause, to be ascertained and adjudged as matter of fact upon a hearing. . . . The proceeding was judicial in character, and hence the tribunal before which the investigation was had could not dispense with the usual form of procedure. . . . When a party is protected in the enjoyment of a public office . . . from removal except for cause to be ascertained and adjudged upon a hearing of a judicial nature, and it appears that he has been removed without any proof of the necessary facts upon oath, the determination . . . is clearly erroneous as matter of law."

And the court further said for the particular case: "The relator cannot be deprived of his position upon evidence satisfactory to the commissioner, unless that evidence is procured in the course of a judicial investigation, where the relator has been informed of the charge against him, and has had an opportunity of examining the witnesses against him, and of presenting evidence in his own behalf. On the hearing, at which the 'evidence satisfactory' to the commissioner was elicited, . . . the entire proceeding was a mere mockery of justice."

The following from Field v. Com. is peculiarly applicable: The court differentiated between Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet. 230, 10 L. ed. 138, where the circumstances did not exist as in this case, and those where such circumstances do characterize the subject, and observed as to the latter by quoting the language of Lord Campbell in Re Poole (Reg. v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 154), then said to be a late English case: "There could be no doubt his grace had acted most conscientiously, but . . . he had taken an erroneous view of the subject. . . . He was bound to hear the appeal, and he had not heard it. It was one of the first principles of natural justice that no man should be convicted without first being heard. . . . That had been the uniform principle on which this court, from the most ancient times, had acted; and he recollected hearing a very aged judge once say, and not irreverently that the Almighty and Omniscient Being would not condemn our first parents without their being heard. 32 L. T. 127."

The following is from the opinion of Justice Campbell in Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 409, 414, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 120, 123: "The action of all persons, official or private, which is in violation of constitutional rights, is simply null and void, and usually needs no reversal. . . . The fact, then, that the statute and the Constitution, in giving the governor power to remove, prescribe no methods of examination, can in no way relieve him from the necessity—even if he is to pass personally on the facts—of having specific charges of misconduct communicated to the officer, and established by proof, with full opportunity to the respondent to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and be heard on the facts and the law."

In People ex rel. Metevier v. Therrien, the point was urged upon the attention of the court, as in this case, that the act of the governor could not be inquired into, and the court replied: "The governor cannot foreclose the right of the courts to preserve to such officers their constitutional rights. . . . The right to hold this office is just as sacred in the eyes of the law to Metevier as the right to hold the property he has earned. It is a property right, and one of which he can only be deprived by a strict conformity to the statute." In other words, as the court said, by due process of law.

We have thus quoted at much length from authorities elsewhere, because our own court has not dealt with the subject under discussion very frequently, and not, perhaps, significantly, except as to the requisite in general of due process of law in order to deprive anyone of any valuable right, and that due process of law requires a common-law hearing, in the absence of a statute expressly or by necessary inference providing to the contrary, and that, it seems, was an emphatically declared in State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, as anywhere in the books. The early declaration on the subject by Dixon, Ch. J., in Seifert v. Brooks, 34 Wis. 443, may well be added: "That every man is entitled to his day in court, and must have it, and cannot be affected in his person or his property unheard or without the privilege secured to him of appearing or being represented in his own defense, if he so desires, is a maxim the force and importance of which every good lawyer appreciates, and one which no court ever surrenders."

Since some confusion has arisen, as before indicated, respecting whether a proceeding of the nature of that under consideration is judicial or administrative in character, all referable, it seems, to the remark in State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior, and repeated in State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748, and supposed by counsel for respondents to be applicable to this case, that the power is not judicial, but on the contrary is administrative, though required to be exercised in a judicial manner, we will give some further attention thereto, though, as said before, and must clearly appear upon principle and authority heretofore cited, it is essentially judicial, wanting only the circumstance of being exercisable by a court, and the different terms are merely different methods of describing the same thing. The better term to use is quasi judicial. That accurately describes the power. A brief review of the adjudications in this court will leave no room for doubt as to its judicial character, or but that the idea pressed upon us that it is administrative, so far as affecting the right of a common-law hearing under the removal statutes, is quite illogical. It is unfortunate that the various terms, judicial, quasi judicial, administrative, and administrative judicially exercised, have been used in some decisions while speaking about one and the same thing. Our own decisions are to the effect that any person or board required to determine any matter in public affairs requiring investigation, findings of fact upon proof, and the application of legal principles thereto, if not acting as a court, is acting as a tribunal in the exercise of quasi judicial power, the result being reviewable by the court as to all jurisdictional questions.

In State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254, the power of removal for due cause was held to require due cause in some reasonable view in the judgment of the court; that what constitutes due cause, in the ultimate analysis, is purely a judicial question. There, as here, counsel, to support the contrary, relied on Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513, in respect to the power exercised under the law respecting removals for cause, being so far removed from judicial character that the result was not reviewable by the courts. It was replied thereto that, within its jurisdiction, a removal body, competent to act for due cause, cannot be interfered with by the courts, but that what constitutes due cause is a judicial question; that to assign a cause and pronounce upon its existence is one thing, and whether the assigned cause answers to the call for due cause is wholly a legal question, to be determined, in the last analysis, by the courts; that the initial tribunal cannot make an innocent matter due cause by assigning it as such. There was the clearest of indication that a removal tribunal required to exercise discretion possesses judicial power in a proper sense, and that its determination as to all jurisdictional questions is a subject for review under the superintending control power of the courts.

In Randall v. State, 16 Wis. 340, 342, the court was more emphatic. Exercise of the governor's removal power was said to require him to act "in a judicial capacity,"—to "inquire into the truth of the charges, and examine into and weigh the effect of testimony. If the charges are sustained by satisfactory testimony, he can remove the delinquent officer and appoint another in his stead."

In Larkin v. Noonan, 19 Wis. 82, the court was still more emphatic, holding that the removal power of the governor is analogous to that exercised by a court in the trial of a case. "He is required," said the court, "to furnish the accused with a copy of the charges made against him, and give him an opportunity of being heard in his defense." True, in the particular case, a hearing was required by statute, but, as we have seen, and shall further see, that, by necessary implication, is written into every power of removal for cause which is required to be established by proof, especially in case of the office being for a fixed term. "This," continued the court, "involves as a consequence a trial,—a legal investigation into the truth of the charges. Witnesses may be subpoenaed, . . . sworn, and examined. Testimony must be taken, weighed, and considered. And although the proceeding is summary, and no trial by jury allowed, yet it conforms in important particulars to proceedings in judicial tribunals. If the charges are sustained by satisfactory testimony, the governor may remove the delinquent officer. If the charges are not proven, the officer must be acquitted. Hence, in the hearing of causes of this nature, the governor acts in a quasi judicial capacity, . . . and the proceeding is analogous, in its most essential features, to a judicial hearing and investigation."

In State ex rel. Getchel v. Bradish, 95 Wis. 205, 37 L.R.A. 289, 70 N. W. 172, the court further advanced,—stepping, perhaps, beyond safe boundaries, in holding a quasi judicial body to have such characteristics of a court that what would disqualify a judge to preside in the latter, and render a judgment void rendered therein, if it did, would have the same effect in case of a participant in a quasi judicial hearing,—applying that to a judgment forfeiting a privilege, and distinguishing the case from State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior. Thereafter it became necessary to limit that decision in order to produce harmony with the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Starkweather Case. Wood v. Chamber of Commerce, 119 Wis. 367, 96 N. W. 835; State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534, 100 N. W. 964. In doing so there was no attempt to limit it as regards the principle of Larkin v. Noonan, and, of course, no thought in any of the cases to change it.

So it is plain that the power of removal under § 970, stat., is judicial in character; it is of the same nature as the power called by the Michigan court in Dullam v. Willson "judicial," and it is misleading to differentiate between the term "judicial power" and "administrative power judicially exercised," they mean the same thing as applied to proceedings of the nature of those under consideration. To the same general effect are Gaertner v. Fond du Lac, 34 Wis. 497; Oshkosh v. State, 59 Wis. 425, 18 N. W. 324, and many other cases decided by this court, to which reference might be made.

VIIb.

Before proceeding to the last vital question involved in the resubmission, we will recur to the subject of whether the right to an office once obtained, with its honors and emoluments, is property in the constitutional sense. That is not essential to the solution of the final result, as we have seen, but it has been much argued both to support the idea that the due process of law feature of the Constitution does not include it, and the idea that removal proceedings are not judicial. The case might turn on those contentions if they were sustained. So it is manifestly appropriate, even though not necessary, to discuss the matter. Whenever, conceding for the case the result upon one proposition is not efficient, there is another thought to be decisive, and it is suggested for consideration, then its solution is legitimate and often advisable, though not necessary. Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103, may be mentioned as a good illustration. There the last of four alternatives has become, I venture the opinion, in the course of time, the most important of all, although it was long treated as mere obiter.

I marvel that, after the extraordinary pains taken by the fathers of our system to make its principles so broad as to encompass in its protecting folds every right of every character essential to or promotive of human liberty and happiness, there should be any attempt to narrow it by construction, instead of viewing them in the broad spirit which led to the Constitution. As said by commentators, it was not supposed, in the beginning, that anything in the nature of protection of private right from tyrannical aggression, other than the principles of the common law, was needed, so the general declared purpose of the effort to form a new government was included, and in the detail statement of principles the special guaranty as to private rights was omitted. The danger involved in that led, in the very beginning of the administration under the Constitution, to the addition of ten Amendments supposed to be broad enough to cover all such matters. That the intention was not to leave any of them out is most manifest. Among those added specific guaranties is that as to due process of law, and that other as to taking of property for public use without just compensation. Later, because of changed conditions giving rise to the thought that, possibly, the principles so definitely declared might, by some narrow construction, not be wholly efficient, the guaranty as to due process of law was repeated, amplified, so to speak, by guarantying against the making or enforcing any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and against denying to any person equal protection of the laws. When it came to forming our state Constitution, it was supposed that the safety of human rights was sufficiently provided for by the general declaration and the detail provisions associated therewith, emphasized by the significant admonishment as to the "importance of a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles." So no special guaranties were added, as has been the case in most state Constitutions.

Now, in contemplation of the industry thus exercised to afford protection to the individual from injustice of any sort, can it be possible it was thought the terms "liberty" and "property" would not include more than freedom from unjust physical restriction and things subject to be bought and sold, or stop short of freedom for one to possess anything and to enjoy it as property, if valuable in any sense, which may lawfully administer to his reputable desires and happiness? Why stop with tangible things,—things subject to transfer and measurement accurately in money? If a thing has a pecuniary value or a real value to its possessor, it seems it has a property element in the constitutional sense, and freedom to enjoy it is liberty in a broad sense. I think it is dealing with technicalities to restrict "property" so as to exclude the right to an office, once acquired, until deprived of it by law,—acquired, perhaps, by years of effort in preparation for its duties, and by the legitimate expenditure of money. We may adhere to all that was said in State ex rel. Starkweather v. Super- rior and State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748, that it is not a vested property right. Certainly it is not,—in that, by the very terms of its bestowal, it is subject to be taken away, and has neither assignable nor inheritable features; but it has a pecuniary value, and that is sufficient. The framers of the Constitution did not intend any narrow conception of the terms "liberty" and "property." They intended, as all history shows, directly and circumstantially, to include everything valuable to the individual as regards the dominant right to the pursuit of happiness.

I think the disposition, on the one hand, to take the broad view above indicated, and on the other, to take a narrow view which would minimize the scope of the constitutional guaranties, and the tendency of some judicial writers to combat principle with mere argument in reaching for logic to support a decision which needs no support, but some elementary principle, as would be seen by searching for it, instead of relying on argument rather than on thinking, has caused unfortunate confusion. That, I think, will be quite well illustrated before I close this discussion.

If I do not accomplish anything more in this treatment, I hope to remove anything like confusion as regards the terms under consideration in our own decisions, and demonstrate the position of our court on the side of the broad progressive view of the Constitution which renders its principles, as was intended, adaptable to the protection and conservation of every right which concerns legitimate human welfare. Many distinguished courts have referred to an office as property, while others, and a minority, I think, hold that an office, or the right to an office, often confusing the two terms, is not property. Many text writers have added to the general confusion. It cannot well be said that both sides have used the term "property" in the same sense. There must be some line of harmony. Where is it? That is the question. To find it, and bring it into sufficient significance to pervade even here, so it will not be thought there is any want of harmony between the various expressions used, or between them and the court's general conception of constitutional principles as found in its definitions, is sufficient to warrant this effort.

An examination of the decisions leads to the conviction that, in the early instances of controversy over the right to deprive one of an office, either by legislative abolishment of the place or by removal under the written law, it was said in support of a decision sustaining the deprivation, that the thing involved was not property or a vested right of property, and so it could be taken away. In support of a determination that the due process of law feature of the Constitution applies to the deprivation of office, it came to be frequently said that the thing is property because it is of pecuniary value. In support of the contrary theory, and that the power to remove an officer for cause is not judicial, it was said that an office, or the right to an office, is not property,—though not venturing to say that it is not a thing of value to its possessor. Where an effort was made in the initial stages of the confusion, to support the latter view by something in the nature of logic, it was said that the thing is not property because not subject to absolute vestment, and to be bought and sold and pass by inheritance. And again, that it is a mere agency, terminable by choice of the agent, or by legislative will, and has no element of gain except contingent upon service previously rendered. The teaching of the old masters of the law, Coke and Blackstone, that the right to an office and to take the emoluments thereof is property, has been carelessly, it seems, brushed aside by the mere statement that conditions under which they wrote were different than those existing under our system; that the distinction renders that which was formerly properly denominated property not so now,—the feature generally referred to being that an office then was a hereditament, while it has no such element now. That demonstrated the very extreme of argument based on false logic, sometimes indulged in as an easy method of constructing a basis for an ultimate conclusion to be pronounced. It often happens, where the superstructure is suspended upon mere assertion at first, and then there is effort to create a support in reason, that the reason is more the product of desire than of principle. That is well illustrated when we refer to the text of Blackstone, and see that the right to an office and to take its emoluments—not the office contemplated as a place—was denominated property, and not necessarily with reference to any of its features which some judicial writers have said rendered it then of a property nature, but not now. Blackstone divided property into tangible and such intangible things, or incorporeal things, “as can neither be seen or handled,” creatures of the mind, and existing only in contemplation. All were classed under the broad term “property,” and not necessarily because they were subjects of traffic. 2 Cooley’s Bl. Com. 37. In the details as to the intangible class of property we find an almost boundless field. It extends to substantially everything of any value, pecuniary or otherwise, to the individual,—including the “right to exercise an office and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging.” It was said that was classable, as within the intangible sphere, because one might have an estate, that is, a right, therein, among other things, “for a term of years or during pleasure only,” “though no public office, in general, is a subject of sale.” 2 Bl. Com. 37. Thus, the word “estate” was used in the broad sense of a rightful possession at pleasure, for life, or for years, upon conditions subsequent or without condition, and property was regarded as including everything with it in the broad sense of the term, whether tangible, or intangible and only existing in contemplation of the senses, if valuable to the person in any sense. Who can doubt but that this conception was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution while they were not in the peril of seeking information from an unreconcilable undigested mass of judicial sayings,—just had the teachings of the old philosophers of the law for their guidance.

Thus, the efforts to give support to the idea that the right to an office is not property seems futile. They originated in such an early case as Connor v. New York, 5 N. Y. 285, to sustain the right of the legislature to deal with an office regardless of the will of the officer. It was followed in Donahue v. Will of County, 100 Ill. 94, to sustain the position that the right to an office is not under the protection of due process of law. That case is cited by most text writers, while conceding, by the reasoning, that a distinction must be made between an office and the right to an office, and that many courts hold that the latter is essentially property. Throop, Pub. Off. § 18. In Wammack v. Holloway, 2 Ala. 31, the court said that the right to an office is “as much a species of property as any other thing capable of being held or owned,” citing Blackstone and Bacon. It is no less property now than in the olden times, because it is not a “hereditament.”

In Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 730, 5 N. E. 347, that view was adopted, upon the elementary principle that an office is of pecuniary value to its possessor, and that, having such value, in the broad sense, it is property. Andrews, J., speaking for the court, said: “The right to hold an office,” till terminated by lawful methods, “is as perfect as the title to real and personal property.” It is not “property in the sense that chattels or lands are property of the owner.” But “an office has a pecuniary value, although primarily it is an agency for public purposes.”

To the same effect are People v. Wells, 2 Cal. 198, 203; State ex rel. Childs v. Wadhams, 64 Minn. 318, 324, 67 N. W. 64; People ex rel. Metevier v. Therrien, 80 Mich.

187, 196, 45 N. W. 78; State ex rel. Jennett v. Owens, 63 Tex. 261; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 1, 17, 25 Am. Dec. 677; Plimpton v. Somers, 33 Vt. 283; State ex rel. Police Comrs. v. Pritchard, 36 N. J. L. 101; Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 672; Com. ex rel. Bowman v. Slifer, 25 Pa. 28, 64 Am. Dec. 680; King v. Hunter, 65 N. C. 603, 6 Am. Rep. 754; Balling v. Board of Excise, 79 N. J. L. 197, 74 Atl. 277, and many other cases that might be referred to.

By an examination of a large number of cases where the contrary of the foregoing is suggested, we find little attempt to review the line of authorities cited, and no instance where the real nature of the right was vital to the case. That it is not property in the sense of the right thereto being protected by the guaranty against deprivation of property without just compensation may be freely admitted. That it is a right held upon condition subsequent may be freely admitted. Why was not right to deprive one of an office referred to that condition,—which was a perfectly logical reason,—instead of to the illogical one that it is not a property right in any sense? In many jurisdictions it is found that the right has been, at times, spoken of as property, and at others as not property. Many of the citations made to support the position of the nonproperty idea do not deal with the matter at all, as for example we find State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496, and State ex rel. Willis v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610, cited over and over again. They do not mention the matter, and, when rightly understood, they have not the remotest bearing thereon. They are merely to the effect that a legislative office is subject to be taken away according to the conditions inhering in the right when it was bestowed and accepted.

That is the logical basis for all to rest upon. Subject to termination of the right by due process of law, it is property.

In view of the foregoing it seems best that the broad view of the terms "liberty" and "property," as it must have been entertained in the beginning, should prevail, instead of restricting it for the purpose of supporting the idea of control over legislative office, which needs no support but the simple one that the person who takes such a thing at the hands of the people does so with the condition subsequent inhering in the right. Nothing but that need have been referred to in sustaining the decision in any of the cases where the nonproperty idea was adopted.

So we may safely bring together the apparently conflicting ideas. An office, as a place, is not property. The right to hold an office and to take its emoluments until deprived thereof upon condition subsequent—due process of law—is property, in the broad sense which includes everything of every nature, tangible, intangible, corporeal, or incorporeal, valuable, pecuniarily or otherwise, to its possessor. In the sense incorporated into the fundamental guaranties, it is property; but as a thing which may be bought and sold, and one may have an absolute estate in which cannot be taken away by the state without his consent or the rendering of just compensation, it is not property. We may adhere firmly to the doctrine that it is not a property right in the technical sense, or the right to hold an office a vested property right, in the sense of ownership without being subject to conditions, divestment according to law without compensation to the divestee; but the latter sense will be found, in my opinion, immaterial to the disposition of any question which may arise. It has no necessary connection with the public right to terminate an office, or to deal with a mere privilege, even as in State ex rel. Getchel v. Bradish, granted subject to conditions subsequent express or implied; while the broader view may be vital in many cases, since the effort to narrow it in all cases is directed, in effect, to the weakening of constitutional guaranties.

The result is, it seems, that, for all the purposes of this case, even if the result were to depend upon it, the right to an office and to take its emoluments is property, as much as anything of value which anyone could be possessed of subject to contingencies by which it might be taken from him, and that the right cannot be constitutionally violated except according to the law of the land.

From what has preceded it remains to be seen whether the common-law right as to the manner of exercising the power of removal of an officer having a fixed term, for cause established by proof, from his position, was abrogated by § 970, statutes, as to officers therein mentioned. If not, it must be considered, as authorities already referred to abundantly show, as part of the statute.

The repeal of the common law may be express or implied. That there was no express repeal in this case is indisputable. Whether there was an implied repeal depends upon construction. Therefore some rules for construction are important.

One of the cardinal rules for construction of a statute, especially where it affects private rights, when so obscure as to require the meaning to be read out of it by construction, is that it should be viewed favorable to continuation of the common law rather than as a repeal of it, where there is a permissible choice between the two. Another such rule is that we may look to the whole of the act of which that to be construed forms a part, to the conditions to be dealt with from the standard of the lawmakers at the origin of the enactment, the history of the legislation, especially in case of its adoption from another state, and the more, in case of its having been judicially construed there before adoption here, and, further, the effects and consequences.

In view of those rules, courts in general as we have already seen, hold that the common-law manner of proceedings, said to be grounded in the principles of natural—of eternal—justice, must be held to be still in force, in the absence of either an express repeal of it, or a repeal by very clear, or as sometimes said necessary, inferences. That the repeal must be very plain, the discussion which has preceded amply demonstrates.

So it seems, if the argument of counsel for respondents, on the theory that a repeal of the common law is fairly inferable from the statute, be conceded, it is far from sufficient. But it hardly seems just or reasonable to say of the statute that something not in its letter is there in spirit, which would be such an invasion of the most cherished of all common-law rights,—the right of a fair hearing upon fair notice, and with ordinary safeguards to prevent injustice, before one is passed upon in his personal or property rights,—the one above all other essential to safeguard against aggression and oppression. No court heretofore has ventured to say that, or attempted to do so. Courts have often been pressed to do so, in support of authority claimed to exist under circumstances the same and similar to those we now have to deal with, but never, so far as we can discover, in any significant instance, with success.

If there is nothing else to produce the conclusion that the legislature did not intend to abrogate the constitutional safeguard, the very consequences of the contrary would justify, yea require, searching in the obscurity, if obscurity exists, for some meaning which would avoid the peril. The fact that a very good despot may make the very best of governments, and that the peril suggested is so very remote that the thought of it should not have efficiency does not meet the case. Experience has shown, how very fair men lose their balance and become unsafe in times of great public excitement; that then their acts often do not so much "wait upon their judgment" as upon the passions, the prejudices, the selfishness, the ambitions, and intoxication of place. Hence, the importance of that wise admonition: "The blessings of a free government can only be maintained by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles." There is no more important of such principles than the one that private rights should be guarded, so far as feasible, beyond even the possibility of arbitrary unjust interference, and, to that end, that all the checks upon abuse of power and balance between powers found in the Constitution, read in the light of the unwritten rules of natural justice, should be maintained in all their integrity, and with all the "vigilance" which the experience of the past has taught "is the price of liberty."

The causes suggested above were deemed by the Michigan court in Dullam v. Willson, to compel rejection of the theory of implied statutory repeal in such circumstances as we have here. We can no better point what has been said than by quoting this language of that court: "The exercise of such power, in such manner, would be too despotic for any attempt at vindication in a country which boasts of the utmost liberty compatible with the safety of the state, and is entirely opposed to the genius of free institutions. . . . If it exists it places it in the power of the governor, at his mere will or caprice, to remove all the state officers, except legislative and judicial, and to fill their places with his own partisans, thus revolutionizing the whole administration of the state. . . . It is no argument to say it may never be done. It is sufficient to know that it could be done. . . . The impossibility of sustaining the governor's action here . . . appears by comparing its necessary results with the rest of our constitutional scheme of government. If he could remove respondent as he did, . . . every officer of the government may be removed as soon as the legislature adjourned, and every office can be filled by the governor's nominees and the whole elective system will be annulled."

There are many authorities to the same effect. A good selection of them appears in appellant's brief: "If the intention of the legislature is clear, the courts, as in duty bound, will give it effect, but if it is doubtful, the doubt will be resolved against the existence of arbitrary power, and in favor of a trial before judgment." People ex rel. Maloney v. Douglass, 195 N. Y. 145, 87 N. E. 1070.

"It is a dangerous principle to imply power when it is not conferred by legislative authority in clear and distinct terms." People ex rel. Brown v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 355. Other courts have spoken in the same way in support of the view that a repeal of the common-law safeguards in such a situation as the one under discussion requires clear, express legislative action or its equivalent. The books are replete with such illustrations as are given. This is so manifest that we will not refer further to authorities for support. It may safely rest upon principle and logic, which speak more efficiently than the language of judges or the circumstances of cases.

Turning now to the history of the statute, it is this: The system embodied therein, if it did not originate, existed, in New York, when the work was done for adoption here prior to 1849. It was incorporated into the revision of that year at chapter 11. Doubt was expressed on the argument whether it came directly from the New York model, article 4, title 6, chap. 5, Rev. Stat. of N. Y. 1836, or indirectly, being copied from chapter 15, Rev. Stat. Mich. 1846; but we see little, if any, reason for doubting the former. The phraseology and general arrangement follows much more closely, and the ideas as well, the New York than the Michigan statutes. Moreover, it is almost certain there was little acquaintance with the latter when the work was done here. The time between the two was brief. There was a later revision in New York (1846), but the time was too brief between its promulgation and the work here to afford opportunity for familiarity.

The general scheme of Michigan was doubtless taken from New York. All features—particularly provision for exercising the power of removal without specifying the manner of executing the power being associated with sections as to minor offices containing such specification—are in the Michigan statute, much the same as in ours. That feature was referred to by counsel for respondents in support of the view that a repeal of the common law was intended. That was the condition when the Michigan court dealt with the subject of removals in Dullam v. Willson. True, the statute was then declared unconstitutional upon the theory that it contemplated exercise of judicial power, and the governor had no such power under the Constitution when the statute was enacted, and it was not validated subsequent to the grant of such power. In that the court failed to do what this court, and courts in general before and since, have done, distinguish between quasi judicial power which may be delegated to tribunals other than courts, and appreciate that judicial power of the express words of the Constitution, the power to redress and prevent wrong, which at common law was lodged wholly in courts. State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 468, 107 N. W. 500. The real essentials of exercise of the power as decided by the Michigan court were not governed by whether exercisable by a court or a quasi judicial tribunal, but by the nature of the power itself. After the adoption of the amendment to the Michigan Constitution, clothing the governor with power to exercise the function of removing officers for cause, he was still not a court, but a quasi judicial tribunal. There was no specific delegation of judicial power, but merely delegation of power to do the thing which in its very nature was said by the court to be of judicial character. That was called the conference of judicial power.

From what has been said it is evident that all the Michigan court said in Dullam v. Willson as to the necessity for a common-law hearing in executing a power like the one in question would have occurred just the same had the statute on the subject of removals been held valid. It was just as applicable to the statute as to the constitutional provision. It related to the nature of the power, and not to the manner of expressing it. That shows, by necessary inference, that the idea did not receive any favor at all that a part of a system of statutes phrased like ours, even when associated with other parts providing for manner of exercising the power, could be properly read as inferentially repealing the common-law method of dealing with rights. On the contrary, such idea was most emphatically repelled.

Recurring to the New York statutes, which like ours contain the association of provisions above referred to, it does not seem to have been supposed there before adoption of the plan here, or thereafter, that the common-law method of exercising the power had been repealed by the statute. Had it been so supposed, it is quite certain some evidence thereof could be discovered. The indications are all to the contrary. Counsel for respondents seem to have failed to find any favorable to their contention, and we have been likewise unsuccessful. They cite many cases under different statutes and applicable to different conditions which make for a plausible argument, but come far short of making such a clear case as would warrant the belief that the legislature, in such a very important field, intended to repeal the common law.

It is useless to review in detail the citations by respondents' counsel in support of their contention. We will refer especially only to the three relied upon from our own jurisdiction. They are the best of all, particularly because of inclination to follow closely our own decisions in case of the court having spoken upon the particular subject.

First in order is State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496. The statute there concerned the removal of a minor county officer. It was a special statute dealing only with the administration of affairs in Milwaukee as to the inspector of the house of correction. It provided that "said board shall also appoint one inspector for said house of correction, who shall be the principal keeper of said house of correction, and who shall hold his office for the term of two years, commencing on the first Monday of January succeeding his appointment, unless sooner removed by said board for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to said board. The cause of such removal shall be particularly assigned in writing, and entered upon the minutes of said board, with the ayes and noes upon the adoption of the vote for such removal."

Note that the officer was made expressly subject to removal for specified cause, conditioned only upon "the cause of such dismissal being particularly assigned in writing and entered upon the minutes of such board, with the ayes and noes upon the adoption of the vote for such removal,"—indicating, pretty clearly, that the legislature contemplated only such protection of the officer and the public against abuse of the removal power, as would be afforded by record affording a judicial review if desired as to whether the assigned cause was one within the statute. Emphasis was put by the court on the phrase "satisfactory to said board," and the necessity for the jurisdictional feature to be complied with. The decision turned on those features,—thought to show a clear legislative intent that the officer should hold his place wholly subject to the judgment of the county board respecting any matter rendering him unsuitable for the place. The nature of the office, the broad power to deal therewith, in good faith, wholly in the discretion of the board, conditioned merely upon making the required record, settled the matter as to what the legislature intended, in the judgment of the court. Rightly understood it seems the case throws little or no light in respondents' favor on the question under discussion. It has been cited over and over again elsewhere, without appreciating that it does not announce any general principle broader than this: When a power of summary removal without notice or hearing is clearly given by the written law, notice and hearing after the manner of the common law are not required. Much improper use has been made of this case both by text writers and courts.

Next we have State ex rel. Willis v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610. That involved power of a county board to remove its clerk "when, in their opinion, he is incompetent to execute properly the duties of his office, or when, on charges and evidence, it shall appear to said board that he has been guilty of official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty, if, in the opinion of said board, such misconduct or habitual or wilful neglect shall be a sufficient cause for removal."

All the statutory steps requisite to execution of the power seem to have been followed. Nevertheless the trial court reviewed the judgment of the board upon its merits, taking evidence, and reversed the board's order.

This court found no jurisdictional defects. The proof of the charge was of such nature that the board, as matter of course, could take judicial notice of it, so to speak, as a court in general can of matters in its own official record. The cases showed that the board acted upon the refusal to satisfy all the conditions of its records. There was no question but that a statutory cause was assigned, and that the evidence to support that cause was before the board, and all rights to which the officer was entitled had been accorded him. This court necessarily reversed the circuit court upon the ground that, since the county board did not commit any jurisdictional error, and acted upon its "opinion" with the facts before it, as it was expressly empowered to do by the statute, its decision was final. We are unable to see why counsel for respondents see anything in the case, as it appears in the published report, or aided by the briefs used on presentation of the case here, which in any way affects the question in hand in favor of respondents.

The last case is State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748. That involved a removal under the civil service law as to state employees having more or less of an official status. The power was given to the appointing officer to remove "for just cause," the act of removal to be characterized by his furnishing the person removed "his reasons for the same, and allow him a reasonable time in which to make an explanation. The reasons for removal and the answer thereto shall be filed in writing with the commission." The statute, as will be seen by its very language, repelled the idea that any notice or opportunity for a hearing before removal was contemplated by the legislature. The case was clearly of the same class as State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, which was cited in support of the decision. The various citations in the opinion are merely to the point that, when an officer or body is given power to act by the exercise of judgment in a quasi judicial way, whatever he does, acting within that jurisdiction is final though he may err in judgment,—a very familiar rule. Thus the statute in the Dahl Case is very unlike the one before us.

The New York model, as before indicated, empowered the governor to remove any of a specified class of officers, saying nothing whatever as to the manner of administering the power. While as to a class of officers having to do with handling of public moneys, the most summary power of removal was given to the governor "in case it shall appear to him, on the report of the comptroller, that such treasurer or other officer has, in any particular, wilfully violated his duty." Note the words, "appear to him." In this the peril of having a person, after having shown unfitness for handling public moneys, in place at all, was appreciated. The statute dealt with a class of situations requiring prompt action,—not waiting for anything except the report of the officer who, from his position, would most likely be correctly advised of the incompetence.

The feature aforesaid of the New York statute was adopted here in § 7 of the 1849 statute. There was no change except such as was necessary to adapt it to difference in conditions. There was no such office here to conserve the interests of the state in respect to its finances as comptroller. The feature made prominent in the New York statute by the words, "appear to him on the report of the comptroller," was preserved with like prominence by the words "may be removed by the governor in case it shall appear to him on sufficient proofs," etc.

Substantially all the officers mentioned in the next section of our act of 1849 were, by the New York act, made removable by the senate on the recommendation of the governor,—no specification as to cause being made. That was there associated with another section giving the governor power to remove any officer appointed by him, no requirement being made as to cause or manner of executing the power. That scheme was changed for our system as to a class of officers, including the one in question, making them, for specified causes, subject to be "removed by the governor upon satisfactory proof," while counsel for respondents argue that there is no difference between the terms "in case it shall appear to him on sufficient proof," in the section which deals with officers with respect to which the public interests would naturally require quick action, and the term "upon satisfactory proof," in respect to officers where no such harsh action would be likely to be necessary, still our judgment is not convinced. The latter class of officers includes important positions of public as well as private interests. Time would naturally be required for investigation, deliberation, and the careful application, in a judicial way, of judgment to proof, in case of executing the powers of removal as is customarily required in the exercise of such powers, and was required, quite universally, at the time of the adoption of the statute as to important officers. For those the term was fixed: "Be removed by the governor upon satisfactory proof." We cannot escape the conclusion that a different method of executing the power may have been intended as to the first class than the second. True, it is the governor, in the one case, as a tribunal who is to be satisfied in any event; but why did the legislature use the term confining the opinion specifically to the governor in one case, and inferentially in the other? Does it not seem that their purpose was to distinguish between mere personal opinion in the former, and the distinctly judicial or tribunal opinion in the latter? Must we not assume that such a change of significant words had some definite purpose, especially in case of a statute carefully prepared, as this was, by a specialist, and adopted without change to provide a comprehensive system dealing with various situations? There were ten sections in all, relating to the subject of removals, the same number as in the New York statute. It seems that the legislature attached some considerable significance to the difference in phraseology between the two sections. At least, the legal presumption that one section was enacted in special contemplation of its being supplemented by common-law requirements, so that, in the removal proceedings, a record would be made and the decision would be distinctly that of a quasi judicial tribunal, instead of a personal opinion, is much strengthened by the peculiar difference in phraseology between the two sections. In this we do not intend to decide that the common-law feature of a removal procedure was repealed,—even as to the first class of officers dealt with.

The result of our study of the statute which has been told in the foregoing, quite briefly, considering the labor put upon the question, is that we cannot see in it any implied repeal of the common-law requirement for administering the power granted. If we could indulge in the premise with which the learned counsel for respondents started, that the repeal should or may be found if it be fairly inferable, and proceed to the end uninfluenced by "effects and consequences," the rather striking difference between the two sections, and the dignity which the foundation principles of the common law and of the Constitution as regards protection of property and personal rights against aggression and spoliation should have, must have, in dealing with such a subject, we might discover the legislative intent in the statute which the learned counsel so ably contended for in the printed argument and at the bar. But we cannot start or proceed along a process of reasoning with our eyes blinded to the obstacles mentioned, which, in the whole, very clearly preserve the common-law requirement, respecting the execution of the power granted, as part and parcel of the statutes, as plainly as if incorporated therein. While, because of the importance of the case and the earnestness with which this particular phase of it was pressed upon our attention, it has received as much care as if it were really an original matter, it is not. The result reached follows elementary principles laid down by the most learned writers after long judicial experience. For example, Judge Dillon (2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. 480): "The proceeding in all cases where the motion is for cause is adversary or judicial in its character, and if the organic law of the corporation is silent as to the mode of procedure, the substantial principles of the common law as to proceedings affecting private rights must be observed."

VIII.

Thus we have seen the governor, under § 970, Stat., is a quasi judicial tribunal, exercising administrative with added judicial functions, and his acts are, to a certain extent, reviewable by the courts under "supervisory control power,"—the power as to circuit courts being conferred by § 8, art. 7, of the Constitution. State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden; People ex rel. New York v. Nichols, 79 N. Y. 582. An officer exercising such power necessarily, as we have seen, acts in a quasi judicial capacity, and the matter of procedure must be of a quasi judicial character, and as the officer is an inferior tribunal, as such he must be amendable to the court when acting in excess of the jurisdiction conferred. As other courts have said, it is of little consequence what name is given to the power. The name cannot relieve it of its essential character. Neither this nor any of the numerous authorities go further than to hold that excess of jurisdiction is jurisdictional; that want of full opportunity to be heard according to settled requirements for the protection of private rights is jurisdictional; that cause for removal within those prescribed by statute, where it covers the subject, is jurisdictional, and that proof to establish the claim is also jurisdictional,—all in harmony with the decisions of this court.

To preserve logical order of decision, the scope of superintending control power as regards quasi judicial tribunals may well 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be restated here. It is no different when the governor acts as the tribunal than in any other case. His competency to exercise the power is one thing, and exercise of it in a particular case without the conditions precedent thereto is another. The former is legal, while the latter is not. Such a tribunal may have jurisdiction of certain subjects, but that alone does not give competency to act in any particular instance. There must be jurisdiction of the kind of subject. That, in general, is referable to the written law. There must also be jurisdiction of the parties and the particular matter, obtained as provided by the written law in case of provision being made therein, otherwise by the unwritten law. Having acquired jurisdiction in the particular instance, in proceeding to and inclusive of the finality, the tribunal must keep within its jurisdiction. Full exercise of the power involves application of honest judgment—reasonably fair human judgment—to the situation in hand to and inclusive of the close. No one with competency to act can properly do so in an arbitrary, unreasonable manner, or beyond the scope of the authority. Action within the power is exercise of legal discretion. Action outside of it is not exercise of such discretion as the law permits, but is abuse of it. In the former field, errors, regardless of how numerous, are merely judicial, and not the subject of review before any court. In the latter field, errors are jurisdictional, the acts those of usurpation, and result void,—subject to be challenged directly as such by writ of certiorari or any other proper judicial instrumentality, or treated as void, collaterally. It forms no bar to the object of a proceeding either by way of attack or defense.

Thus the proceedings of our quasi judicial tribunals are subject to the superintending control judicial power, which extends to preventing usurpation, coercing activity without acting upon the judgment as to how to act, keeping the tribunal within its jurisdiction, and correcting excesses of it. This broad field of activity, as is apparent, does not invade at all the doctrine that the discretionary acts of such a tribunal are not the subject of judicial review. There can be no discretionary acts except within the discretionary field. The extent of it is overstepped when the boundary of jurisdiction is passed. Entrance there is into a forbidden field, and all acts therein are, as indicated, violations of law and void.

The doctrine stated is elementary, though its emphatic restatement at this time, and even reiterations of it for purpose of emphasis, seem appropriate to the case under its peculiar circumstances. Such doctrine has been applied here in a great variety of situations, as the following significant instances will show: Milwaukee Iron Co. v. Schubel, 29 Wis. 444, 9 Am. Rep. 591; State ex rel. Moreland v. Whitford, 54 Wis. 150, 11 N. W. 424; State ex rel. Wood County v. Dodge County, 56 Wis. 79, 13 N. W. 680; State ex rel. Heller v. Lawler, 103 Wis. 460, 79 N. W. 777; State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 189, 62 L.R.A. 700, 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332; State ex rel. Augusta v. Losby, 115 Wis. 57, 90 N. W. 188; State ex rel. N. C. Foster Lumber Co. v. Williams, 123 Wis. 61, 100 N. W. 1048; State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 468, 517, 107 N. W. 500.

These cases amply illustrate that the dividing line between the field of judicial review of decisions of a quasi judicial tribunal, and that of immunity therefrom, is the one between error in the exercise of discretion and error in assuming the right to exercise it when it does not exist at all, or exists to be exercised in the particular way or under the particular circumstances. As said in State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, to appreciate the foregoing, there must be a proper conception of the significant distinction between judicial error by a court proceeding according to the course of the common law, and such error by a mere tribunal exercising quasi judicial authority. "In the former, jurisdiction of the party and subject-matter being established, the determination cannot be successfully challenged for such error, though the basic questions of fact rest upon insufficient evidence, or have no foundation whatever therein." To that broad scope, such tribunal, under such circumstances, has jurisdiction to commit error, while in the latter, where findings of fact must be based on evidence, a determination without evidence, or not warranted by the evidence in any reasonable view of it, is "a clear violation of law in reaching a result within the power of the tribunal to reach, proceeding properly, [and] is jurisdictional error. In the former, the evidence is not reviewable at all. In the latter, it may be reviewed, but only to the extent of determining whether there is evidence upon which the tribunal could reasonably . . . have reached the conclusion which it did. . . . In the first a conclusion without any credible evidence to support it, or any evidence at all, is mere judicial error. In the second, want of credible evidence, which, in case of the verdict of a jury, would be sufficient upon appeal to require a reversal, is jurisdictional error; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The power of supervisory control in the situation suggested may be used in many ways to secure an adjudication as to the void act. It may be dealt with directly by either of the jurisdictional writs, or indirectly, in peculiar circumstances, by injunction, or treated as void where, in passing, it would otherwise bar the way to any legitimate act. The following cases illustrate all those phases: Lutheran Evangelical Church v. Gristgau, 34 Wis. 328; State ex rel. Metevier v. Therrien, 80 Mich. 187, L.R.A. (N.S.) 916, 109 N. W. 628; Speed v. Detroit, 98 Mich. 360, 22 L.R.A. 842, 39 Am. St. Rep. 555, 57 N. W. 406; People ex rel. Metevier v. Therrien, 80 Mich. 187, 45 N. W. 78; People ex rel. New York v. Nichols, 79 N. Y. 582; State ex rel. Denison v. St. Louis, 90 Mo. 19, 1 S. W. 757; Poyntz v. Shackelford, 107 Ky. 546, 54 S. W. 855; State ex rel. Reid v. Walbridge, 119 Mo. 383, 41 Am. St. Rep. 663, 24 S. W. 457.

Thus, upon principle and authority, in this form of action, or any other, where the matter becomes material, all questions which go to the validity of the decision may be considered, and such decision affirmed or reversed according to whether jurisdictional error was committed or not. All other questions are foreclosed by the exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal. In Speed v. Detroit it was said, no matter how the question comes up, the thing forming the subject of the controversy being vital, it would be a reproach to the law if courts were so infirm as to be obliged to treat it as valid, or even voidable. The void act being the result of excess of jurisdiction of a quasi judicial tribunal, it is of very little consequence how its validity may be challenged, whether directly or indirectly.

There is no principle more sanctified by time and universality than the foregoing. As applied to the circumstances here, the language of Lord Campbell in Ex parte Ramshay, 18 Q. B. 173, has been regarded as among the classics, and it is found quoted over and over again as expressing the rule in the absence of some unmistakable written law to the contrary: "This instrument [the order of removal] is not absolutely conclusive. . . . The exercise of the authority to dismiss from the office . . . is subject to the control of this court. . . . We may presume that the chancellor has duly exercised his jurisdiction till the contrary is proved. But we think that it would have been open to Mr. Ramshay to show that he was removed without notice of any charges against him, or without an opportunity of his being heard in his defense, or that no evidence was adduced to support the charges or that the complaints against him were not for inability or misbehavior in his office, and were of such a nature that, if proved or admitted, they could not disqualify him for his office," within the meaning of the act of parliament. "The chancellor has authority to remove a judge of a county court only on the implied condition prescribed by the principles of eternal justice. . . . He cannot legally act upon such an occasion without some evidence being adduced to support the charges. . . . Where the party complained against has a fair opportunity of being heard, where the charges if true amount to inability or misbehavior [within the meaning of the law], and where evidence has been given in support of them, we think we cannot inquire into the amount of evidence or the balance of evidence, the chancellor, acting within his jurisdiction, being the constituted judge upon this subject."

The jurisdictional requisites were phrased by Chief Justice Shaw in Murdock v. Phillips Academy, 12 Pick. 244, about this way:

(1) Citation to the officer to appear and reasonable time therefor; (2) notice to him of the charges to be answered; (3) reasonable time assigned for proofs; (4) liberty of counsel to defend his cause and except to proofs and witnesses; (5) conclusion upon the proofs and answer. They may otherwise well be stated in language commonly used here thus: (1) Reasonable notice of time, place of hearing, and of charges constituting a proper subject for investigation; (2) reasonable opportunity to defend, characterized by full disclosure of adverse evidence according to the established principles of fair judicial investigation to determine the justice of the case; (3) a decision upon proofs of record supporting it in some reasonable view.

Testing the situation by the jurisdictional features suggested, it would be doing the greatest injustice to the governor to suppose he entertained the idea that the power of removal was required to be exercised in compliance therewith. He appreciated that at the hearing he sat as a court, because he so declared, but assumed he had competency to act substantially ex parte and in the quadruple capacity of informer, trier, prosecutor, and witness. He was simply mistaken, acting, we do not doubt, in good faith, in the belief that under § 970 of the statutes he possessed all the power exercised, and which it was suggested there was competency to exercise, under the statute considered in State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry and State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, and that anything less harsh was matter of grace, and not of right.

That several serious jurisdictional errors

characterized the proceedings is too plain for argument. No one would seriously claim that such proceeding had hardly a semblance of the common-law requirement,—a proceeding after the manner of such before a quasi judicial tribunal. A conclusion that such a hearing was requisite to validity of an adverse determination practically ends the matter. There were these radical departures from the field of authority:

(a) There was practically no notice of a hearing with reasonable opportunity to prepare for and make a defense. The time of notice was less than an hour. Nothing short of a full day would do under ordinary circumstances. There were no extraordinary circumstances warranting a shorter time, but rather there were circumstances demanding a longer time. The officer was one of the most important, as we have said, in the state, and the proceedings were instituted at a time of great official activity and requirement. The power of the governor in such a case is a substitute for the power of impeachment. What would be thought of the legislature if, upon one hour's notice, it should proceed against the governor in face of his solemn protest of unpreparedness for the occasion for want of reasonable opportunity therefor, to try him on articles of impeachment?

The precedents are few as to what is a reasonable notice and time to prepare for a hearing in a case of this sort, but there are some. A notice somewhat exceeding twenty-four hours was held sufficient in People ex rel. Donovan v. Fire Comrs. 77 N. Y. 153. The same time was passed without comment in Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 23 L. ed. 478. In People ex rel. Schumann v. McCartney, 34 App. Div. 19, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1047, four hours' notice was said to be equivalent to no notice at all. In People ex rel. Jordan v. Martin, 152 N. Y. 311, 46 N. E. 484, a rule requiring two days' notice was treated as reasonable. A few hours' notice is not consistent with due process of law. United States ex rel. Turner v. Fisher, 222 U. S. 204, 56 L. ed. 165, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37. In a serious matter one should not be required to answer the same or even the next day. Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398, 44 L. ed. 520, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410.

Nothing further need be said on this branch, except that it must be considered that there was the merest mockery as to the element of notice.

(b) The right of appellant to a fair hearing, with reasonable opportunity to defend according to the essential of fair judicial investigation, was plainly violated. The governor had no right to act upon personal information not disclosed so as to afford fair opportunity to meet it. All should have been disclosed to appellant and made a matter of record. People ex rel. Hogan v. French, 119 N. Y. 502, 23 N. E. 1058; Rex v. Faversham, 8 T. R. 352, 4 Revised Rep. 691; Capel v. Child, 2 Crompt. & J. 558, 2 Tyrw. 689, 1 L. J. Exch. N. S. 205. As said in State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 468, 107 N. W. 500, the law contemplates that the members of such a tribunal will "proceed with the dignity and fairness commonly expected of tribunals exercising judicial or quasi judicial authority;" that they will "act upon proof of some sort reasonably appropriate to the case and made a matter of record; not necessarily . . . in all cases act regardless of personal investigation, but that in case of reliance thereon, the result of the investigation will be made a matter of record; that opportunity will be afforded to the party affected . . . to know of and to rebut the evidence produced against him, if he so desires. In short, that they will exercise their judicial function judicially, and that their decisions will be open to review by the courts for jurisdictional error, including that involving the question of whether the basis for the decision indicated by the record constitutes reasonable ground therefor."

A reasonable opportunity to be heard in such an important matter, especially since no time for preparation was afforded, was not satisfied by the period of part of an hour, in defiance of appellant's sworn statement that such time was entirely inadequate for him to suitably present the evidence and the law. Reasonable opportunity to present evidence was not satisfied by closing the hearing while appellant's most important witnesses were present and waiting to testify. That competency to condemn appellant was about to expire, by the intervention of a co-ordinate branch of the government, affords no excuse for the refusal to accord appellant his constitutional rights. The governor could not properly thus run a race with the approaching intervention without imperiling his jurisdiction. To do so intentionally, to the manifest prejudice of appellant, could not appear otherwise than illegal. Purposely rushing such an important matter, one of the most important that could engage executive attention, to a finish before the legislature could have time to convene, frankly proclaiming his purpose in that regard as an excuse for cutting off appellant without opportunity to present his most important evidence, is too clearly jurisdictionally unfair to be consistent with the right to a fair hearing.

We will not pursue this matter. It seems certain the governor, who is a lawyer and man of judgment, had no idea appellant was entitled to a hearing of a judicial character, and that he accorded the sort of hearing which occurred more as a matter of justifying the disturbance of such an important office, than as a recognition of any right of the officer. Whatever regard for the latter possessed the executive mind evidently took the form of merely extending a courtesy. From the standpoint of what a hearing should be, there was no hearing in a judicial sense. As said by Justice Field in Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914: "Wherever one is assailed in his person or his property, there he may defend, for the liberty and the right are inseparable. This is a principle of natural justice, recognized as such by the common intelligence and conscience of all nations." A violation of right in this respect "is not a judicial determination of his rights, and is not entitled to respect in any other tribunal."

(c) If we were able to reach this stage of the case without discovering a fatal jurisdictional defect, there would be left the question of whether there was any legitimate basis in the evidence for the finding of fact upon which the removal order was grounded. I will now turn briefly to that.

The charge against appellant was in these words, following substantially the language of the statute: "Said Herman L. Ekern did serve on and under the political committee, and as manager of the political campaign" for one L. L. Johnson, who was then and there a candidate for the office of speaker of the assembly of the state of Wisconsin, contrary to the provisions of § 1966y of the statutes.

It will serve no valuable purpose to restate the evidence. It appears in substance in the statement of fact which heads this opinion. Suffice it to say that I fail to discover proof to sustain the charge in any reasonable view of the statute. Certainly, it seems, the legislature did not purpose preventing the commissioner from having his choice among aspirants of his own party for the mere office of speaker, or even from making that known, and, in a purely personal way, asking friends among members of the legislature to support such choice. That it did not purpose tying his hands so as to disable him from extending the ordinary courtesies commonly indulged in between gentlemen and friends belonging to the same party, such as engaging rooms by request, even with the knowledge of their intended use for political purposes, and that is the very word of appellant's offending. His refusal to close the rooms upon the ground that he did not control them, as he was commanded to do on peril of being removed from office, instead of being evidence to sustain the charges, was evidence to the contrary, in the light of undisputed evidence that he had no authority to comply with the command. He denied, in the most emphatic manner and in most satisfactory detail, that he was or had been a member of, or had served on or was serving on, a political committee, or as manager of a political campaign, for Mr. Johnson. There was nothing definitely produced to the contrary, while there stands the summary refusal to take the corroborating evidence of Mr. Johnson and others on the subject. The only reasonable explanation of the proceeding seems to be that it was supposed that personal undisclosed supposed knowledge of the governor was a proper basis for action.

On the face of the record, I feel bound to say there is no real basis for the decision that appellant violated the statute.

If the proof justified a finding that appellant acted for Mr. Johnson, in the nature of a committee or as member of a committee, in the promotion of his candidacy, still I think there is no proof of there having been a political committee or manager in the statutory sense. The law must be restricted to the common, ordinary meaning of words. Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of counsel to the contrary, it seems the legislature evidently used the term "political committee" in the sense of managing committee for a political party, and the term "manager of a political campaign" to characterize a manager for a political party, in the technical sense, in such a campaign. The statutes in many places deal with political parties, political committees, and political campaigns. Section 1966y was passed about the same day as the corrupt practice act, wherein such terms are used many times. Provision is made therein for such committees, they are given a sort of quasi official status, and regulated with much detail. Similar committees have been dealt with in this state for some twenty-five years as a proper subject for regulation under the police power, as significantly indicated in State ex rel. Cook v. Houser. It seems quite plain, I think, that political parties and the associate terms were used in § 1966y in the sense of similar terms in §§ 94—1 to 94—39 of the statutes. That accords with the construction of the term "political committee" elsewhere. Revised Laws of Mass. (Supp. 1902-1908) chap. 11, § 1. It gives sensible effect to the statute. To apply the term as used in § 1966y, to a person who may, of his own volition or by request, favor someone of several persons elected to the legislature as result of a political campaign—someone of the aspirants within his own party—for presiding officer, would be to render the statute absurd.

I am of the opinion not only that there was no evidence to reasonably support the charge against appellant from any fair viewpoint, but that the charge itself was not within the statute. The governor unwittingly traveled into the realms of doubtful construction, and that is not permissible in any case, especially not to maintain such an extraordinary power as that asserted. A meaning was adopted which it seems the legislature did not contemplate putting into law. Otherwise hardly any man of sufficient individuality to be competent to fill the high and responsible office of Commissioner of insurance would be found to take it. Practical construction has, so far as it has progressed, rejected any such meaning. Notwithstanding the bitter factional contests for the position of speaker of the legislature, candidates for speaker, or for head of any committee of the legislature, treated the corrupt practice act as having no reference to a canvass for such position.

I am conscious that this opinion has been extended to a very great length,—I trust not too great. The questions, as I have before remarked, are of such overshadowing importance that the particular right involved, though of much dignity, is of little importance beside the proper decision of the important questions upon which its conservation depends. I have endeavored to the best of my ability, to do justice to the court, to such questions, and to the vindication of that broad construction of private rights and the inviolability thereof believed to be laid down in the Constitution, and the judicial power and willingness to use it to vitalize such conception.

We must remark, in closing, that we have not been unmindful at any time of the regard which this court should have for the high office of governor. A solemn duty rests here in that regard. It is a matter of great delicacy to deal with the governor's action and condemn it as void, but when duty requires it, the duty must be performed. Anyone who would hesitate when the duty is plain, because of the exalted station of the co-ordinate department of government, is unworthy to be a trustee of the judicial power delegated by the people. With due deference to the co-ordinate department, and full appreciation of its independence, within the scope of its authority, we must, with the courage which should characterize the supreme judicial office, vindicate the paramount authority here to determine what the law is, what acts constitute a violation thereof, and what are the legal consequences. The moment it shall be established that either of the other departments is independent of the judiciary in that field, the guard which the people placed in the Constitution to conserve private rights will have been broken down, and the pathway for usurpation will be open and plain. We entertain no thought that the governor had any purpose to violate the law. He is human, and so is liable to err. Error often occurs, as we think it did here, without consciousness of any ulterior influence, and yet some strong feeling springing from provocation, may so have had the field as to subvert the judgment.

To recapitulate the points in this opinion:

The governor within the scope of his authority is independent of the judicial department of the state. He can neither be compelled to act or not to act, nor his act called in question.

If the governor acts beyond the scope of his authority and violates private rights, the injured party may appeal to the courts for redress, and be entitled thereto regardless of the official status of the wrongdoer, though such status may have much to do with the manner of redress.

The courts, except in some extreme cases of hardship not admitting of any other remedy, will not act coercively in respect to the governor; that not from want of power, but on grounds of public policy.

The public policy which shields the governor from judicial coercion, except in dire necessity, does not apply to his agents, though the court will not, from the same policy, act then coercively to restrain the vitalization of the executive will, unless there is some clearly contrary to law apparent necessity therefor.

If a person takes office by lawful means, and remains therein in good faith believing that he has de jure right to do so, and his possession is characterized by all the usual appearances of right, he has color of authority, and has de facto status until the end of his term and some other has been duly declared successor to him in the particular office.

A person in possession, under the circumstances before stated, does not lose his de facto status before the end of the term for which he was elected or appointed, by reason of the formal, premature, adverse termination thereof, and the appointment or election of a successor, so long as he remains in possession, doing business as before, in good faith and upon reasonable ground challenging the validity of interference.

Subject to the exception suggested, a person in good faith possession of a public office, and to all appearances entitled thereto de jure, is at least a de facto officer.

If a person has possession of an office and is entitled thereto de jure or de facto, or there is a fair question as to whether he has not, at least, the latter status, he is entitled to protection by injunction against being dispossessed by violent and unlawful means.

The remedy by action for injunction may be used in the circumstances stated in the foregoing, though there be no action pending to try the title to the office, and the only purpose is to preserve the existing condition of things until the adverse claimant shall have established his right by legal means.

A controversy between rival claimants for an office, as to which has the title, is not a proper primary subject-matter for equitable interference, but the right to immunity from being dispossessed by violent and unlawful methods is such a subject-matter.

Though an equitable action will not lie to try title to an office, where the question of title is incidental and germane to some proper subject-matter of primary interference in equity, the incidental matter may be litigated to effect, under the rule that a court of equity having jurisdiction of the parties and a proper primary subject-matter for a legitimate purpose may retain jurisdiction to do full justice between the parties, including all the incidental germane matters, and even, when the action is grounded in good faith at the start, if the primary subject-matter entirely drops out for failure of proof.

Where the power of summary removal from public office exists, the officer clothed with the power may execute it without judicial interference before or after. Where a person holds a public office ad libitum purely, he may be removed at the pleasure of the officer having the power of removal. Where the power of summary removal is expressly or by necessary inference conferred by statute, the removal may occur without hearing except such as the statute expressly requires. Where a person holds office for a term fixed by law, but is subject to removal for cause, or a particular cause, unless the written law expressly or by necessary implication provides to the contrary, the power of removal must be exercised upon charges satisfying the calls of the statute, reasonable notice of the charges and the time when the hearing will be had in respect thereto, reasonable opportunity to be heard in person, by counsel, and by witnesses, to meet the adverse witnesses, hear their testimony and cross-examine them, and know all of, and have opportunity to meet, the proofs to be considered,— in short, a hearing after the manner for fair judicial investigation and determination accordingly.

The right to hold and enjoy a public office is of pecuniary value, and in a broad sense is a property right and matter of personal liberty within the protection of the declared purpose of the Constitution, within article 5 and § 1, art. 14, of the Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

Due process of law, within the constitutional guaranties, limits the exercise of the power of removal to those proceedings expressly provided by statute, or, where none are so provided, to the methods which by the common law are required according to established principles of natural justice.

Whether the governor, exercising the power of removal, acquired jurisdiction to act, and proceeded to a finality without excess of jurisdiction, may be inquired into whenever the result is called in question collaterally or directly.

In exercising the power of removal for cause and upon notice and hearing, the governor acts as a tribunal, and the same as any other inferior body exercising quasi judicial authority, his act may be reviewed, under the supervisory control power of the court, for jurisdictional error whenever the same comes in question directly or collaterally.

Whatever a quasi judicial tribunal does within its jurisdiction, regardless of the mere judicial error committed, is final, but any material excess is jurisdictional, and renders the result void.

An inferior tribunal, required to decide upon evidence, commits a clear violation of law in deciding without any evidence or contrary to any reasonable view of the evidence, and such violation is jurisdictionally fatal to the result.

The prohibitory clause of subdivision 2, § 1966y, as to the commissioner of insurance not serving on or under any political committee, or as manager for any political campaign, has reference to those committees and campaign activities recognized and regulated by statute, particularly by the several sections of the corrupt practices act (§ 94—1 to § 94—39). It has no reference to mere personal preferences or favors or activities, for one of a body elected as the result of a political campaign, as presiding officer of the body.

The facts upon which the decision is grounded, as to the governor's jurisdiction to make the order of removal, are undisputed and undisputable. All that is shown by the record as made in behalf of respondents. Therefore it would be a useless delay in the administration of justice, and prejudicial to public interests, to remand this case for any less purpose than a speedy termination of the litigation by judgment on the merits according to the prayer of the complaint, and, as germane thereto, judgment that, at the time of the commencement of the action, appellant was de jure commissioner of insurance.

So ordered.

Barnes, J., dissenting:

The order appealed from should be affirmed for two reasons: (1) Because the certificate of appointment held by Mr. Anderson gave him the prima facie right to the office and the right to the possession thereof until the question of title was tried in an appropriate proceeding brought for that purpose; and (2) because the governor had the right under § 970, Stat., to remove Mr. Ekern, without hearing or notice, and the courts have no jurisdiction to pass upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence on which action was taken, and Mr. Anderson was both the de facto and de jure commissioner of insurance.

Practically every substantial question of law involved in the case, with possibly a single exception, has already been passed upon by this court. This being so, the decisions of foreign jurisdictions are of little consequence, unless they suffice to convince the court that it should overrule its former decisions. I think our decisions and our statute law meet the case we have before us fully and fairly; hence this dissent.

The title to a public office cannot be tried in an equity action. Ward v. Sweeney, 106 Wis. 44, 82 N. W. 169; State ex rel. Lochsmidt v. Raisler, 133 Wis. 672, 114 N. W. 118; State ex rel. McCoale v. Kersten, 118 Wis. 287, 95 N. W. 120; State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912, 57 N. W. 296; State ex rel. Rinder v. Goff, 129 Wis. 668, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 109 N. W. 628.

An injunction will not lie to preserve the status quo in favor of a person in possession of an office and making a good faith claim of title thereto, unless it clearly appears that such party is in fact entitled to the office. Ward v. Sweeney, supra. While two members of the court did not agree to all that was said in the opinion in that case, the entire court did agree that the law was as above stated. See opinion of court, 106 Wis. pages 49, 50, concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Marshall, 106 Wis. pages 55, 63, and concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Bardeen, 106 Wis. page 63. Such is the law generally in reference to the issuance of injunctions pendente lite in equity actions. Sheldon v. Rockwell, 9 Wis. 166, 76 Am. Dec. 265; Warden v. Fond du Lac County, Scott Lumber Co. v. Oneida County, 72 Wis. 158, 39 N. W. 343; Walker v. Backus Heating Co. 97 Wis. 160, 72 N. W. 230; Tiede v. Schneidt, 99 Wis. 201, 211, 74 N. W. 798. There is but one well-recognized exception to this general rule, which is found in such cases as Valley Iron Works Mfg. Co. v. Goodrick, 103 Wis. 436, 78 N. W. 1096; Glassbrenner v. Groulik, 110 Wis. 402, 404, 85 N. W. 962; Quayle v. Bayfield County, 114 Wis. 108, 80 N. W. 892; Bartlett v. L. Bartlett & Son Co. 116 Wis. 450, 460, 93 N. W. 473, and Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 486, 84 N. W. 870. Manifestly the instant case does not fall within the exception.

The holder of a certificate of election is entitled to the possession of an office pending the trial of title thereto, as against an incumbent possession who makes a good faith claim of title. This was expressly decided in La Pointe v. O'Malley, 46 Wis. 35, 55, 50 N. W. 521, 524, where it is said that when the canvass "shows the election of an individual to a particular office, and he qualifies within the time and in the manner prescribed by law, he is entitled to the office as against every other person laying claim thereto, until the result of the election so declared is set aside by the judgment of some competent court, in a direct proceeding for that purpose. In such case, the person declared to have been elected is not required to institute a proceeding to have the judgment which has already been given in his favor confirmed by the judgment of a court, before he can enter upon the duties of the office."

The same question came before the court in State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634, page 638, and it was again held that a certificate of election carried with it the prima facie right to the office as against an incumbent in possession claiming title, and that such prima facie right included the right to the possession to the office pending the trial of title thereto. After stating the rule, the court uses the following language: "To this, we think, there is but one exception, and that is when the office is already filed by a de facto officer." This exception is carried into some of the subsequent cases: State ex rel. McCoale v. Kersten, 118 Wis. 289 op., 95 N. W. 120; State ex rel. Riuder v. Goff, 129 Wis. 683, op., 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 916, 109 N. W. 628. It is fair to assume that the court in these cases used the language of the Oates Case in the light of the explanation there given as to what was meant by it. It is there said in effect that the words "de facto officer" did not refer to one who might be a de facto officer as to the general public. Oates was in possession and was clearly such an officer, and he was ousted by mandamus in favor of the relator, who held the certificate of election. He was ousted because it was said that, as to the relator, Jones, he was not a de facto officer. So the decision is that a claimant in possession is not a de facto officer as against the certificate holder, and therefore has no right of possession as against him. Not only are the cases of La Pointe v. O'Malley and State ex rel. Jones v. Oates direct authority to the point that the holder of a certificate of election is entitled to the possession of the office pending a trial of title thereto, as against an incumbent in possession, but the subsequent cases of State ex rel. McCoale v. Kersten and State ex rel. Riuder v. Goff, supra, and State ex rel. Hayden v. Arnold, 151 Wis. 19, 138 N. W. 78, when correctly read, are to the same effect.

These cases state the law as it should be. Where there is a controversy between an incumbent in possession and one holding a certificate of election, one or the other should hold the office until the controversy is settled. Possession at best is only slight evidence of title. As between two such claimants, it is eminently just and reasonable to give some effect to the certificate of election, and to say that it carries the right to the possession of the office until the title is determined. This is not only a just rule, but one that avoids unseemly struggles to obtain or retain possession. The party in possession forfeits no rights and suffers no injury by surrendering possession ad interim. Every one had the right to suppose that the rule of law was firmly grounded in our jurisprudence until the present controversy arose.

I do not think that any satisfactory reason can be given why the rule referred to should not apply here. A certificate of appointment from the executive, where the law empowers him to appoint, is entitled to the same weight and effect as is a certificate of election from a canvassing board in the case of an elective office. If one gives the right of possession, surely the other does. So far as I have been able to ascertain there is no conflict in the cases on the point. In fact the decisions go further and hold that mandamus will lie to put the holder of a certificate of appointment in possession of the office pending the trial of title thereto, and will oust the party in possession although he claims to be legally entitled to the office. Re Sells, 15 App. Div. 571, 44 N. Y. Supp. 570; Conklin v. Cunningham, 7

N. M. 445, 38 Pac. 170; Beebe v. Robinson, 52 Ala. 86; Casey v. Bryce, 173 Ala. 129, 55 So. 810; Hubbell v. Amijo, 13 N. M. 482, 85 Pac. 1046; Cameron v. Parker, 2 Okla. 277, 38 Pac. 14; Elledge v. Wharton, 89 S. C. 113, 71 S. E. 657; State ex rel. Adams v. Herried, 10 S. D. 18, 71 N. W. 319.

It has been urged that in the O'Malley and Oates Cases the terms of office under which the incumbents gained possession of the offices had expired, and that the controversies arose over new terms, while in the instant case Mr. Ekern's term had not expired, and that therefore there is a well-grounded distinction between the former cases and the present one. A number of the cases just cited dealt with removals made during a term of office. The logic of the argument is not convincing. The governor had the right to terminate the term of office of the incumbent for certain causes. His order of removal is entitled to as much weight and consideration as is his certificate of appointment. There had been a prima facie valid removal of Mr. Ekern, as well as a prima facie valid appointment of Mr. Anderson. Until the de jure right could be determined, no injunction should issue to preclude the appointee from taking office.

For the reasons stated, if for no other, the circuit court properly dissolved the injunction. I think it was Mr. Ekern's duty under the law to have surrendered the office under protest, and then to bring his action in an orderly way to try title. If successful, he would lose no right by so doing, not even the right to collect the salary and emoluments of the office while he was out of possession.

The next and the only question which I desire to discuss at any length is one of statutory construction. At the request of the court a reargument was made on the question of whether due process of law was observed in removing Mr. Ekern. I have never conceived that the question of due process of law was involved in the slightest degree. If the governor followed the statute in making the removal, it was valid. If he did not, it was a nullity. The legislature which creates an office has plenary power to provide how removal shall be made. Whoever accepts an office so created accepts the burdens as well as the benefits. He is entitled as a matter of right to so much consideration as the legislature sees fit to give him,—no more, no less. Gillan v. Normal Schools, 88 Wis. 7, 14, 24 L.R.A. 336, 58 N. W. 1042. It may provide for removal without notice or hearing or the assignment of any cause. In such a case removal may be made without notice or hearing or the assignment of cause. It may provide for removal without notice or hearing for specific causes. In such a case removal may be made without notice or hearing, but a cause must be assigned, and it must be one specified in the statute. It may provide for removal on notice and hearing for specific causes, in which case a reasonable notice and hearing must be given. and the removal must be made for a cause found in the statute. It would seem to me to be almost absurd to deny this power to the legislature, and yet it seems to be done in many jurisdictions; some courts holding that the right to hold office is a property right protected by the due process clause of the Federal Constitution, and others that the power to remove is judicial and must therefore be exercised in a judicial manner. Still others seem to entertain no very well-defined reason for denying the power of the legislature, and proceed on general principles to apply the same rules to removals of incumbents of offices of legislative creation that are sometimes applied to the case of officers provided for by Constitutions. I do not care to discuss these foreign cases, nor the statutes under which they arise. The fundamental principles involved have been settled, and rightly settled, by this court. This much may be said, however, that wherever the legislature evidences an intent that notice and hearing need not be given, that intent will control. Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 68 Am. St. Rep. 108, 30 S. E. 297; Cull v. Whittle, 114 Md. 58, 78 Atl. 820, 824; Hallgren v. Campbell, 82 Mich. 255, 9 L.R.A. 408, 21 Am. St. Rep. 557, 46 N. W. 381, 383; Field v. United States, 189 U. S. 311, 47 L. ed. 828, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535.

An office is not property, nor is the right to hold office a vested right. State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior, 90 Wis. 612, 619, 64 N. W. 304; State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534, 603, 100 N. W. 964; State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 303, 122 N. W. 748; Crenshaw v. United States, 134 U. S. 99, 33 L. ed. 825, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431.

and cases cited. The guaranty of due process of law by the 5th and 14th Amendments to the Federal Constitution is extended only to life, liberty, and property. The right to hold an office created by legislative act does not involve any of these three things. If due process of law is involved at all in the present case, then a removal in whatever manner the statute provides is due process of law. As is well said in State ex rel. Buell v. Frear, 146 Wis. 201, 298, 299, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 131 N. W. 832, 833: "The privilege of holding a public office is not in its nature of the class of rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution as the natural and inalienable rights of every citizen. It has never been treated as a natural right in our governmental system. It is in its nature a privilege which is extended to the citizens of the state upon such conditions and terms as the people in their sovereign capacity may determine."

Again it was held in Gillan v. Normal Schools, 88 Wis. 7, 24 L.R.A. 336, 58 N. W. 1042, that a statute empowering the board of regents to remove a teacher at pleasure was as much a part of the contract of employment as if it were written into such contract, and that a removal might be made under it without notice or hearing. The power of eviction from office is not a judicial one under the law of Wisconsin, but is administrative, at least as to all officers whose removal is not provided for by the Constitution. Many courts hold that the power of removal is judicial, and starting with this premises they reach the conclusion, logically enough, that it must be exercised in a judicial manner, which comprehends the giving of notice to the accused officer of the charges against him and a full opportunity to be heard thereon. Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 10 N. W. 112, is a typical case of this class, and contains an able and elaborate presentation of the reasons for so holding, as well as a review of the authorities upon which the court based its conclusion. This court, however, refused to follow the Michigan decision in the Starkweather Case, although urged to do so, and said: "The better authority, however, is clearly to the effect that the power to remove officers for cause, though to be exercised in a judicial manner, is administrative, not judicial." If it were held otherwise, the court would have been compelled to reach an opposite conclusion in the case, because by no stretch of imagination could it be held that the relator in that cause had a judicial hearing. One of his judges was a person who would succeed him in the office of mayor in case of removal, and another was the person who presented the charges against him.

The Starkweather Case does not conflict with what is said in Larkin v. Noonan, 19 Wis. 83. There the court held that a sheriff was entitled to be served with a copy of the charges against him, and to a right to be heard in his defense, because § 4 of article 6 of the Constitution expressly required these things. The court proceeds to hold that, a hearing being so required, it should be carried on after the manner of court procedure. Randall v. State, 16 Wis. 341, is to the same effect, and goes no further. The same thing is said in the Starkweather Case. The case of State ex rel. Getchel v. Bradish, 95 Wis. 205, 37 L.R.A. 289, 70 N. W. 172, was distinguished from the Starkweather Case in that it was there decided that a license to sell liquor was a vested property right of which the owner could not be deprived without due process of law, and that in a proceeding to revoke the license, the town chairman, who had hired a minor to purchase liquor, was disqualified from sitting on the trial of the saloon keeper.

The decision in the Starkweather Case was vigorously attacked by the able counsel who appeared for the relator in State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534, 100 N. W. 964, and was just as vigorously defended by the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Marshall. The discussion will be found in the opinion on pages 573 to 581 of 122 Wis. I may be pardoned for quoting a few excerpts from it: "We recognize the doctrine of the Starkweather Case to be now, after the lapse of nearly ten years and the approvals thereof indicated, firmly established. The maxim, Stare decisis et non quieta movere, must prevail against all efforts to disturb it." 122 Wis. pages 574, 575. And again: "Can there be any possible doubt as to the truth of the proposition that what belongs to the people to do with as they deem best, those things respecting which their will is unrestrained by any constitutional limitation, they can grant upon the condition, among others, that the enjoyment thereof shall be solely secured by such remedies and administered by such tribunal as they may see fit? If there is, then the scores of boards and councils and commissions which every day act judicially in respect to such matters, without a thought on the part of anybody conversant with the law that their decisions are subject to judicial review, should have immediate legislative attention. Does not every board of review pass upon, or have power to do so, the valuation, for purposes of taxation, of the property owned by the relatives and business associates of its members? And how about the assessor, who sits as a member of such board, though its function is to pass upon, in a judicial way, his own work? Many other illustrations quite as striking could be given, all demonstrating the decision in the Starkweather Case is in perfect harmony with the existing order of things generally, and showing that the disquisitions found in some judicial literature respecting purity of judicial methods as to members of a tribunal such as the one in question, applying to them the test for a judge as to qualifications for the performance of his official duties, are all wrong. Such things sound well to the ear, as do all lofty sentiments regarding the preservation of spotless judicial integrity and shielding the courts even from danger of every opportunity for a well-grounded suspicion as to their decisions being influenced by ulterior matters; but when illegitimately applied to a mere ministerial officer in the performance of administrative duties, merely because he is clothed with some discretion in the matter denominated quasi judicial authority, are liable to lead to judicial error, and to promote harmful impressions among the people." 122 Wis. pages 575, 576.

Speaking further of the nature of the power of a political committee to determine who were the nominees for office, the discussion proceeds: "But we choose to rest the competency of the members of such committee on the broad doctrine of State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior, 90 Wis. 612, 64 N. W. 304. It was a mere administrative body, not a court in any sense, nor were its members expected to exercise the functions of judges, strictly speaking. The matter to be dealt with was a mere legislative privilege, grantable upon any condition the legislature saw fit to impose. The tribunal was given unqualified authority in respect thereto, so long as it proceeded within its appropriate sphere. None of the rules disqualifying judges or jurors have any application to such a situation." 122 Wis. page 581.

If it were possible to approve of the holding in the Starkweather Case, that the power to remove an officer was administrative, by emphatic iteration and reiteration, the doctrine was approved in State ex rel. Cook v. Houser. It had already been quoted with approval in Nehring v. State, 112 Wis. 637, 639, 88 N. W. 610, and was subsequently approved in State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 303, 122 N. W. 748. The point expressly decided in the cases referred to was decided sub silentio, or else overlooked, in State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254. State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 497, and State ex rel. Willis 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610. The question should be at rest in this state, in so far as the courts are concerned, if the doctrine of stare decisis means anything. It is true it is said in the Starkweather Case that the administrative power of removal must be exercised in a judicial manner. This expression can mean nothing more than that, when notice and hearing is required by law, as it was in that case, the proceeding should be carried on somewhat like court proceedings.

So I think that clearly the only question arising on the point under consideration is: Does the statute require the giving of a notice of hearing and an opportunity to be heard as a condition precedent to removal? If it does not, whatever was accorded to the plaintiff in the way of a notice and hearing was given as a matter of grace, and not of right, and he has no cause to complain about the inadequacy of the opportunity afforded to be heard. In this connection it will be observed that the statute does not expressly provide for notice or hearing, and if either is required it must be read out of the statute by implication. It may be further observed that such requirements cannot be interpolated into the statute, unless it is apparent that the legislature intended they should be. When we consider the history of this legislation, it is about as certain as anything of the kind can be, that there was no such legislative intent. To my mind that conclusion is as inevitable as the result of a mathematical demonstration.

Section 970, Stat., under which the plaintiff was removed, was first enacted by the legislature of 1849 as part of a comprehensive scheme governing and regulating removals from office. It has been continuously on our statute books since that time without material amendment. The legislative intent with which we must deal is that of the legislature which enacted the original law. The entire enactment referred to embraces §§ 4 to 10, inclusive, of chapter 11, Rev. Stat. of 1849, and is as follows:

"Section 4. The governor may remove from office any sheriff, coroner, register of deeds, or district attorney, giving to such officer a copy of the charges against him, and an opportunity of being heard in his defense.

"Section 5. The judge of the circuit court shall have authority, in term time or in vacation, to remove any clerk of the circuit court in any county within his district, when in his opinion he is incompetent to execute properly the duties of his office; or when on charges and evidence such judge shall be satisfied that he has been guilty of official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty, if, in the opinion of such judge, such misconduct or neglect shall be a sufficient cause for removal; but no such clerk shall be removed for such misconduct or neglect, unless charges thereof shall have been preferred to said judge, and notice of the hearing, with a copy of the charges, delivered to such clerk, and a full opportunity given him to be heard in his defense.

"Section 6. The board of supervisors of any county may remove the clerk of their board, when in their opinion he is incompetent to execute properly the duties of his office; or when on charges and evidence it shall appear to said board that he has been guilty of official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty, if, in the opinion of said board, such misconduct or neglect shall be a sufficient cause for removal; but no such clerk shall be removed for such misconduct or neglect, unless charges thereof shall have been preferred to said board, and notice of the hearing, with a copy of the charges, delivered to such clerk, and an opportunity given him to be heard in his defense; and in no case shall such removal be made unless two thirds of all the supervisors entitled to a seat in such board shall vote therefor.

"Section 7. Any collector or receiver of public moneys, appointed by the legislature or by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, or of both branches of the legislature, except those officers for whose removal provision is otherwise made by law, may be removed by the governor in case it shall appear to him on sufficient proofs, that such collector or receiver has in any particular wilfully violated his duty.

"Section 8. All officers, except Senators in Congress and those specified in the preceding section, who are or shall be appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, or of both branches of the legislature, or by the legislature without the concurrence of the governor, may, for official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty, be removed by the governor upon satisfactory proofs, at any time during the recess of the legislature, and the vacancy filled by appointment made by him, until such vacancy shall be regularly supplied; but no such appointment shall extend beyond twenty days after the commencement of the next meeting of the legislature.

"Section 9. All officers who are or shall be appointed by the governor for a certain time, or to supply a vacancy, may be removed by him.

"Section 10. All officers, except Senators in Congress, who are or shall be appointed by the legislature, or by either branch thereof, may be removed by such body or branch making the appointment."

Section 4 of the above statute is now § 968 of our Revised Statutes; § 5 is amended and incorporated in our present § 973; § 6 corresponds to our present § 974; § 7 to our present § 969; and § 8 to our present § 970, being the section under which the plaintiff was removed. The words "or of both branches of the legislature," contained in the original act, are not now found in § 970; otherwise the two statutes are identical. Section 9 corresponds to § 971; and § 10 to § 972.

It will be observed that § 4 covers the constitutional offices of sheriff, coroner, register of deeds, and district attorney, which were also elective offices. It was there expressly provided that the removal could only be made after such an officer was furnished a copy of the charges against him, and was given an opportunity to be heard in his defense. So that the matter of requiring a notice and hearing when they were considered desirable was sharply called to the attention of the legislature in the 1st section to the act which dealt with removals. This provision was in fact drawn in the language of § 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, which had been adopted the preceding year.

Section 5 also provided for the removal of a constitutional and elective officer, to wit, the clerk of the court. The Constitution was silent as to how he should be removed, so that the legislature might make such provision for it as was deemed wise. See § 10, art. 13, Const. The section provided for two classes of causes for removal: (1) Incompetency; (2) Official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty. It was clearly the purpose of the legislature to authorize the summary removal of the clerk for incompetency without notice or hearing, because the statute required neither when removal was made for this cause. As to the second class of causes, however, the statute carefully specified that the clerk could not be removed for misconduct or neglect unless "charges thereof shall have been preferred," and "notice of the hearing with a copy of the charges" be "delivered to such clerk, and a full opportunity be given him to be heard in his defense." Here, again, the question of notice and hearing was immediately in the mind of the legislature, and the law expressly provided that notice and hearing were required on such causes of removal as the legislature desired they should be given on. Could it in reason or common sense be said that a notice and hearing was intended before a removal could be made for incompetency, when the law did not say so, but did say in the same section and in the same sentence that notice and hearing should precede a removal for other causes? The answer is obvious. It might be observed in passing that the causes for removal on account of which a notice and hearing was required by § 5 are the identical causes for which removal might be made under § 8, our present § 970, and which pertinently omits the requirement as to notice and hearing, no doubt because it was considered wise to throw greater safeguards around removals from elective than from appointive offices.

Section 6 dealt with the removal of county clerks, and vested the power of removal in county boards. Here, again, if the removal was made for incompetency, no notice or hearing was required. If made for "official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty," it could only be made on notice and hearing. We have in this section a plain statement that notice and hearing should be given in the case where it was desired that they should be given, and an omission of any reference to either in the case where manifestly it was not intended that they should be required.

Section 7 brings us to appointive officers, and provides for the removal by the governor of any collector or receiver of public moneys appointed by the legislature, or by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate, except as otherwise provided for, "in case it shall appear to him on sufficient proofs" that such officer "has in any particular wilfully violated his duty."

In making a removal for incompetency under § 5, the circuit judge could act on his own knowledge. The county board could do likewise in making a removal for the same cause under § 6. Under § 7 the governor could act on any proofs that were satisfactory to him. No notice or hearing was provided for as in the preceding sections. The power of removal was vested in the head of one of the departments of government, where there was no likelihood that it would be abused. It dealt with officers who were handling public funds, and as to whom peremptory removals might be absolutely necessary to save the state from loss, where a dishonest official was squandering or stealing the money of the state. Is it supposable that the legislature intended that such an officer might continue to embezzle state funds until he could be served with a copy of the charges against him, and be given what might be deemed a sufficient time to prepare his defense? If so, why did not the legislature say so, as it did in the preceding sections, when it desired that notice and hearing should be given? We have § 7 on our statute books to-day as § 969, Rev. Stat. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If it is learned that such an officer has stolen money of the state, and is liable to steal more, must notice and hearing be given and proceedings be carried on in their usual leisurely way before thefts can be stopped? I do not think the legislature ever had any such intention, and I think it is very clear that it had not. I also think that, if the court had such case presently before it, instead of the one pending, it would not hesitate to so hold. And yet if the requirement of a notice and hearing cannot be read into § 7, it cannot be read into § 8, the one with which we are concerned.

Section 8 of the act of 1849, being our present § 970, under which the governor acted in the instant case, provided that all officers, with certain designated exceptions, who are or shall be appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate, may "for official misconduct, or habitual or wilful neglect of duty, be removed by the governor upon satisfactory proofs, at any time during the recess of the legislature." The difference between §§ 7 and 8 in reference to the method of removal is one of verbiage only. Under § 7 the governor may remove on "sufficient" proofs, and under § 8 on "satisfactory" proofs. The two words in this connection are practically synonymous and interchangeable. What is sufficient in the way of proof is ordinarily satisfactory, and what is satisfactory is sufficient. If this be not so, and there is a difference in the degree of proof required in the two cases, there is nothing in their use which indicates that a notice and hearing must be given in the one case, and may be refused in the other. The proofs required must be sufficient or satisfactory to the governor, and to no one else. They may be both sufficient and satisfactory, and even conclusive, without either notice or hearing. If the legislature had intended that notice and hearing should be required under § 8, it would have said so, as it did in reference to all removals made under § 4, and as it did as to two of the three causes for removal under §§ 5 and 6. The matter of notice and hearing was present in the legislative mind when the original law was passed. The fact that they were required in some cases and omitted in others is proof conclusive that the legislature did not desire to require them in cases where they were not expressly provided for. In such a case silence is as plainly exclusion as the use of express words would be.

I can only read out of the law of 1849 the conclusion that sheriffs, district attorneys, coroners, registers of deeds, clerks of the courts, when removed for official misconduct or wilful neglect of duty, and county clerks, when removed for like causes, could only be removed on notice and hearing, because the legislature has said so in plain words, and that all other officers whose removal was provided for might be removed without notice or hearing, because the legislature carefully refrained from requiring either. This latter statement is also true as to clerks of the courts and county clerks when removed for incompetency.

The scheme for removals was comprehensive and carefully worked out. As to elective and constitutional officers, safeguards were thrown around removals, with two exceptions. Clerks of the courts did their work under the eyes of the circuit judges, and when a judge became satisfied that a clerk was incompetent he might summarily remove him. Clerks of county boards did their work under the eyes of county boards, and such boards were empowered to summarily remove for incompetency. As to appointive offices created by the legislature, the power of removal as to all officers provided for in §§ 7, 8 and 9 was vested in the chief executive officer of the state. As to those provided for in § 10, the power of removal was vested in the legislature itself. Removals under §§ 7 and 8 could only be made on sufficient or satisfactory proofs. Removals under §§ 9 and 10 might be made at will, without proofs and without notice. I think there is just as much reason for saying that a removal made under either of the two latter sections must be made on notice and hearing, as there is for saying that notice and hearing is required under § 7 or § 8, or for removals for incompetency under §§ 5 and 6.

It is fair to assume that the legislature thought that a person who could be trusted to fill the office of governor could be trusted to deal fairly with officeholders whom he was empowered to appoint, and that cases might arise where prompt action was necessary for the public good, and that it was not wise to tie the hands of the governor when such action might well work to the detriment of the state. Governmental power must be vested somewhere, and the fact that it may be abused does not prove that the power must not be conferred. It would seem quite as logical to give a notice and hearing to candidates for appointments before a selection is made, as to require them in case of removal.

It has, I think, been the uniform practice of the legislature to expressly provide for a notice and hearing as a condition precedent to removal from office, where it was intended that no removal should be made without such notice and hearing.

By § 381, Stat., the board of regents of the State University have the power to remove the president or any professor, instructor, or officer of the university when in their judgment the interests of the university require it.

Subdivision 3 of § 404 confers a like power on the board of normal school regents. This latter statute was construed in Gillan v. Normal Schools, 88 Wis. 7, 24 L.R.A. 336, 58 N. W. 1042, and it was held that the power of removal was plenary and could be made at pleasure and without cause.

Section 397 provides that any normal school regent may be removed for cause, upon reasonable notice, by a vote of two thirds of all the regents.

Section 507 provides for the removal of school district officers, and that they must be removed on written charges, which must be served on such officers, and can only be removed after a notice and hearing upon the charges.

Section 772a provides that the supervisor of assessment may be removed by the county board for incompetency, fraud, or wilful neglect of duty, on charges preferred and ten days' notice in writing of the hearing thereon, and that a copy of the charges must be served with the notice.

Section 925—36 provides for the removal of certain city officers by the common council. It expressly states that no such officer shall be removed except for cause, nor unless charges are preferred against him and opportunity given him to be heard in his defense.

Section 925m provides for the removal of certain officers in cities operating under the commission form of government, where such officers are elected by the council, and they may be removed by a majority of the members of the council. This statute requires neither cause, notice, nor hearing.

Section 976 provides for the removal of town officers, and requires that removal be made only after notice and hearing.

Section 990—22 provides for the removal of persons in the employ of the state under the civil service law. The appointing officer is required to furnish his subordinate the reasons for removal, and to allow him a reasonable time in which to make an explanation, and such reasons, with the answer thereto, are required to be filed with the civil service commission. The cause of the removal must be neither religious nor political. This statute was construed in State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748, and it was held that the power of the removing officer was plenary, so long as legal cause for removal was specified.

Section 975 provides for the removal of a county superintendent of schools. The statute requires it to be made on notice and hearing.

Section 1059a and 1059b provide for the removal of assessing officers and members of boards of review, and the following section provides that such removal be made after notice and hearing.

Section 1231 empowers the supervisors of a town to remove the superintendent of highways for neglect or refusal to perform his duties. It contains no requirement for either notice or hearing.

Section 1747—3 provides for the removal of grain and warehouse commissioners "for cause, by the governor, in the same manner as county officers may be removed."

Section 1747—30 provides for the removal of grain inspectors by the grain and warehouse commission, whenever they have been guilty of any improper official act, or are found to be inefficient or incompetent. The statute provides that in such case the removal may be immediately made.

Section 1707—1 provides for the removal of railroad commissioners, and that such removal must be made on notice and hearing.

There are a number of other statutes which provide for removals, but these serve to illustrate that the legislature has had in mind the matter of requiring removals to be made on notice and hearing when it was considered desirable that they should be so made, and the inference is very strong that in cases where neither notice nor hearing is provided for none need be given. State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, supra.

In the very first case which arose in this state under a statute like our § 970, Chief Justice Dixon, speaking for the court, stated clearly and concisely just what the power was of the body in which the right to remove was vested. The board of supervisors of Milwaukee county removed the inspector of the house of correction during his term, which was fixed by law at two years. The board was authorized to remove for "incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to the said board." The court held that the words "other cause satisfactory to said board" meant a kindred cause, so that in fact the statute permitted a removal for incompetency, improper conduct, and other like causes. The statute was silent in reference to giving a notice and hearing to the accused official. McGarry insisted that he was entitled to have the removal proceedings carried on in a judicial way, and that the order of removal was void because this had not been done. Unsworn statements prejudicial to the accused were received, and the right of cross-examination was denied. If a hearing means anything, it means that the right to cross-examine exists. The court disposed of the contentions made in the only logical way in which they could be disposed of, in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the following language: "That part of the answer in which it is alleged that persons were examined and made statements before the board touching the charges made against the defendant, but without being sworn as witnesses, and that the defendant was not permitted to cross-examine them, is also irrelevant. It was certainly very proper for the board to notify the defendant of their intended proceedings, and to allow him to appear and take part in them, and to produce and examine witnesses, which it seems he did do; but the board was not bound to do so. It might have proceeded to order his removal ex parte, and without notice to him, and without any examination of witnesses, formal or otherwise; and if it could have done that, then it could dispense with the oath to those persons who were examined, or refuse to allow the defendant to cross-examine. The most that can be said of it is that it was a refusal to extend to him the same degree of consideration and favor which was shown when he was notified to appear and permitted to examine witnesses in his own behalf. The justice or injustice of the proceeding are not matters which can be examined here." State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 499.

I cannot think that there is any such difference between the statute involved in the Kennedy Case and the one involved in the present case, as would justify the placing of a different construction on the latter from what was placed on the former. Section 970 provides for removal for official misconduct and for wilful or habitual neglect of duty. The statute in the McGarry Case provided for removal for incompetency, improper conduct, and other like causes. Section 970 provides that the removal must be on proof satisfactory to the governor. The other law contained no such provision. But, as already stated, proof satisfactory to the governor does not mean proof taken after a notice is given and a hearing is had. The notice and hearing that is required by many statutes is for the protection of the officer, not for the information of the governor. That officer is the sole judge of what proofs are satisfactory to him, and as to the manner in which they shall be taken, unless the statute otherwise provides.

The other cases in this court dealing with the question are in entire harmony with the McGarry Case. A review of them will be found in State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748. I think the case of Nehrling v. State, 112 Wis. 637, 88 N. W. 610, is in harmony with the other decisions of this court. Under the statute there involved, a removal might be made for "misconduct, incompetency, or inattention to the duties" of the office. The statute was silent as to how the proceeding should be carried on. The plaintiff was permitted to be heard, but made pretty much the same complaint about the character of the hearing that McGarry did in his case. The court said: "The act nowhere requires or suggests that any witness shall be produced, much less sworn and examined, in the investigation resulting in such removal. The act seems to contemplate a summary investigation by the trustees,—of course giving such official an opportunity to be heard." This last clause is clearly obiter, and is no less clearly ill-considered and inconsistent with what precedes it. An investigation is not summary where a party is given an opportunity to be heard, and giving such an opportunity is wholly inconsistent with the idea that the party may not produce or swear witnesses in his behalf.

The discussion on this branch of the case has already been carried to too great a length. Under what I believe to be a fair construction of § 970, I do not think the plaintiff is entitled as of right to a notice and hearing, no matter to what extent fairness would demand it in the instant case. The question is one for the legislature to settle, and not the courts. The decisions of this court I think fully justify my interpretation of the statute. This case should not be confounded with cases involving property or vested rights, such as the Chittenden Case, 127 Wis. 468, 107 N. W. 500.

Where the law confers the administrative duty upon an officer to remove another from office for a specified cause or causes, and no provision is made for a review of his decision on the questions of fact involved, such conclusion is final, and the only judicial question is whether the cause assigned was a legal cause. State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 497; State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254; State ex rel. Willis v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610; State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748; State ex rel. Davern v. Rose, 140 Wis. 360, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 194, 122 N. W. 751; State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534, 100 N. W. 964; State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior, 90 Wis. 612, 64 N. W. 304; State ex rel. Coffey v. Chittenden, 112 Wis. 589, 88 N. W. 587; State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 189, 62 L.R.A. 700, 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332. If notice and hearing were not required in the instant case, the only question which the court could inquire into was whether or not the cause for removal specified in the order was a lawful one.

Where the governor removes an officer and assigns a statutory cause for removal, the courts will not place him on trial in reference to the motives which actuated him, and will not pass upon his bad faith or alleged arbitrary action in making the removal. Where a co-ordinate department of government performs an authorized duty, the courts have no more right to impugn the motives which actuated such department than would the department in question have the right to impugn the motives of this court in deciding a case which properly came before it. This was decided at an early day in reference to the legislative department of government in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162, and has never been departed from by the courts. It was also decided at an early day in this court in reference to the governor, in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513, 522, where it is said: "But it would be alike unbecoming and unwarranted on our part to inquire into the motives of the governor, in the exercise of a discretion given to him alone, in any case. He is responsible for his acts in such case, not to the courts, but to the people; and whenever experience shall have demonstrated the impolicy or impropriety of clothing the chief executive officer of the state with a power of removing inferior officers at his discretion, or 'when he shall believe the best interests of the state demand such removal,' it may then be the time for the people, in whose hands alone is the remedy, to eradicate the supposed evil. But courts are created to construe the laws as they are, not to declare what they should be. It is no part of our duty to impugn the action of the governor in such a case; but, on the contrary, we are bound to hold him justified in whatever conclusion he may have formed. In this case, therefore, whatever may have influenced the executive in the removal of Mr. Taylor has no claim to our attention; it is wholly foreign to the question before us, and can have no bearing upon it."

The case is an important one, dealing as it does with the power of a co-ordinate department of the government. It would be more satisfactory if the decision could be made by a unanimous court. The case has been very fully considered, and no doubt each member of the court has given it the best thought and study he is capable of. I cannot bring myself to see the law as does the majority of the court, and duty impels me to say so, and to refuse to assume responsibility for the decision reached. I have not sought to follow or discuss the reasons or arguments contained in the elaborate opinion of the court. I simply desire to state my own reasons in my own way for reaching the conclusion that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the opinion of the court ruthlessly slaughters a number of our decisions in order to reach the conclusion arrived at. To be sure the decisions are not expressly overruled, but they are limited, qualified, and misconstrued so that their authors would hardly recognize them. I refer particularly to the cases of Atty. Gen. ex rel. Taylor v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513, State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496; State ex rel. Willis v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610, La Pointe v. O'Malley, 46 Wis. 35, 50 N. W. 521, State ex rel. Jones v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912, 57 N. W. 296, the Starkweather Case, 90 Wis. 612, 64 N. W. 304; Ward v. Sweeney, 106 Wis. 44, 82 N. W. 169, and State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 303, 122 N. W. 748. Anyone who has sufficient curiosity to draw a parallel between what is said in reference to the Starkweather Case in the present decision, and what was said by the same learned judge in reference to it in State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. pages 574, 575, 576, and 581, 100 N. W. 964, will understand what I mean. The case of Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 112, is glorified in the opinion, and it is said that the opinion in the Starkweather Case, when carefully read, is in harmony with it. The present chief justice, in writing the opinion for the court in the Starkweather Case, did not seem to think so, because the court utterly repudiated its doctrines and declined to follow it. To do otherwise would have been fatal to the respondent's case. The entire court entertained this opinion at the time.

As before stated, I do not care to go into an analysis of the court's opinion. There are many propositions stated in it with which I am in accord. There are many others which I cannot assent to. I summarize my own conclusions as follows:

1. The certificate of appointment held by Mr. Anderson gave him the prima facie right to the office of insurance commissioner, and the right to its possession until the de jure title was settled.

2. Upon its production it was Mr. Ekern's duty to vacate the office under protest, and commence an action to try title to the office.

3. An injunction should not issue against the person having the prima facie right to the office, nor in any event in favor of the incumbent, except on a clear showing that he had the better title to the office.

4. Where an injunction is sought in such a case, the court will inquire into the merits of the case as disclosed by the motion papers, to ascertain whether the party in possession is clearly entitled to the office.

5. An office created by the legislature is not property, and the right to hold it is not a vested one.

6. The legislature may prescribe any method of removal from such an office it sees fit, and a removal made by the prescribed method is due process of law.

7. Where no provision of the Constitution or of statute law requires that notice and hearing be given before a removal can be made, neither notice nor hearing is a necessary condition precedent to a valid removal.

8. It was clearly the intention of the legislature, when it enacted what is now § 970, Stat., that the governor might remove the officers which he was thereby authorized to remove without notice or hearing.

9. When the determination of a question of this kind is vested in some tribunal other than the courts, and no appeal from or review of the decision reached is provided for by statute, such decision is final and conclusive, if such tribunal acts within its jurisdiction.

10. The only inquiry left open to the courts in this proceeding is whether the cause assigned for removal is one for which the statute authorizes a removal to be made. If it was, the governor acted within his jurisdiction in making it, no matter how grievously he might err in judgment.

11. The order of removal in this case assigns a statutory cause for removal, and it is therefore conclusive on the courts.

12. Injunction will not lie against a coordinate and equal branch of the government, and neither will the courts inquire into the motives of the legislature or the governor in performing an official act.

I do not wish to be understood as assenting to everything in the opinion of the court not covered by the foregoing propositions. I simply set forth the salient points on which I base my conclusion.

Timlin, J., concurring:

I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Marshall to this extent:

(1) Section 970, Wis. Stat., under which the removal of the appellant was attempted, authorizing removal for cause proven, must be construed to require due process of law, i. e., charges, notice thereof, and a hearing. State ex rel. Hastings v. Smith, 35 Neb. 13, 16 L.R.A. 791, 52 N. W. 700.

(2) There was in this case less than an hour's notice, and the governor refused to hear the appellant's witnesses Johnson and Rosa. This was insufficient as to notice and inadequate as a hearing; consequently the attempted removal was without jurisdiction and void. United States ex rel. Turner v. Fisher, 222 U. S. 204, 56 L. ed. 165, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37.

(3) There being no lawful removal, there was no vacancy; hence no power to appoint a successor. The appellant is the de jure commissioner of insurance, and entitled to an injunction to restrain trespasses, actual and threatened, for the purpose of seizing upon his office, the property and emoluments thereof.

(4) The governor has no power, jurisdiction, or authority as against even a de facto officer in possession of the office, to install the appointee of the former before a judgment in quo warranto in favor of such appointee.

To avoid unseemly clashes between co-ordinate branches of the government, and to avoid the condition which must necessarily ensue should the governor personally violate the injunctive order, the court will not unnecessarily issue an injunctive order against the governor. But the appellant is entitled to such order against the subordinates acting under the order of the governor in the unlawful attempt to wrest from appellant by force his said office. To this extent the order appealed from should be reversed.

There is doubtless much good law and much elevated and inspiring sentiment in the opinion of Brother Marshall; but I have not had time to go over it with that care which ought to be preliminary to a formal approval of all that is said therein.

Winslow, Ch. J., dissenting (filed June 2, 1913):

I fully agree with Mr. Justice Barnes. I think he states accurately the law as it is, or rather the law as it was before the decision of this case.

If I could agree with my brethren of the majority, that § 970, Stat., requires notice and hearing, I should have no doubt that the attempted removal was wrongful, because of the absence of sufficient notice and hearing. I cannot, however, so construe § 970, for the reasons stated by Judge Barnes.

I wish to add a few words of a general nature. I am no worshipper of precedents. I have joined in the slaughter of precedents on numerous occasions, and felt that I was rendering good service to the commonwealth. Nor do I attribute any special sanctity to decisions in which the opinions have come from my own hand. If they be wrong in principle, or have outworn their usefulness, owing to changed conditions or increasing knowledge, let them have short shrift.

State ex rel. Jones v. Oates and State ex rel. Starkweather v. Superior are no more my progeny than they are the progeny of the entire court, except that I was chosen to cut and fit their verbal clothing. I shall have some difficulty in recognizing them in the future in the new garb in which they are henceforth to appear, but doubtless I shall become accustomed to the change. I confess that it had never occurred to me as possible that the Starkweather Case and the case of Dullam v. Willson could be harmonized. I should have said that it was impossible. However, one can hardly refuse to believe when confronted by the actual fact. The accomplishment of this remarkable result seems to demonstrate that the word "fail" is no more entitled to recognition in the lexicon of age than in the lexicon of youth.

The most serious infirmity in the decision in this case, as I regard it, is, not that it refuses to follow precedent, but that it is really a step backward, a signal to retreat rather than to advance. The present case is a case where a very important state office is at stake, but the principles decided apply as well to every ministerial officer, however insignificant, whose removal is provided for by a statute similar to § 970, and there are many of them. Every such officer is by this decision fortified and intrenched in his office. Proceedings to remove him on the part of his superior will be of little avail, so far as immediate results are concerned. If he can persuade a court that he is acting in good faith, he can practically deny the power of his superior to remove him, and remain in his office for months, while the necessarily slow processes of the law in circuit and supreme court are reaching a result. The arm of the superior officer will be rendered nerveless, and the man who is charged with responsibility for results will have practically no certain means of achieving results, because unable to command efficient service from his subordinates. Such is not the genius of the democracy of to-day, much less of the democracy of the future. That democracy will unquestionably elect a few men as the heads of its various departments, and demand of them results. While making this demand it will perforce give those heads full power to remove subordinates. That democracy will cease to attempt the impossible task of electing every minor official by vote of the people, but will adopt the short ballot, elect a few men to the important positions, invest them with plenary authority over their subordinates, and demand in return efficiency of service in each department. The subordinate official, intrenched in an office from which he cannot be removed save by judicial trial, will in my judgment disappear. The head of the department will be responsible to the people; the subordinate in the department will be responsible to the head. Thus, the people will retain their power by retaining control of the head, not by attempting the impossible task of selecting fit occupants of all the subordinate governmental positions.

And so I say that this decision is a step backward; it tends to hamper the responsible heads of departments of the government; it seeks to return to the exploded idea that there is some private property right in an office, whereas the true idea is that it is simply an opportunity to serve the state. The idea that some designing man will build up a despotism on the ruins of our liberties, if he be given the right of removal from office without notice or hearing, cannot be seriously entertained. There is no such danger in these days. It is the merest myth. The danger is rather that the responsible head of a governmental department will not have authority enough over his working force to perform the duties which the people have placed upon him, and for the performance of which he is directly responsible. For this reason I regard the present decision as an unfortunate step in the wrong direction. I have no fear that it will have any very serious results; the legislature can always provide in express terms for removal without hearing, and doubtless will do so more and more as time goes on and the true theory of efficient government becomes more fully understood.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM D. C. GERMAINE

v.

WOODBIDGE N. FERRIS, Governor.

(— Mich. —, 142 N. W. 738.)

Courts — power to review acts of governor — removal from office.

The court has no power under a Constitution dividing the government into departments, to review by direct proceedings the action of the governor in removing a mayor for cause under authority conferred by statute, although the proceeding for removal is quasi judicial.

Kuhn, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion to enter an order quashing a writ of certiorari heretofore issued by this court. The reasons urged in support of the motion are as follows: "(1) That this court has no jurisdiction to review, by writ of certiorari directed to the governor, any action of the governor in the discharge of his official duties under the Constitution and laws of the state. (2) That under the Constitution and laws of the state of Michigan the executive and judicial branches of the state are co-ordinate, and that the action of the executive department of the state government is not subject to review by the judiciary upon writ of certiorari directed to the executive branch of the state government. (3) Because the action of respondent here sought to be reviewed was the exercise of an official discretion belonging to the executive, and not reviewable upon certiorari."

The respondent, as governor of the state, by virtue of authority given him by § 1159 of the Compiled Laws of 1897, made an order removing the petitioner from the office of mayor of Traverse City. The section reads as follows: "The governor may remove all county officers chosen by the electors of any county or appointed by him, and shall also remove all justices of the peace and township officers chosen by the electors of any township, or city or village officers chosen by the electors of any city or village, when he shall be satisfied from sufficient evidence submitted to him, as hereinafter provided, that such officer is incompetent to execute properly the duties of his office, or has been guilty of official misconduct, or of wilful neglect of duty, or of extortion, or habitual drunkenness, or has been convicted of being drunk, or whenever it shall appear by a certified copy of the judgment of a court of record of this state that such officer after his election or appointment shall have been convicted of a felony; but the governor shall take no action upon any such charges made to him against any such officer until the same shall have been exhibited to him in writing, verified by the affidavit of the party making them, that he believes the charges to be true, with a statement of the prosecuting attorney of the county, that in his opinion the case demands investigation. But no such officer shall be removed for such misconduct or neglect unless charges thereof shall have been exhibited to the governor, as above provided, and a copy of the same served on such officer, and an opportunity given him of being heard in his defense." The power conferred by this statute was not granted to the person who is the incumbent of the executive office as a private person, but it is conferred upon the governor in his official capacity. The power pertains to the office of governor, and when he acts by virtue of the statute it is an executive action, and it is none the less an official act of the governor because the power might have been intrusted to some other person or authority.

It is urged that the governor in this proceeding acted judicially, and that therefore such action is subject to review by certiorari; and in support of that position the case of Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 112, is relied upon. In that proceeding, however, no process was issued against the governor direct, and the validity of the removal proceedings was raised by quo warranto. This is the first instance called to our attention in our state where an attempt is made to review the action of the governor of the state by a writ of certiorari. Granting that the contention of counsel for petitioner is correct, that the function performed by the executive in the removal proceeding is quasi judicial in character, the fact still remains that it is an official action of the governor; and the question arises whether an effort to review his action by proceeding directly against him would not involve the fundamental proposition that such review would be an invasion by the judiciary of the executive functions of our government.

Article 3 of the Constitution of this state, on the subject of the division of the powers of government, provides:

"Section 1. The powers of government are divided into three departments: The legislative, executive, and judicial.

"Sec. 2. No person belonging to one department shall exercise the powers properly belonging to another, except in the cases expressly provided in this Constitution."

The question of whether mandamus will lie to compel the governor of a state to perform duties imposed upon him has been raised in this state and in many other jurisdictions. It is well settled by all authorities that mandamus will not lie to compel the governor to perform duties of a purely executive or political character, but the decisions are not uniform as to the power of the court to compel the governor to discharge those duties which, as to other officials, are usually called ministerial. However, this question has been settled in this state by the very instructive case of People ex rel. Sutherland v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89. The application in this case was for mandamus to require the governor to issue his certificate showing that the Portage Lake and Lake Superior ship canal and harbor had been constructed in conformity with the acts of Congress making a land grant for the same, and the acts of the legislature of this state conferring the grant upon a corporation which the relators claimed to represent; and it was urged that the act sought to be compelled by mandamus was a purely ministerial one. Mr. Justice Cooley, in the able opinion in that case, discusses at length the question of the jurisdiction of the court to review the action of the executive by proceeding directly against him, and declined to distinguish between those acts which are political and those which are ministerial. His reasoning is so clear and instructive and so controlling of the present question that we quote the following (29 Mich. on pages 322-325): "There is no very clear and palpable line of distinction between those duties of the governor which are political and those which are to be considered ministerial merely; and if we should undertake to draw one, and to declare that in all cases falling on one side the line the governor was subject to judicial process, and in all falling on the other he was independent of it, we should open the doors to an endless train of litigation, and the cases would be numerous in which neither the governor nor the parties would be able to determine whether his conclusion was, under the law, to be final, and the courts would be appealed to by every dissatisfied party to subject a co-ordinate department of the government to their jurisdiction. However desirable a power in the judiciary to interfere in such cases might seem from the standpoint of interested parties, it is manifest that harmony of action between the executive and judicial departments would be directly threatened, and that the exercise of such power could only be justified on most imperative reasons. Moreover, it is not customary in our republican government to confer upon the governor duties merely ministerial, and in the performance of which he is to be left to no discretion whatever; and the presumption in all cases must be, where a duty is devolved upon the chief executive of the state rather than upon an inferior officer, that it is so because his superior judgment, discretion, and sense of responsibility were confided in for a more accurate, faithful, and discreet performance than could be relied upon if the duty were devolved upon an officer chosen for inferior duties. And if we concede that cases may be pointed out in which it is manifest that the governor is left to no discretion, the present is certainly not among them; for here, by the law, he is required to judge, on a personal inspection of the work, and must give his certificate on his own judgment, and not on that of any other person, officer, or department. We are not disposed, however, in the present case, to attempt on any grounds to distinguish it from other cases of executive duty with a view to lay down a narrow rule which, while disposing of this motion, may leave the grave question it presents to be presented again and again in other cases which the ingenuity of counsel may be able to distinguish in some minor particulars from the one before us. If a broad general principle underlies all these cases and requires the same decision in all, it would scarcely be respectful to the governor or consistent with our own sense of duty that we should seek to avoid its application and strive to decide each in succession upon some narrow and perhaps technical point peculiar to the special case, if such might be discovered. And that there is such a broad general principle seems to us very plain. Our government is one whose powers have been carefully apportioned between three distinct departments, which emanate alike from the people, have their powers alike limited and defined by the Constitution, are of equal dignity, and within their respective spheres of action equally independent. One makes the laws, another applies the laws in contested cases, while the third must see that the laws are executed. This division is accepted as a necessity in all free governments, and the very apportionment of power to one department is understood to be a prohibition of its exercise by either of the others. The executive is forbidden to exercise judicial power by the same implication which forbids the courts to take upon themselves his duties. It is true that neither of the departments can operate in all respects independently of the others, and that what are called the checks and balances of government constitute each a restraint upon the rest. The legislature prescribes rules of action for the courts, and in many particulars may increase or diminish their jurisdiction; it also in many cases may prescribe rules for executive action and impose duties upon or take powers from the governor, while in turn the governor may veto legislative acts, and the courts may declare them void where they conflict with the Constitution, notwithstanding, after having been passed by the legislature, they have received the governor's approval. But in each of these cases the action of the department which controls, modifies, or in any manner influences that of another, is had strictly within its own sphere, and for that reason gives no occasion for conflict, controversy, or jealousy. The legislature in prescribing rules for the courts is acting within its proper province in making laws, while the courts, in declining to enforce an unconstitutional law, are in like manner acting within their proper province, because they are only applying that which is law to the controversies in which they are called upon to give judgment. It is mainly by means of these checks and balances that the officers of the several departments are kept within their jurisdiction, and if they are disregarded in any case, and power is usurped or abused, the remedy is by impeachment, and not by another department of the government attempting to correct the wrong by asserting a superior authority over that which by the Constitution is its equal. It has long been a maxim in this country that the legislature cannot dictate to the courts what their judgments shall be, or set aside or alter such judgments after they have been rendered. If it could, constitutional liberty would cease to exist; and, if the legislature could in like manner override executive action also, the government would become only a despotism under popular forms. On the other hand, it would be readily conceded that no court can compel the legislature to make or to refrain from making laws, or to meet or adjourn at its command, or to take any action whatsoever, though the duty to take it be made ever so clear by the Constitution or the laws. In these cases the exemption of the one department from the control of the other is not only implied in the framework of government, but is indispensably necessary if any useful apportionment of power is to exist."

Again, 29 Mich. on page 330 of the opinion: "And while we should concede, if jurisdiction was plainly vested in us, the inability to enforce our judgment would be no sufficient reason for failing to pronounce it, especially against an officer who would be presumed ready and anxious in all cases to render obedience to the law, yet in a case where jurisdiction is involved in doubt it is not consistent with the dignity of the court to pronounce judgments which may be disregarded with impunity, nor with that of the executive to place him in a position where, in a matter within his own province, he must act contrary to his judgment or stand convicted of a disregard of the laws. But it is said that this conclusion will leave parties who have rights, in many cases, without remedy. Practically there are a great many such cases, but theoretically there are none at all. All wrongs, certainly, are not redressed by the judicial department. A party may be deprived of a right by a wrong verdict or an erroneous ruling of a judge; and, though the error may be manifest to all others than those who are to decide upon his rights, he will be without redress. A person lawfully chosen to the legislature may have his seat given by the house to another, and be thus wronged without remedy. A just claim against the state may be rejected by the board of auditors, and neither the governor nor the courts can give relief. A convicted person may conclusively demonstrate his innocence to the governor and still be denied a pardon. In which one of these cases could the denial of redress by the proper tribunal constitute any ground for interference by any other authority? The law must leave the final decision upon every claim and every controversy somewhere, and, when that decision has been made, it must be accepted as correct. The presumption is just as conclusive in favor of executive action as in favor of judicial. The party applying for action, which, under the Constitution and laws, depends on the executive discretion, or is to be determined by the executive judgment, if he fails to obtain it, has sought the proper remedy and must submit to the decision."

The reasoning in this case seems to us to establish the rule in this state that no process of the court can be issued against the governor of this state in any proceeding seeking to review any action performed by him as governor under power conferred upon him either by the Constitution or legislative enactment. In the case of People ex rel. Ayres v. State Auditors, 42 Mich. 422, on page 426, 4 N. W. 274, in citing the Sutherland Case, this court said: "It has also been held that we cannot interfere with the discretion of the chief executive of the state or subordinate him to our process." See also Midland County v. Auditor General, 27 Mich. 165.

The decisions in those states that have held that a writ may issue to control a ministerial act of the governor rest chiefly upon the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60. In speaking of these decisions, Justice Cooley, in People ex rel. Sutherland v. Governor, supra, 29 Mich. at page 327, said: "These cases for the most part are rested upon the dictum of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, supra, that one of the heads of department in the Federal government might be compelled by mandamus to perform a mere ministerial duty, a dictum which cannot be understood as expressive of the opinion of that eminent judge that the President was subject to the like process, but which is wholly inapplicable to a case like the present, unless it goes to that extent.

For it cannot justly be claimed, when Federal and state governments have been formed, so far as distribution of power is concerned, on the same general plan, that the Executive of the Union can claim immunity from judicial process any more than the governor of one of the states. In many cases it is unquestionable that the head of an executive department may be required by judicial process to perform a legal duty, while in other cases, in our judgment, the courts would be entirely without jurisdiction; and, as regards such an officer, we should concede that the nature of the case and of the duty to be performed must determine the right of the court to interfere in each particular instance. When the head of a department acts as the mere assistant or agent of the executive in the performance of a political or discretionary act, he is no more subject to the control of the courts than the chief executive himself; but where a ministerial act is required to be done by him, independently of the executive, though in a certain sense he is an executive officer, it would be as idle to dispute his responsibility to legal process as it would be to make the same claim to exemption on behalf of an officer intrusted with similar duties of a lower grade. This is emphatically the case under the Constitution of this state, which provides for the election of state and inferior officers alike by the people, and makes the chief officers of state below the governor as independent of his control in the performance of their duties as are the officers of the counties or of the townships."

The following instructive cases from other jurisdictions, with similar holdings, have been called to our attention and examined: State, Gledhill, Prosecutor, v. The Governor, 25 N. J. L. 331; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 570, 33 Am. Dec. 346; Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192, 5 Am. Rep. 564; People ex rel. Billings v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229, 68 Am. Dec. 591; State ex rel. Robb v. Stone, 120 Mo. 428, 23 L.R.A. 194, 41 Am. St. Rep. 705, 26 S. W. 376; State ex rel. Bisbee v. Drew, 17 Fla. 67; Hartranft's Appeal, 85 Pa. 433, 27 Am. Rep. 667; Rice v. Austin, 19 Minn. 103, Gil. 74, 18 Am. Rep. 330; State ex rel. Oliver v. Warmoth, 22 La. Ann. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 712; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Lowry, 61 Miss. 102, 48 Am. Rep. 76; Re Dennett, 32 Me. 508, 54 Am. Dec. 602; Hovey v. State, 127 Ind. 588, 11 L.R.A. 763, 22 Am. St. Rep. 663, 27 N. E. 175.

In the case of Bates v. Taylor, 87 Tenn. 320, 323, 3 L.R.A. 316, 11 S. W. 266, the Sutherland Case is cited with approval, and the court said: "The courts of Ohio, Alabama, California, Maryland, and North Carolina are together in holding that the governor may be required by mandamus to perform duties of the latter class, while the courts of Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, New Jersey, and Rhode Island have uniformly held the contrary upon the ground that the powers of government in the states are distributed among three departments, which, under the organic law, are to be and remain independent of each other. High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 118, 119, 120, and 121. This author cites the cases from the different states mentioned. We have examined them and also a very instructive case from Michigan (People ex rel. Sutherland v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 321, 18 Am. Rep. 80) which is in accord with those from the states last mentioned, and we are fully persuaded not only that the weight of authority, but also the weight of reason, is against the power of the courts to coerce the chief executive of a state into the performance of any official duty."

The attorney general, representing respondent, makes no claim that in a proceeding between A and B, in which A asserts some right by virtue of executive action, that the courts cannot determine the validity of that executive action. This court held in Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 112, that in such an action the validity of the governor's proceedings could be reviewed and the rights of a person who had been removed from office by the governor, without proper compliance with the requirements of the statute with reference to removals, would be protected. That decision fully lays down the rule applicable in such cases, and, in our opinion, affords ample protection against any unwarranted or illegal act on the part of the executive in removal proceedings.

The writ was improvidently issued and must be quashed.

NATIONAL BANK OF THE PACIFIC,

Bills and notes — pledge — failure of consideration.

That a bank, when taking a note payable a certain time after a future date, as collateral for a present loan, knows that it is given in accordance with a building contract, by which it is not to be executed until the building has been completed and all liens paid, does not entitle the maker to set up nonperformance of the building contract as a defense to the note, if it was made negotiable and delivered to the payee before the time called for by the contract, and the pledgee did not know that the contractor could not or did not intend to perform his contract.

This note is confined to cases where the paper and the transfer are both of the character protected by the law merchant. Cases of nonnegotiable paper, of transfers after maturity, and of assignments without indorsement, are therefore excluded. Cases which involve the rights of holders with knowledge that the notes are secured by mortgage are also excluded, as such notes may be the subject of equities where strictly commercial paper would not be. Jewett v. Tucker, 139 Mass. 566, 2 N. E. 680. Phases of this problem have already been considered in a note to *Brooke v. Failure of consideration is not a defense open to a maker as against an indorsee for value, even though that indorsee knew that the note was given to evidence an indebtedness that would become due if an executory promise were performed, and which might never be performed.

II. General principles.

The courts generally are agreed that the failure of an executory consideration for the giving of a promissory note or for the acceptance of a bill of exchange is not a defense against purchasers of the note or bill for value before maturity, with knowledge of the character of the consideration, but without notice of its failure.

There is a dictum to the contrary in Thrall v. Horton, 44 Vt. 386, where the court said that as the indorsee of a note knew that a part consideration was that a suit against the maker was to be discontinued, he took it subject to any defense, so far as the consideration was concerned, which might have been made to it if he had taken it when overdue; but held, following Farrar v. Freeman, 44 Vt. 63, that a partial failure of consideration could not be set up as a defense to a note except as permitted by the act of November 21, 1867, which did not extend the right therein granted beyond the original parties to the note.

And this contrary view is upheld in Howard v. Kimball, 65 N. C. 175, 6 Am. Rep. 739, where the court says that a purchaser of promissory notes, knowing from the recital on their face that they were given for the purchase price of a specified tract of land, and being aware of the fact that the vendor had given the maker a bond to make title upon payment of the purchase price, is charged with notice of the maker's equity in case the title turns out to be defective. "If a vendee executes a plain note of hand," said the court, "this equity may be defeated by a transfer of the note, before it is due; but when he takes the precaution to set the fact out in the face of the note, unless it has the effect of notice, the vendor may in every instance defeat the equity of the vendee by making haste to dispose of the note, and thus the vendee will be deprived of an equity without default on his part."

These cases have not been permitted to pass unnoticed. "An examination into the facts of that case [Howard v. Kimball, supra] will disclose," said the court in Bank of Sampson v. Hatcher, 151 N. C. 359, 134 Am. St. Rep. 989, 66 N. E. 308, "that the assignee of a note which expressed upon its face that it was given as purchase money of a certain tract of land not only had actual notice of the defect of title at the time he purchased, but he had taken a deed for such defective title from the original vendor, and held same, to be conveyed to the vendee when the note was paid. The case, therefore, is undoubtedly well decided; but in so far as the opinion gives countenance to the position that a defect of title is available against an indorsee for value of a note for the purchase money, from the fact, and from that alone, that the note on its face is expressed to be for the purchase money of land or a given tract of land, the case is not in accord with the better-considered decisions. As an authority for such a position, it was in effect disapproved by a subsequent decision of this court in First 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855, in which a note of that kind was held to be 'negotiable;' the term 'negotiable' being used in the sense that an indorsee for value, without notice, ultra, became the owner of the note, unaffected by the equities and defenses existent between the original parties to the contract."

Both Thrall v. Horton and Howard v. Kimball, supra, were disapproved in Adoue v. Tankersley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 28 S. W. 346. Answering the argument contained in the quotation from the opinion in Howard v. Kimball, hereinbefore set forth, the Texas court says: "The maker of the note, if he desires to secure himself in his defenses against a transfer of it to an innocent purchaser, need not give to it a negotiable form. When, however, by the form of his obligation, he makes it payable to bearer, or to the order of the payee, he evinces his purpose that it shall circulate as a negotiable instrument under the rules of the commercial law, and third persons may deal with it on that assumption. Having given it this character, he does not destroy the effect of the terms used by simply stating the consideration for which it is given. That fact does not imply that his obligation to pay is any the less perfect and binding than it would be if no consideration were expressed. Instruments possessing the quality of negotiability are supposed to carry advantages and a value which do not go with ordinary contracts, and in any transaction in which one has put such paper in circulation it should be presumed that he has received the benefit of its superior character, and third persons, dealing with the holder of it, may assume that the maker has protected himself in his transaction with the payee."

Howard v. Kimball, supra, was further disapproved in Ferriss v. Tavel, 87 Tenn. 386, 3 L.R.A. 414, 11 S. W. 93, and in Dollar Sav. & T. Co. v. Crawford, 69 W. Va. 169, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 587, 70 S. E. 1089.

Knowledge on the part of an indorsee of a note that the maker's obligation grew out of an executory contract will not affect his rights as a bona fide holder, where there was nothing in such contract restricting the negotiability of the notes, nor indicating fraud or imposition or an existing breach. Bank of Sampson v. Hatcher, 151 N. C. 359, 134 Am. St. Rep. 989, 66 N. E. 308.

The presumption is that the executory contract will be carried out in good faith and the consideration performed as stipulated. Siegel v. Chicago Trust and Sav. Bank, 131 Ill. 569, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417; Houston v. Keith, 100 Miss. 83, 56 So. 336.

"It cannot affect the negotiability of a note," said the court in Sadler v. White, 14 La. Ann. 173, "that its consideration is to be hereafter realized, or that from some contingency, it may never be enjoyed. Anyone having sufficient confidence in another to give his written obligation for something to be given or enjoyed hereafter is at liberty to do so, and the maker cannot censure any future holder of the note for having purchased it, and for seeking to hold him liable, for it was the faith of the maker in the payee, that he would execute his promise and allow no obstacles to defeat it, that created the note and gave currency to it."

"A great part of the improvement of the country, and of business generally," said the court in Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 296, 40 Am. St. Rep. 373, 24 S. W. 148, "is carried on with money raised by the discount of notes given upon executory contracts; and if the maker could be allowed to defend against such notes, in case of a breach of contract, on the ground that the indorsee, though in other respects bona fide, had knowledge of the transaction out of which the note grew, all confidence in such notes as negotiable paper would be destroyed and such business would be paralyzed. By making and delivering a negotiable note the maker is held to intend that it may be put in circulation, and that no defenses against it exist. In purchasing such note, no inquiry as to the consideration is required. If a failure of consideration occur, the maker must look to the payee for indemnity."

"It is common knowledge," said the court in Miller v. Ottaway, 81 Mich. 196, 8 L.R.A. 428, 21 Am. St. Rep. 513, 45 N. W. 665, "that in many executory contracts, involving large sums of money, such as drafts drawn against bills of lading, and also such as the purchase of real estate, lumbering contracts, construction of buildings and roads, and other business dealings, notes are given, and often negotiated to those familiar with the terms of the contracts; and it would unnecessarily hamper the transfer of such paper, and affect its value injuriously, to hold that the purchaser, before breach of such contract, although he had notice of the contract under which it was given, takes such paper subject to any damages that may arise to the maker from failure of the payee to perform such contract. There is neither reason nor necessity for so holding."

Though the corporate defendant was an indorsee before maturity, it took with full notice of the absolute want of consideration

Should a breach of an executory contract forming the consideration of a promissory note have occurred to the knowledge of the indorsee before his purchase, he would, of course, not be protected. Montgomery v. Hunt, 93 Ga. 438, 21 S. E. 59; Wilson v. Carter, 4 Ga. App. 349, 61 S. E. 494; Bryant v. Sears, 16 Ill. 288; Smith v. Munch, 21 Ill. App. 323; *Miller v. Proof of the failure of an executory consideration for a note is admissible against an assignee if he had actual notice of the facts, or was fairly put upon inquiry in relation to them before his purchase of the note, and on this issue matter on the face of the note showing the nature of the consideration is admissible in evidence in connection with the other facts. Smith v. Munch, 21 Ill. App. 323; Henneberry v. Morse, 56 Ill. 394.

III. Illustrative cases.

a. Miscellaneous executory contracts.

Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461, affirming 4 E. D. Smith, 565, is a leading case. Here the breach of an executory contract to repair a vessel, which formed a part of the consideration for the acceptance of a bill of exchange, was held not to be a defense in whole or in part against indorsees who took the bill for value, with notice of the contract, but without notice of a breach. "The plaintiffs were not bound to inquire," said Denio, J., "whether the vendors of the vessel had performed their agreement. A party receiving a bill is not put upon inquiry unless circumstances of suspicion have come to his knowledge; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for the note, and the note in its hands was subject to the same defenses as if held by Petry.

and I have already said that there was nothing suspicious or out of the common course of business, in the circumstances out of which this bill arose. The agent of the acceptors chose to rely upon the personal responsibility of the vendors of the vessel so far as the repairs were concerned. As they gave their acceptance upon time, which they knew might be transferred to a bona fide holder the next day, so it is presumed they would have parted with their money upon the personal engagement of the vendors if a delay in payment had not been material to them. It would not, in my opinion, alter the case if it could be shown that the vendors, the payees of the bill, had broken their contract respecting the repairs before they negotiated the paper to the plaintiffs, it being found that the latter had no notice of the breach. The plaintiffs were not bound to follow up the transactions between the original parties to the bill. To hold otherwise would attach an inconvenient and repugnant condition to such an acceptance. By accepting simply and unconditionally a negotiable bill, the defendants are to be held as intending to give it all the qualities of commercial paper, one of which is that it shall circulate freely for the purposes of business, and be available in the hands of any holder for value. To decide that one who proposed to purchase it, and who had a knowledge of the nature of the transaction upon which it was given, must await the consummation of that transaction, would essentially impair its character and legal effect. But in this case it was not known to anyone that the payees had broken their agreement when the plaintiffs took the bill. The payees insisted that they had sufficiently repaired the vessel before she was sent to sea, and the plaintiff's agent, though he distrusted her condition as to seaworthiness, concluded to receive and despatch her on her voyage to New York. Before she arrived at her destination the plaintiffs purchased the bill. After that it was demonstrated by the event that the repairs were insufficient, for she leaked to such an extent as to damage the cargo, and required extensive repairs upon her arrival. If, therefore, the plaintiffs had made inquiries when the bill was offered to them they would have learned that the plaintiff's agent had accepted the brig as a seaworthy vessel and had sent her to sea. So far from casting suspicion upon the bill this intelligence would have confirmed them in the belief that it ought to be paid according to its tenor. I conclude, therefore, that there were no merits in the defense."

Melvin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendant from

Where the consideration of a negotiable promissory note was certain services to be performed by the payee to the maker, failure of performance of the services was no defense to an action on the note, brought by a purchaser thereof for value, and before its maturity, though he knew of the consideration, but not of its failure, when he purchased. Wilensky v. Morrison, 122 Ga. 664, 50 S. E. 472; Morrison v. Hart, 122 Ga. 660, 50 S. E. 471.

The acceptor of a bill of exchange cannot defeat a recovery by the indorsee because the latter knew that the bill represented the unpaid balance of the purchase price of a sugar mill constructed by the drawers for the payee, and that such mill, being badly constructed and defective in workmanship and materials, the drawers, at the time of the acceptance, promised to make the necessary repairs at some future time, although the promised repairs were never made. Arthurs v. Hart, 17 How. 6, 15 L. ed. 30.

A default in the performance of an executory contract to deliver certain corporate stock, which was the consideration for a note, will not defeat the right of the holder to recover against the maker, though he may have been advised of the existence of the agreement. Kinkel v. Harper, 7 Colo. App. 45, 42 Pac. 176.

A recital in a note that it is given for two shares of stock "as agreed to under contract" does not charge a bona fide holder with notice of a failure of the consideration arising out of a breach of this contract, nor put him on inquiry as to whether or not the consideration expressed has failed. Brooks v. Floyd, 12 Ga. App. 530, 77 S. E. 877.

an order granting a motion for a new trial. The action was one for the cancellation of a certain promissory note. There were two counts in the complaint, one alleging want of consideration and the other averring failure of consideration. The plaintiff, Philip H. Flood, entered into a contract with one Joseph Petry, by the terms of which the latter was to erect a building on land belonging to plaintiff for the sum of $22,500. There were to be seven progress payments, according to the terms of the contract, six in cash, but the final one partly in cash and partly by a note for the principal sum of $3,500, payable in eighteen months. The seventh payment was to become due when thirty-five days should have expired after the date of acceptance of the building, pro-

Knowledge from the face of a note that it was given for stock in consideration of an agreement to consolidate and reduce such stock does not preclude a bona fide holder for value, without notice of the failure of such consideration, from enforcing the note. Bank of Commerce v. Barrett, 38 Ga. 126, 95 Am. Dec. 384. The court said: "Notice of the consideration alone is nothing. Why should that affect him? That the note was given for money, or a horse, or a house, is wholly immaterial. How can the knowledge that a note was given for a horse be notice that the horse has proven worthless? One can, perhaps, imagine a case in which the mere knowledge of the consideration would involve also the knowledge of its failure,—as when the failure was matter of universal notoriety, or was caused by the party charged, etc.; but so far as appears, this is not such a cause."

Knowledge by the purchaser of a note that it was given to secure a change in the course of a suburban electric railway, and in reliance upon an agreement of indemnity and reimbursement in case the railway should not be constructed and put into operation within a year, does not affect the character of the purchaser as a bona fide holder, where no breach of said agreement had occurred at the time of purchase. Whitehead v. Purdy, 172 Mich. 31, 137 N. W. 684.

The recital in a note that it was given for the construction of certain improvements thereafter to be made can in no way affect the right of the purchaser for value before maturity, as he has the right to assume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, either that the payee has performed his part of the agreement, or that it will be performed. Houston v. Keith, 100 Miss. 83, 56 So. 336.

Indorsees of a promissory note are not put upon inquiry as to a subsequent failure of consideration by a statement or recital in the note that it was given for the privilege of displaying advertising signs in street cars after a certain date, for a stated term, which will not expire until after the maturity of the note. Siegel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank, 131 Ill. 569, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 vided no liens nor claims against the building, lot, or premises should have been filed or recorded. At the time of executing the contract, however, plaintiff signed and delivered to Petry a note which was in the following terms:

San Francisco, Cal., March 15, 1907.

Eighteen months after October 12, 1907, for value received I promise to pay to the order of Joseph Petry the sum of $3,500, with interest thereon in like gold coin from date until paid, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and if the interest be not paid annually, to become as principal, and bear the same rate of interest. This note is negotiable and payable without defalcation or discount and without any relief or benefit whatever from stay, valuation, appraisal, or homestead exemption laws. Due April 12, 1909.

Philip H. Flood.

Petry borrowed $2,000 from the defendant corporation, gave his own notes for that amount, and pledged the note above described as security.

The trial court made findings among which were the following: "That the said promissory note was the note provided in the said contract to be made and delivered to the said defendant Joseph Petry as a part of the seventh payment provided in the said contract to be made, and that the sole consideration for the making, signing, and Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417. The court said: "The most that can be said of a recital in the instrument itself of the consideration upon which it rests is that the indorsee, taking it before maturity, is chargeable with notice of the recital. Such recital, however, is not sufficient of itself to advise him that there was, or would necessarily be, a failure of consideration, but if, at the time of the indorsement, the consideration has in fact failed, the recital might be sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and in connection with other facts amount to notice;" and added, "here the money was payable absolutely on the 1st day of July, 1887,—a time when the contract for the advertising could not have been complete. If the instrument had remained the property of the payee, and upon its maturity . . . suit had been brought, it is clear that no plea of partial failure of consideration could have been sustained, for the reason that the entire term had not then expired [and for the reason that the promise of the makers was based upon the promise of the payee to perform his undertaking at a time subsequent to the day fixed for payment]. No analysis of the instrument itself is necessary. The most careful examination of it will fail to disclose a condition precedent to the payment of the money at the time stipulated. Nor is there anything in the recital of the consideration to put the indorsee upon inquiry at the time indorsement was made. Indeed, it is clear that at that time no inquiry would have led to notice that Dalziel [the payee] would fail to comply with his contract on the 15th of May thereafter, when the term was to commence. All that the recitals would give notice of was that the note was given in consideration of an agreement on the part of the payee that the privilege of advertisement named should be enjoyed by the makers for three months from May 15, 1887. Giving to the language employed its broadest possible meaning, it cannot be construed as notice to the indorsee of the future breach of the contract by Dalziel. The presumption of law would be that the contract would be carried out in good faith, and the consideration performed as stipulated. The 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

makers had put their promissory note into the hands of Dalziel upon an expressed consideration which they were thereafter to receive, and for the performance of which they had seen fit to rely upon the undertaking of Dalziel; and we are aware of no rule by which they can hold the indorsee for value, before due, and before the time of performance was to begin, chargeable with notice that the promise upon which the makers relied would not be kept and performed."

Knowledge on the part of a bank when discounting drafts that they were given in consideration of a promise to deliver coal in the future will not affect its right to enforce payment of them, although the promise is not fulfilled, if it took the drafts for value before maturity, and before the time for delivery had arrived. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Curtis, 167 N. Y. 194, 52 L.R.A. 430, 60 N. E. 429.

Knowledge by a person discounting a bill of exchange in the regular course of business that the bill was drawn against flour supposed to have been shipped in a regular course of dealing between the drawer and acceptor does not defeat his right to recover, although the bills of lading on the faith of which the bill was accepted proved fraudulent. Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 238.

But failure of an executory consideration for a note, such as a breach of an agreement by the payee to procure certain agencies for the maker, may be pleaded as a defense to an action by an indorsee who had notice of the breach at the time of the transfer. Bryant v. Sears, 16 Ill. 288.

And a total breach of the payee's agreement, forming part of the consideration of a note given for patent-right territory, to furnish experienced men to canvass for the makers, and to sell enough rights in the territory to pay off the note before maturity, is a complete defense to a suit brought by a holder who bought the note with notice of the breach. Wilson v. Carter, 4 Ga. App. 349, 61 S. E. 494.

So, in Russ Lumber & Mill Co. v. Muscupiabe Land & Water Co. 120 Cal. 521, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186, 52 Pac. 995, allegations in delivery of the said promissory note was the execution of the said contract by the said defendant Joseph Petry. . . . That at and prior to the time the said promissory note of the plaintiff was indorsed and delivered by the said defendant Joseph Petry to the said defendant the National Bank of the Pacific, the said defendant the National Bank of the Pacific had notice that the sole consideration for the making, signing, and delivery of the said promissory note by the plaintiff to the said defendant Joseph Petry was the execution of the said contract by the said defendant Joseph Petry, and had notice of the terms and conditions of the said contract. That at the time the said promissory note of the plaintiff was given, made, signed, and delivered by the plaintiff to the said defendant Joseph Petry, and at the time the said promissory note of the plaintiff was indorsed and transferred by the said defendant Joseph Petry to the said defendant the National Bank of the Pacific, the said defendant the National Bank of the Pacific had notice that no portion of the work to be done by the said defendant Joseph Petry under and pursuant to the terms of the said contract between the plaintiff and the said defendant Joseph Petry had been done by the said defendant Petry, and had notice that the said work had not been commenced." It was also found that Petry abandoned work on the building on May 22, 1907, after he had received two of the payments for which the contract provided. The court likewise found that the consideration failed as to defendant the answer in an action by an indorsee upon certain promissory notes that the plaintiff had knowledge and notice prior to the transfer of the notes to it that the sole consideration thereof was an agreement of the payee to deliver water to the maker for irrigation purposes; that plaintiff had notice and well knew of the payee's false representation as to its ability to fulfil its contract; and had notice and knowledge of the insolvency of the payee, and of its inability to meet its obligations and to carry out its contract,—were held to present a sufficient defense to require that the demurrer to the answer be overruled.

In Brown v. Willis, 13 Ohio, 26, the note in suit was to be assigned to a third person when the latter should pay a specified sum of money and perform a certain amount of labor, this forming the consideration of the note. The note having been assigned to him, although he had not paid the money nor performed the labor, the court held that he could not enforce the note, there having been a total failure of consideration. Here, of course, there must have been knowledge on his part not only of the nature of the consideration, but of its failure.

In Harris v. Nichols, 26 Ga. 413, it was held that the transferee of a note given for corn could not recover where the corn was subsequently levied upon under executions against the payee, and sold, so that the maker got none of it, the transferee not only knowing the consideration, but that there was some doubt about the corn, having told the maker that if he did not get the corn, he would not have to pay.

A note made to enable the payee to pay a third person, and applied to that purpose, thus fulfilling the object of the transaction, is valid in the hands of the latter, although he knew before he received it that it was originally given on the promise of the payee to give stock for it on the next day, and that such promise remained unfulfilled. Ferdon v. Jones, 2 E. D. Smith, 106.

b. Executory warranties.

One who purchases for value and before maturity, and in the ordinary course of business, negotiable paper given as part consideration for a jack purchased by the makers from the payee, with knowledge that it was made in consideration of an executory contract of warranty as a foal getter, but without knowledge of the failure of the warranty, or of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry until after his purchase, takes it free from any defense by the maker because of the breach of warranty. Rublee v. Davis, 33 Neb. 779, 29 Am. St. Rep. 509, 51 N. W. 135. The court said: "At the time the notes were indorsed to the plaintiff it was not known to the makers that there would be a breach of warranty, so had inquiry been made of the defendants, at or prior to the purchase of the paper, the plaintiff would not have ascertained that any defenses existed against the same. Although the plaintiff knew when he bought the notes for what they were given and that the jack was warranted, that fact alone is not sufficient to prevent the plaintiff from being a bona fide holder. To have that effect, he must also have known when he bought the notes that the warranty had failed, or possessed knowledge of the facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry, which, if followed, would have led to its discovery. This the record fails to disclose. It only inferentially appears that there has been a breach of the warranty, and there is no finding of fact as to the actual value of the jack. Unless he was entirely worthless and possessed no value, there could not have been an entire failure of the consideration given for the notes. While it is doubtless true that the value of a jack depends largely upon his capability to produce foals, yet we cannot take judicial notice that where a jack is not a sure foal getter he has no marketable value."

Mere knowledge that a note was given in consideration of an executory agreement or contract of the payee, such as a warranty on the sale of a cow, for the purchase price of which the note was given, that such cow was a breeder, and was thereafter to be bred and delivered in calf to the maker, will not deprive an indorsee of the character of a bona fide holder if he has no notice of a breach of that agreement or contract. Mc-

Petry (who had not answered, and against whom a default had been entered).

Respondent insists that the motion for a new trial was properly granted, because the consideration for the note was not the execution of the contract by Petry, but was the completion of the building in accordance with the terms of the contract. Appellant contends, however, that the findings are sustained by evidence in which there is no substantial conflict, and that failure of consideration is not a defense open to a maker as against an indorsee for value, even in a case where the indorsee knew that the note was intended to be the evidence of an indebtedness that would become due if an executory promise were performed. In behalf of his contention, respondent,

Dr. Flood, contends that since the note and contract were executed at the same time, and since there is evidence tending to establish the knowledge of that fact by the defendant corporation, the whole transaction must be considered together, its parts must be construed as forming one agreement, and that therefore the consideration of the note must have been that mentioned in the building contract, the completion of the structure, and its acceptance free from all liens. This was the view taken by the justices of the district court of appeal, but we find ourselves unable to agree with them. It seems to us that the delivery of the promissory note (which by its express terms was made negotiable) long before the time mentioned for the pay-

A breach of the agreement of the payee in a note given for the purchase price of a stallion to replace him with another should be prove not to be a reasonably sure foal getter, as warranted, there being no evidence of any breach prior to the transfer of the note to a bona fide purchaser, does not affect his right to enforce the note against the makers, although he had full knowledge of the original consideration. Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174. The court said that there was no evidence of notice or knowledge of the breach of the contract in so far as the failure of the horse to comply with the warranty was concerned before the transfer, and added: "The purchaser of notes may have knowledge of a collateral agreement, but he is not obliged to inquire whether the seller has performed his agreement or will be able to perform the agreement into which he has entered."

Knowledge of a warranty on a sale of live stock in which a promissory note was given for the purchase price will not affect the rights of a bona fide purchaser of such note for value, before maturity, if he had no knowledge of the breach of the warranty. Miller v. Ottaway, 81 Mich. 196, 8 L.R.A. 428, 21 Am. St. Rep. 513, 45 N. W. 665.

A breach of the manufacturer's guaranty of a machine, for the purchase price of which a note was given, is not a defense to a suit by the purchaser of the note for value and before maturity, although he had full knowledge of the terms of the contract of sale. Detroit Sav. Bank v. Towers, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 246.

The words "for one Hinckley Knitting Machine, warranted," expressed the consideration of the note. Giving to the words the broadest possible meaning, said the court in Mabie v. Johnson, 8 Hun, 309, they do not imply that there has been a breach of the warranty by which the maker has sustained damages. They cannot be construed as notice to the purchaser of a defense to the note in the hands of the payee. If they do it must be because the law will 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

presume a breach wherever there is a warranty. That would be preposterous.

Knowledge on the part of an indorsee that the note was given in a transaction in which the makers had bought from the payees the right to sell a safety sash lock which the payees guaranteed would be manufactured "as per sample" does not affect the character of the indorsee as a bona fide holder where there was no evidence tending to establish any breach of such agreement at the time he became indorsee. Bank of Sampson v. Hatcher, 151 N. C. 359, 134 Am. St. Rep. 989, 66 N. E. 308.

Mere knowledge on the part of an indorsee for value and before maturity that a guaranty to be performed by or before a date two months after the note matures was the consideration is not sufficient to put him on notice that the payee had failed or would fail to perform. Hudson v. Best, 104 Ga. 131, 30 S. E. 688. The court said that if the maker, when he told the indorsee of the guaranty, had told him at the same time that the payee had failed to perform, and that for this reason he had a defense to the note, this might be sufficient.

c. Future rent.

In Splivallo v. Patten, 38 Cal. 138, 99 Am. Dec. 358, it was held to be no defense to an action upon a promissory note brought by an assignee in good faith, for value, before maturity, that the original consideration for the note was the rent for one year of certain lands of which the payee claimed to be the owner, and of which one of the makers was in possession, and that after about four months of such term the title of the payee failed, by reason of which a partial failure of the original consideration for the note resulted, and that the assignee had, at the time of the assignment, full knowledge of the consideration for which the note was given.

Knowledge by the holder that the note was given for future rent for a hotel will not defeat his right to recover against the maker because the rented premises were afterwards sold to satisfy an outstanding mortgage and vendor's privilege, thus dement of the final instalment upon the building, precludes the maker of the instrument, upon the simplest principles of estoppel, from asserting that its only consideration was the completion of the building. The plaintiff's own account of the matter is, in substance, that he and the architect met at the latter's office; that Petry, the contractor, was there also; that after he had signed the contract and blueprints, the architect said, "About this note;" and that thereupon the note was passed to Dr. Flood, who signed it and handed it back to the architect, who delivered it to the contractor. Dr. Flood denied the statement made by the contractor in his testimony that the latter said during this conversation that he might want to borrow money on the note or to use it for security. It was in evidence that Petry exhibited the contract to the president of the defendant bank before that document was signed and had some conversation about wishing to borrow money if he could obtain a note from Dr. Flood. For the purposes of this appeal we must, of course, take the version of the transaction most favorable to the plaintiff. We then have this state of facts: Dr. Flood delivered to the contractor at the time of the execution of the contract a note which, under the terms of that agreement, he was not required to execute until after the completion of the building and the payment of all liens; he said nothing, but the note contained the declaration in terms that it was negotiable.

stroying the lease, and compelling the maker to rent the property from the purchaser at the sale. Saddler v. White, 14 La. Ann. 173. The court said: "In the present case, there was a valid consideration promised for the obligation, and it could not be known with certainty that it would fail, until the hotel was sold, for the payee could, up to the sale, have satisfied the debt due for the price of the hotel, and have satisfied the consideration by allowing defendants to occupy the same. The case would present a different aspect if the allegations of the answer had been, not that plaintiff knew there might be, but that there were equities between the original parties to the note, or that he knew not that the consideration might never be enjoyed, but that it could not or would not ever be realized."

Knowledge by the purchaser from the face of the notes that the consideration was rent is not sufficient to charge him with notice that the consideration might fail by reason of the failure of the payee, who was himself a lessee, the maker being a sublessee, to pay his rent, and thus require the maker to pay rent to the owners if they should elect to recognize him as their tenant. Simmons v. Council, 5 Ga. App. 386, 63 S. E. 238.

The recital in a note that it was given for future rent does not charge a purchaser with notice of a possible eviction under a foreclosure sale, where he had no notice prior to his purchase of the pendency of the foreclosure suit. Adoue v. Tankersley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 28 S. W. 346.

The knowledge on the part of a purchaser, derived from the face of the note, that it was given for future rent for a term which would not expire until after the note would mature, does not charge him with notice of a possible failure of consideration by the foreclosure of a vendor's lien on the premises, which might require the maker to attorn to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. Buchanan v. Wren, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 560, 30 S. W. 1077.

d. Failure of payee's title.

forms the consideration of a promissory note, is not a defense in whole or in part against an indorsee who took the note for value before maturity, although he knew the nature of the consideration, where the breach occurred subsequent to the transfer, and he could at the time have had no knowledge of it. United States Nat. Bank v. Floss, 38 Or. 68, 84 Am. St. Rep. 752, 62 Pac. 751.

The failure of the payee in a note given for the purchase of a share in his interest in a Mexican land grant, to perform the condition upon which he was to be entitled to such interest, only amounts to a failure of consideration, and cannot affect the previously acquired rights of an indorsee who knew the nature of the consideration. Alderson v. Cheatham, 10 Yerg. 304.

Knowledge by an assignee in due course of a negotiable note that it was given for the purchase price of a specified quantity of land, at a specified price per acre, is not notice to him that the payee's title to the property will fail, or that there is a shortage in quantity. Dollar Sav. & T. Co. v. Crawford, 69 W. Va. 109, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 587, 70 S. E. 1089.

The recital in a note that it is given for part of the purchase price of certain described real property, though fully notifying the assignee or purchaser of the true consideration, is not of itself sufficient to advise him that there was or would necessarily be a failure of the consideration, but it is evidence in connection with other evidence to be considered by the jury on the question of notice. Henneberry v. Morse, 56 Ill. 394.

Knowledge that the notes were given for land, and that there was a lien on such land for unpaid purchase money, and that there might thereafter occur a partial failure of consideration by an enforcement of the lien, does not render the purchaser subject to all the equities that may thereafter arise between the original parties. Merchants' & P. Bank v. Penland, 101 Tenn. 445, 47 S. W. 693. In this case the purchaser was evicted, and his grantor became insolvent, but both after the transfer.

So far as Howard v. Kimball, 65 N. C.

Assuming that the president of the defendant bank knew all of these facts, the note would simply appear to him as an advance payment on an executory contract. If Dr. Flood had said to Petry, "Take this note, and, if you like, negotiate it," the bank, knowing that fact, would have been justified in accepting it for a valuable consideration before maturity and before breach of the executory contract. But he did say substantially the same thing more emphatically than by word of mouth. He wrote it. It was to that extent a waiver of the terms of the building contract, and was a payment before performance, upon an executory agreement. There is no pleading nor assertion that Petry could not or did not intend to perform, and that the officers of the bank knew of his incapacity. On the contrary, it appears without contradiction that Petry did undertake and did partially execute the work on the building. The bank was therefore a bona fide holder of the note for value.

It has long been the law in California that a failure of consideration in whole or in part after a bona fide assignment of a promissory note is no defense to a suit by the assignee against the maker, notwithstanding the former's full knowledge of the original consideration for which the note was given. In the case of Splivallo v. Paten, 38 Cal. 139, 99 Am. Dec. 358, the original consideration for the note in suit, according to the complaint, was the rent of certain premises for one year. Before the 175, 6 Am. Rep. 739, is authority for the doctrine that promissory notes expressing on their face that they are given for the purchase price of a specified tract of land charge a purchaser of the notes, who knew that the vendor of the land had given a bond to make title, with notice that the notes cannot be collected unless a good title be made, it is, as is shown in subd. II, supra, of this note, discredited even in the court which decided it. But as the facts in that case show that the purchaser had positive notice of a defect in the vendee's title before he purchased the notes, and had taken a deed for the land in trust to make title on payment of the purchase money, thereby taking upon himself the relation of vendor toward the maker, the court was doubtless correct in holding that he could not enforce the notes as against the maker.

A purchaser of a note knowing that it was given by the maker as the last payment for land purchased by him from the payee, that the latter had entered into a written contract to execute a deed to the maker upon the payment of such note, that the payee was a married man at the time of making such contract to convey, and that his wife had not joined him in such contract and was then living, is charged with knowledge of the legal right of the maker to insist upon a complete conveyance by the grantor and the wife, or to accept the deed of the grantor alone, and retain so much of the purchase money as shall be equivalent to his wife's interest. This right of the maker and vendee was an equity which attached itself to the note in the hands of the payee that could be made available in an action on the note by him. The indorsee of the note, with full knowledge of the facts out of which this equity arises, can occupy no better position than the payee. Zebley v. Sears, 38 Iowa, 507.

One who purchases for value from a vendor the obligation of his vendee, and obtains the latter's promissory note, payable to himself, as evidence of such obligation, with full knowledge that it represents the final payment on the purchase price of land which he knows the vendor has conveyed with covenants of warranty and against encum-brances, that he knows were broken when made, takes the note subject to the right of the maker to reduce the amount of recovery thereon by the amount of the damages sustained by reason of the partial failure of consideration, brought about by the defects in the title. Williams v. Neely, 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 134 Fed. 1.

The fact that the indorsee of a note given for the purchase price of land paid nothing for the note, holding it for collection only, is sufficient to account for the ruling in Bronson v. Silverman, 77 Pa. 94, that a breach of the agreement of the payee to make, execute, and deliver to the maker a written contract as his title thereto was a good defense against the indorsee, who took the note with full knowledge of the consideration and the circumstances under which it was given.

In Anthony v. Slonaker, 18 Ind. 273, it appeared that the maker of the note had successfully defeated a suit by the indorsee on the ground that the note was given in part consideration for a piece of land, and that the payee had neither conveyed nor offered to convey the land according to the terms of his agreement, whereupon the indorsee sued his immediate indorser. The latter contended that it was the duty of the indorsee, knowing the consideration for which the note was given, to see that the payee made or offered to make a conveyance of the land; but the court said that this was a matter about which the indorsee was under no obligation to trouble himself; that he had a right to sue the maker on the note, and if a legal defense was successfully set up, his right of action against his indorser was perfect.

e. Insurance cases.

A breach of an agreement on the part of the payees forming part of the consideration for a promissory note, that they should procure an insurance for the amount of the note on the adventure or charter of a certain brig belonging to the maker, for his benefit, and, in case the vessel should be lost, should collect the amount due on the policy for the maker's benefit and payment expiration of the term the landlord's title failed. Defendant alleged that the assignee of the note, having full knowledge of the consideration for it, was in the same position as the landlord would have been if he had not indorsed and delivered the note to the plaintiff. This court sustained a judgment entered after a demurrer to the answer had been sustained. The same rule is stated in 7 Cyc. at page 947, and Spilvallo v. Patten, supra, is cited in support thereof.

In Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 232, 72 Am. Dec. 461, it is held that the breach of an executory contract which formed the consideration for the acceptance of a bill of exchange is not a defense against indorsees who took the bill for value with notice of the contract, but without notice of its breach. In that case Judge Denio, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If one will issue his negotiable paper and send it into the world, in consideration of an engagement of the party with whom he deals to do some act for his benefit in future, he declares in effect that he will pay the note or bill according to its terms to anyone who shall become the holder for value in the course of business, and rely for his own indemnity upon the promise he has received as the consideration for issuing it." See also Patten v. Gleason, 106 Mass. 439; Rublee v. Davis, 33 Neb. 781, 29 Am. St. Rep. 509, 51 N. W. 135; Alderson v. Cheatham, 10 Yerg. 304.

of the note, or should assign the policy to the maker, is no defense to an action against the maker, brought by an indorsee for value and before maturity, who knew of the existence of the agreement. Patten v. Gleason, 106 Mass. 439. "If the payees had brought an action upon this agreement against the defendant, the facts alleged," said the court, "might have constituted a defense pro tanto. But the plaintiffs in this action being indorsees of a negotiable note given for good consideration, and negotiable before any valid defense existed, and before its maturity, hold it by an independent title not subject to equities that might arise subsequently. It is not alleged that they became liable for the performance of the contract of the Lewisohn Company [the payees]; and certainly they are not subject to an oral agreement varying the terms of the note."

The indorsee of a negotiable note, purchasing it for value before maturity, may recover in an action against the maker, though, when taking the note, he knew that it was given in payment of a premium of a policy of marine insurance which contained a stipulation that, in case of loss, the note was not to be paid, but its amount was to be deducted from the amount of the loss, and although before maturity such contingency actually occurred. Adams v. Smith, 35 Me. 324.

Where one makes a written application for a policy of life insurance, and executes a promissory note, the proceeds of which are to be used to pay the first premium, and the purchaser of the note takes it with notice that the policy has not at that time been issued, such purchaser, though he purchases the note for value and before maturity, incurs the risk of a possible failure of the insurance company to deliver to the maker such a policy as is described in the application. Shedden v. Heard, 110 Ga. 461, 35 S. E. 707. Same case on second writ of error, 113 Ga. 162, 38 S. E. 387. "It was contended by counsel for plaintiff," said the court in the decision on the first writ of error, "that the fact plaintiff knew, when this note was purchased, for what consideration it was given, cannot be considered as charging him with any notice of a failure of that consideration. This is unquestionably true as a general principle of law; but we do not think it is applicable to this case. It appears from the record that the plaintiff, when he purchased this note, not only knew of its consideration, but also knew that at that time the policy applied for, and for which the note was given, had not been delivered to the maker; for the plaintiff himself forwarded the money to the company in order to get that policy. We think, therefore, with a knowledge of these facts, the plaintiff, when he purchased the note, manifestly incurred the risk of the defendant's not receiving the policy for which he applied; and if the company had not sent to the applicant such a policy, but one entirely different, the plaintiff in this case could not have pleaded that he was an innocent holder as against this defense. For instance, if one should purchase a negotiable note before maturity, for value, and at the time of the purchase knew not only its consideration, but further knew the fact that the article or thing of value, for which the note was given, had not been delivered to the maker, such a purchaser would necessarily incur the risk of a failure of consideration of the note by a possible nondelivery of the thing purchased. While the answer in this case does not specifically say that the plaintiff bought this note when he knew the policy had not been delivered, and probably was open to special demurrer on this ground, yet the answer does contain allegations from which such knowledge might be inferred on the part of the general agent of the company; and we therefore cannot say that the court erred in overruling the general demurrer. This knowledge, however, upon the part of the plaintiff, was uncontradicted. It clearly appeared from the testimony, and had there been a special demurrer, it could have been readily met by amendment."

Knowledge by a bank cashier that a note indorsed to the bank by a life insurance solicitor was given for the first premium on a proposed policy, and was to be returned to the maker should his application be rejected, charges the bank with knowledge of clared to be the true one in cases where the holder of the note knew of the contract, but not of the breach thereof, at the time of taking title to the negotiable paper. It is, of course, equally applicable where a person has acquired a note in good faith, for value, before maturity, knowing that the consideration was an executory agreement on the part of the payee which might be broken, and which was in fact violated after the transfer of the note. In Kinkel v. Harper, 7 Colo. App. 53, 42 Pac. 176, the court said: "Whenever a bill or note is disposed of for a valuable consideration, the holder is not bound to inquire whether the indorser has performed or will be able to perform the agreement into which he has entered, so long as there is nothing suspicious or out of the usual course of business in the circumstances attending its issue. Miller v. Ottaway, 81 Mich. 196, 8 L.R.A. 428, 21 Am. St. Rep. 513, 45 N. W. 665; Adams v. Smith, 35 Me. 324; Patten v. Gleason, 106 Mass. 439; State Nat. Bank v. Cason, 39 La. Ann. 865, 2 So. 881; Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461; Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 238; Bond v. Wiltse, 12 Wis. 611." A very instructive case is Siegel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank, 131 Ill. 570, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417. The note which was discussed in that case expressed as the consideration the privilege of placing advertising signs in certain cars for a definite period. The consideration wholly failed after the transfer of the note to defendant. That was the defective title, and a breach of faith, and fraud of the payee in negotiating the note, and the bank was therefore not a bona fide holder, and could not enforce the note against the maker, where he failed to pass the medical examination, and the insurance policy was for that reason not issued. Citizen's State Bank v. Garceau, 22 N. D. 576, 134 N. W. 882.

f. Bohemian oats and similar cases.

There is nothing in the Bohemian oats, Red Lyon wheat, and other similar cases which militates against the doctrine of the foregoing decisions. They are readily explainable either on the theory that, the transaction being so blatant a fraud, knowledge of the nature of the consideration charged the purchaser with knowledge that it would fail, or that, the whole transaction being against public policy, and the purchaser having knowledge thereof, he could not enforce the notes.

The latter explanation is the one adopted in Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174, where the court says that the Bohemian oats cases have no application to the question under consideration, because "knowledge of those contracts or bonds was knowledge of fraud, and of contracts made in violation of law, and against public policy." This is also the opinion of Sherwood, Ch. J., in Sutton v. Beckwith, 68 Mich. 303, 13 Am. St. Rep. 344, 36 N. W. 79, where, in a special concurring opinion, he says: "The contract under consideration was a gross fraud from . . . beginning to . . . end, and, on the part of the parties procuring it, was even worse,—it was criminal in character,—and furnishes no case for the application of the just and equitable principles underlying and controlling commercial law, and to attempt to apply them to a case like this is a perversion of the doctrine; and an appeal to the adjudicated cases establishing this doctrine is only giving colorable dignity to one of the worst swindles perpetrated upon the present generation, and should be treated by all courts as such. The transaction is one wherein the intention to cheat and defraud is apparent to all upon the face of the contract sought to be enforced, except to the ignorant and unsuspecting, and, in my judgment, is against public policy and void. If there were any doubt upon this subject, the recent legislation in this state, making the transaction a felony, should be regarded as conclusive. Certain it is that no person owning and holding or having knowledge of the entire contract can be considered as a bona fide holder of the paper, and it is questionable whether a holder of any part of the contract should be so regarded."

There is no claim, said the court in Merrill v. Hole, 85 Iowa, 66, 52 N. W. 4,—a Bohemian oats case,—that mere notice by the holder that the consideration for the note was the sale of oats and a bond to sell the maker's crop on commission would be notice of want or failure of consideration, but the claim is that notice of this kind of sale and bond would be, because of their being illegal and void. The court held that if the holder's agent knew of newspaper notices giving the details of Bohemian oats transactions, and knew that the note in question was given in such a transaction, and made no inquiry, he would be a purchaser in bad faith.

Sutton v. Beckwith, 68 Mich. 303, 13 Am. St. Rep. 344, 36 N. W. 79, is typical of this class of cases. Here knowledge by the purchaser of a note that it was given for Bohemian oats at $10 a bushel, and upon the consideration set forth in a contemporaneous agreement to sell for the makers 80 bushels of oats at that price before calling for payment of the note, was held to defeat the right of the purchaser to enforce the note against the maker, although there had been no breach of the agreement at the time of the purchase of the note. The court said: "It is evident that the consideration of the note in suit was not the 40 bushels of oats at $10 per bushel, but the agreement or bond executed and delivered at the same time as the note. The transaction as a whole appealed to the cupidity of the maker. He was to receive $800 for 80 bushels of oats before he was to pay $400 for the 40 bushels delivered to him. This agreement held to be no defense against the holder for value. The court uses the following language at pages 572 and 573 of 131 Ill.: "There is a distinction, clearly recognized in the authorities, between an instrument payable at a particular day, and one payable upon the happening of some event; and the rule is that, where the parties insert a specific date of payment, the instrument is then payable at all events,—and this, although, in the same instrument, an uncertain and different time of payment may be mentioned, as that it shall be payable upon a particular day, or upon the completion of a house, or the performance of other contracts, and the like. McCarty v. Howell, 24 Ill. 341, and authorities supra." Again, at page 574 of 131 Ill., speaking of the breach of the agreement by Dalziel, the payee, the court said further: "The makers had put their promissory note into the hands of Dalziel upon an expressed consideration which they were thereafter to receive, and for the performance of which they had seen fit to rely upon the undertaking of Dalziel, and we are aware of no rule by which they can hold this indorsee for value, before due and before the time of performance was to begin, chargeable with notice that the promise upon which the makers relied would not be kept and performed. Wade, Notice, § 94a; Loomis v. Mowry, 8 Hun, 312; Davis v. McCreedy, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461." Appellant's contention is supported by abundant authority. Indeed, as was said by Chief Justice Weaver of the supreme court of Iowa in McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 392, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 859, 15 Ann. Cas. 665: "The courts quite universally hold that knowledge that a note was given in considera-was what he acted and relied upon, and formed the consideration of this note. He would never have given it for the 40 bushels of oats independent of the promise in the bond. The oats he received cut but little figure in the dealing in the mind of the defendant."

This decision was followed in several similar cases, such as Mace v. Kennedy, 68 Mich. 389, 36 N. W. 187, and McNamara v. Gargett, 68 Mich. 454, 13 Am. St. Rep. 355, 36 N. W. 218, in the latter of which cases the court said: "It is not intended to run counter to the rules of the law merchant governing negotiable instruments, but we have taken the note and bond together as forming the contract between the parties, and construing them together as though written upon the same piece of paper, and as between the original parties and those purchasing with notice, we hold such contracts void." And in the later case of Ward v. Doane, 77 Mich. 328, 43 N. W. 980, the court said: "It is a fact of which courts have taken knowledge that notes known as Bohemian oats notes are all obtained and given up on a scheme or arrangement similar one to the other, and void as against public policy between the makers and the payee or any other person having knowledge or information of the scheme upon which they are based and by which they are procured;" and held that where the purchaser testified that he had read of this Bohemian oat scheme and knew that some farmers were getting into it, the jury should have been told that if they found that he knew the note was given for Bohemian oats, or was so informed before his purchase, he could not enforce the note against the maker.

So, in Davis v. Seeley, 71 Mich. 209, 38 N. W. 901, the court approved an instruction in an action on a Red Lyon wheat note, brought by an indorsee against the maker, that "if the jury find that the consideration upon which the note was given was the bond of a company whereby the company agreed to sell ordinary wheat under the fictitious name of Red Lyon wheat, at the speculative value of $15 per bushel, whereas its real value was not to exceed $1 per bushel, then such notes are void and plaintiff cannot recover if at or before the time he purchased it he had knowledge that this note was given on such consideration."

"It would seem strange," said the court in Goodrich v. McDonald, 77 Mich. 486, 43 N. W. 1019, "that a man of average intelligence, after all that has been said through the public press of Bohemian oat and Red Lyon wheat deals, and the frauds practised upon the unwary by sharpers engaged in such questionable transactions, should not, when making a purchase of $900 worth of notes, and being told that they were given in a wheat deal, make some inquiry, at least of the seller, what the wheat deal was. These matters are of such common knowledge that a jury would naturally take with some degree of suspicion the statement of a purchaser who is informed that a note is given in an oat deal or a wheat deal, and yet claims to have made no further inquiry, and insists that he is an innocent purchaser. It may be true; but it would, under proper circumstances, be a question of fact, for the determination of the jury. The facts that came to his notice were that $900 in notes had been taken from parties in the sale of wheat. These notes were against different parties, the defendant's note among them. An ordinarily prudent business man would naturally inquire why these men were buying wheat, and why the sellers were taking notes for a commodity which has a present cash value, and for which there is always a ready market for cash. It is a staple production, and represents so much cash; the values being quoted in the market from day to day, and very rarely sold in such quantities on time. These facts, with the almost common and universal knowledge that wheat and oat deals were being fraudulently made, are circumstances which the jury should be permitted tion of the executory agreement or contract of the payee which has not been performed will not deprive the indorsee of the character of a bona fide holder, unless he also has notice of the breach of the agreement or contract." Other authorities which state substantially the same doctrine are State Nat. Bank v. Cason, 39 La. Ann. 866, 2 So. 881; Pavey v. Stauffer, 45 La. Ann. 354, 19 L.R.A. 716, 12 So. 512; Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 240; Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Curtis, 167 N. Y. 196, 52 L.R.A. 430, 60 N. E. 429; Black v. First Nat. Bank, 96 Md. 414, 54 Atl. 88; Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 305, 40 Am. St. Rep. 373, 24 S. W. 148; Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. — Tenn. —, 35 L.R.A. 678, 37 S. W. 1102.

In 2 Randolph on Commercial Paper, in § 1019, the rule is thus formulated: "Knowledge of an executory consideration is not knowledge of its failure, or of a breach of the agreement which formed the consideration. And a fortiori, notice of the agreement is not notice of equities arising out of it after the transfer of the note. But, if the purchaser knows that the consideration has failed, he is not a bona fide holder." In support of the last statement the learned author cites Russ Lumber & Mill Co. v. Muscupiabe Land & Water Co. 120 Cal. 522, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186, 52 Pac. 995, a case upon which the plaintiff here seems to place great reliance. An examination of that case shows, however, that it is not in conflict with the case of Splivallo v. Patten, supra. In the Russ Case the court was considering a pleading in which it was averred that the holder of the note given in consideration of a promise to furnish water in the future had full knowledge when he took the paper that the transaction was fraudulent, and that the payee of the note was to take into consideration in determining the bona fides of such purchasers."

Knowledge by the purchaser of a note that it was given for Bohemian oats under an agreement that the note was not to be paid unless the payee should sell for the maker 100 bushels of his crop at $10 a bushel prevents the purchaser from enforcing the note against the maker where the condition has not been fulfilled. Johnson v. First Nat. Bank, 24 Ill. App. 352. The court said that the purchaser stood in the shoes of the payee, and that the case differed from those where the consideration of a note simply rests on the covenant or agreement of a third party to do or perform some act, and the agreement does not make the consideration of the note invalid in case it is not performed.

Watson v. Blossom, 18 N. Y. S. R. 726, 4 N. Y. Supp. 489, is another Bohemian oats case where the main consideration for the note was an agreement to sell for the maker on commission 68 bushels of oats at $15 a bushel. There was evidence tending to show that the indorsee was advised before his purchase of the deal and contract pursuant to which the note was given, and understood the fraudulent character of the seller's transactions. This is, the court held, sufficient to present the question to the jury as to whether he was chargeable with notice of the fraud, and as a consequence should be denied the character of bona fide purchaser or holder.

Similar to the Bohemian oats fraud was the Hulless oats swindle, an example of which is found in Griffith v. Shipley, 74 Md. 591, 14 L.R.A. 405, 22 Atl. 1107. Here the payee gave a bond to sell for the makers on commission 40 bushels of Hulless oats at $10 a bushel. In an action by the indorsee against the maker the court said: "As between the original parties to the note, and as against all who subsequently took it after maturity, or who took it by transfer before maturity, with notice or knowledge of the facts of the transaction out of which the note had its origin, the bond and note must be taken together as forming parts of one and the same contract, and must be construed together as constituting the entire contract between the parties. It is very apparent that the note would not have been given without the bond, and that the bond formed the principal, if not the entire, inducement to the making of the note. The stipulations of the bond have not been performed, and, with the knowledge of the deception in regard to the oats, it is most improbable that the party giving it ever supposed that the bond could be performed. The consideration for the note, therefore, has utterly failed; or rather, no valid or substantial consideration for it ever existed; and therefore no holder of the note is entitled to recover thereon, except a party who may have in good faith acquired title to the note before maturity and for value."

Differing in kind but not in intent is the swindle disclosed in Fink v. Chambers, 95 Mich. 508, 55 N. W. 375, where the consideration for the note was a contract to establish a local fence manufactory, appoint the maker a local sales agent, keep the manufactured fence in stock, and aid in effecting sales. The evidence justified a finding, said the court, that the contract was part of a fraudulent scheme to obtain this and other notes without any consideration, and hence if the indorsee knew that there was a fence contract behind the note, that was sufficient to put her on inquiry, she having bought other similar notes.

Similarly, where the purchaser for less than face value of a note payable six months after date at a specified fence factory in the purchaser's own town, which he knew had no existence, had notice that the note was given for some kind of a township right by some sort of contract, it was held that he was put on inquiry and was affected with knowledge of all that the inquiry would disclose,—in this case, fraud and failure of consideration. Farthing v. Dark, 109 N. C. 291, 13 S. E. 918.

insolvent, and never intended to keep the agreement to furnish water for irrigation. The plaintiff was found not to be a bona fide holder of the note for value and without notice of the equities. In this case there was no pretense that the bank was a party to any fraud or knew of Petry's inability to perform the stipulation of his contract.

Respondent contends that the contract in this case should be regarded in the same light as a mortgage given for future advances, and the note as an adjunct thereto, and that the equities must therefore prevail against the bank just as they might prevent the assignee of a non-negotiable note supported by a mortgage upon the security of which nothing had been advanced, from enforcing the payment of such non-negotiable instrument if he had taken it with notice or means of knowing that no advances had been actually made. It is true that, whether negotiable in form or not, a note secured by a contemporary mortgage on land, executed as a part of one transaction, is subject to the equities and is not in fact negotiable if taken with notice of the existence of the mortgage. Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110; Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 129, 121 Pac. 381; Civ. Code, § 1642; National Hardwood Co. v. Sherwood, — Cal. —, 130 Pac. 881. And if, in the present case, the note had been placed in escrow for delivery after the completion of the building which was to be constructed under the contract, and the defendant corporation, knowing that fact, had taken it, the rule announced in the cases cited above might be applicable; but, as was held in the case last mentioned, the maker of a note, even if ordinarily it would be subject to the defense of want of consideration, may by his conduct waive the benefit of such defense. In the present case, the note, although made payable at a time subsequent to a certain mentioned future date, did not for that reason bear on its face any evidence of non-negotiability. True, that method of computing the time of maturity of an instrument is not usual, but in and of itself that fact gave no hint of the contract for building a house. Moreover, the note bore the deliberate declaration that it was negotiable, and it was not marked in any way as a part of the final payment to be made under the building contract. By placing it in the hands of Petry, as we have indicated, Dr. Flood gave to the contractor the means of using it improperly if Petry had not intended to construct the building. All of the circumstances of the case gave to the bank the right to conclude that the instrument was delivered as an advance payment on the contract, and brings the case within the rule that, "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer." Civ. Code, § 3543.

It is conceded by the appellant corporation, as of course it must be, that a trial court has the very widest discretion in the matter of granting a motion for a new trial; but it is submitted that no other rational conclusions could have been reached by the superior court under the evidence than those indicated by the findings. With this position of the appellant we agree.

The order granting a new trial is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to the lower court to enter the judgment originally given.

We concur: Sloss, J.; Lorigan, J.; Henshaw, J.

Shaw, J.:

I concur in the judgment solely on the ground that the conduct of Flood in executing the note, under the circumstances stated in the opinion of Justice Melvin, and the terms of the note itself, show that it was his intention that the note was to be negotiated by Petry, if he chose, before its maturity and prior to the completion of the building contracted for, and that these facts create an estoppel against Flood which prevents him from asserting the failure of the consideration of the note against a third person who took it for value with knowledge of the fact that the consideration was the completion of the building free from liens or claims, provided, as was the fact here, the person took the note before the failure of consideration occurred. I think the building contract and the note constituted the parts of a single agreement, and that, under the terms of the agreement as a whole, the consideration of the note was not the mere promise of Petry to erect the building, but the actual erection thereof free from liens or claims; and that the failure to so complete it would have been available to Flood as a defense to the note if it had remained in the hands of Petry.

Petitions for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down May 14, 1913:

The judgment hereinbefore entered is amended by striking therefrom the words, "And the cause is remanded with instructions to the lower court to enter the judgment originally given." This clause was inadvertently inserted in the judgment of this court. The previous part of the judgment having reversed the order granting a new trial, and there having been no appeal from the judgment, the original judgment was thereby left wholly unaffected and it stands as the judgment of the court below as of its original date. The clause stricken out was unnecessary.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

AMY CAREY

v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(84 Kan. 274, 114 Pac. 197.)

Master — injury to employee seeking shelter under car.

A number of workmen were employed in uncovering rock in a quarry operated by a Headnote by MASON, J.

Note. — Negligence in going, without previous notice, under or between cars liable to be moved at any time.

As to contributory negligence in attempting to cross a train standing on a crossing, see notes in 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1066, and 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 466.

For liability of railroad for injuries to one not an employee, by closing gap between standing cars at point other than a highway crossing, see note to Brackett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 558.

As to negligence of employee of railroad in stepping between moving cars, see note to Korab v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 32.

As to walking in front of moving car to prepare coupling as negligence, see note to New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hamlin, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 881.

For contributory negligence as defense to servant's action for injuries from a violation of the master's statutory duty, where the statute excludes the defense of assumption of risk, see note to Dumphy v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1152.

A case very similar on the facts to CAREY v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. is Mitchell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Ark. —, 151 S. W. 520, where a brakeman injured by the moving of a car under which he had crawled to get in the shade while guarding a work train against approaching trains was held guilty of negligence, his failure to look out for approaching trains imperiling his position being an act of negligence barring recovery, notwithstanding any negligence on the part of other train men. This seems to be the only case where, like in CAREY v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co., the person was injured while seeking shelter under a car.

It is generally held that a railroad employee when about to put himself in such a position with respect to a stationary car railroad company, their duties not involving loading or handling the cars. Several loaded cars awaiting removal were standing upon a spur track near where they were at work. On account of a rain all but one of them entered the cars; he took shelter beneath a car and was run over and killed when a freight train backed into the cars in the process of picking them up. His widow recovered a judgment, the jury finding that the railroad company was negligent in failing to give proper warning of the approach of the train. Held, that the defendant owed no duty to the deceased to give such a warning, and that his own conduct constituted negligence as a matter of law.

Rep. 325).

The same is true where the injury is band, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. A. Low, Paul E. Walker, M. B. Nicholson, and W. J. Pirtle, for appellant:

The duty of a railway company to give warning of the approach of trains at crossings or other places where persons have the right or license to use their tracks does not extend to trespassers or those not authorized to use the track at the places in question, or those using the track elsewhere.

caused by the moving of the car upon which the servant is working. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. 604 (employee went under car forming part of train); Lumpkin v. Southern R. Co. 99 Ga. 111, 24 S. E. 963 (night watchman climbed on car).

But in Bruce v. Michigan C. R. Co. 172 Mich. 441, 138 N. W. 362, where an engine was moved from a cinder pit without ringing the bell before starting, thus injuring an employee in the pit, the company was held liable, the rule requiring foreman and car repairers to display a flag before commencing work under or about a car liable to be moved being held inapplicable to a roundhouse employee, the plaintiff.

So, where it is the duty of a railroad company to set out signals to protect car repairers while at work, a car repairer injured while working under a car as directed is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in not going down the track to inspect or inquire whether the company had done its duty but can rightfully assume that his employer has not been negligent. Russell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 141 N. W. 1077. In the above case a car repairer was not charged with the duty of setting out signals, and did not know that none had been provided.

So, where a car repairer went under a car to make repairs without setting out a flag, and was injured by a car being shunted against the one he was under, he was held not guilty of contributory negligence, the rule requiring a warning flag being out of use and not enforced, and the evidence showing that the car would have been switched upon that track even had the flag been set out, and that the accident would have happened just the same, because the car, being defective, could not have been stopped as was expected in time to avoid a collision. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Wynne, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 22 S. W. 1064.

A car repairer while at work may rely upon the promise of the yardmaster (Canon v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 101 Iowa, 613, 70 N. W. 755, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 131), or conductor in charge of train (Ritt v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 307, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

4 S. W. 796), or his foreman (Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 588), that the car would not be moved, such persons being vice principals. And this is so notwithstanding the existence of a rule of the company requiring servants to protect themselves by putting out flags (Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. supra).

But the failure to obey a rule requiring car inspectors or car repairers to display a signal flag while at work is not excused by the presence or consent of another servant of the master who is superior to the servant who agreed to obey such rule, when the superior servant is not authorized to represent the master in the making or changing of rules or contracts, and failure to obey the rule under such circumstances is negligence per se. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ropp, 76 Ohio St. 449, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 413, 81 N. E. 748.

So, the fact that a car repairer who had put out no signal relied upon another employee who was standing outside to give warning and prevent other cars from striking the car on which he was working, will not enable him to recover. Southern P. Co. v. Pool, 160 U. S. 438, 40 L. ed. 485, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 338; Hulien v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 107 Wis. 122, 82 N. W. 710 (engineer went under engine); Whitcomb v. McNulty, 45 C. C. A. 90, 105 Fed. 863 (similar facts); Spencer v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 130 Ind. 181, 29 N. E. 915, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 513 (employee went under engine without notifying engineer).

So, where an employee was injured by stepping in between a coach and an engine to close the coupler, relying upon the promise of another servant to protect him against the engine backing, he was held guilty of negligence as matter of law, he being familiar with the situation, and having voluntarily and unnecessarily gone into a place which he knew was dangerous; and, although the act of giving notice of the oncoming engine was delegable, the court ruled that the company could not be held liable for injury to a servant which was the result of negligence of a fellow servant. McCauley v. Michigan C. R. Co. 167 Mich. 230, 132 N. W. 510.

The negligence of the deceased was the proximate cause of the injury.

A person who, without necessity, assumes a position of danger upon the tracks of a railway company, cannot recover damages for injuries received by the unexpected movement of a car or train, even though such injuries may have been due to the want of ordinary care on the part of the employees of the railway company.

Messrs. Hamer & Harris and C. A. Crowley for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

G. W. Carey was run over by a car of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, receiving fatal injuries. His wife recovered a judgment against the company, and it appeals.

Carey was employed by the defendant as

It is ordinarily negligence for an employee to pass between or under cars likely to be moved at any moment. McKee v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 96 Mo. App. 671, 76 S. W. 922.

Thus, where an employee went between standing cars for an unauthorized purpose (Dillon v. Iowa C. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 645, 92 N. W. 855; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 638, 65 S. W. 119), or unnecessarily to communicate with another employee (Age v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 148 Ky. 219, 146 S. W. 412), he was held guilty of negligence precluding a recovery for an injury as the result of the cars being jammed together.

So, where an employee went between standing cars with an engine attached, or sufficiently near to make approach probable (McKee v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. supra; Edge v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 153 N. C. 212, 69 S. E. 74; Lord v. Pueblo Smelting & Ref. Co. 12 Colo. 390, 21 Pac. 148; Schwind v. Floriston Pulp & Paper Co. 5 Cal. App. 197, 87 Pac. 1066; Southern R. Co. v. Thomas, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 79, 92 S. W. 578), or went under an engine having a leaky throttle valve, without scotching the wheels or taking other precaution (Atlanta & B. Air Line R. Co. v. Alexander, 161 Ala. 382, 49 So. 792; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Wilkins, 47 Miss. 404), or went in between standing cars to uncouple them knowing that an approaching heavily loaded train was close at hand on the same track (Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Lee, 84 Va. 642, 5 S. E. 579), he was held negligent, the danger being of such a character that an ordinarily prudent person would not have taken the chance.

So, a railroad brakeman is guilty of negligence preventing recovery for his death, where he goes between the cars in the nighttime without any warning or signal to the engineer, and at a time when the latter is following the signals of another brakeman. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Alsdurf, 47 Ill. App. 200, later appeal 56 Ill. App. 578.

Or, where he goes between cars at any time without giving any notice to those in charge of the engine and train, if he knows that two unsuccessful attempts have been made to couple the cars, and that the attempt to couple them has been suspended. Nihill v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 167 Mass. 52, 44 N. E. 1075.

In Casey v. Texarkana & Ft. S. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 151 S. W. 856, it was held a question for the jury whether a car inspector who went between the cars after an unsuccessful attempt to couple them had been made assumed the risk of the switching crew repeating the attempt without notice to him.

A workman who, in order to remove ore from a car track, gets under a car standing upon a slight incline, where rakes were provided and he had been instructed to use them for removing the ore, voluntarily subjects himself to unnecessary risk; and he cannot recover from his employer for injuries received where a loaded car in charge of a fellow workman, from which the blocks holding it had in some unknown way been removed, struck the car he was under and moved it upon him. Morgan v. Hudson River Ore & Iron Co. 133 N. Y. 666, 31 N. E. 234. In the above case the court said the failure to adopt rules for the protection of employees is not proof of negligence, unless it appears from the nature of the business in which the servant is engaged that the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen and anticipated the necessity of such precautions.

It is an established rule that an employee who knowingly selects a dangerous way to perform his employment, when a safer way is apparent to him, is guilty of contributory negligence. Thus, a railroad employee was held guilty of contributory negligence where he attempted to go between (Beck v. Southern R. Co. 149 N. C. 168, 62 S. E. 883; Ryan v. Northern P. R. Co. 53 Wash. 279, 101 Pac. 880), or to crawl under, standing cars (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Eggman, 59 Ill. App. 680; Beal v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 62 Kan. 250, 62 Pac. 321, 8 Ann. Neg. Rep. 395), liable to be moved at any moment, when he could have safely passed around them.

So, where an employee went under cars to remove coal from the track, when he could have safely pulled the coal down the chute a workman in a stone quarry 2 miles west of Dwight. A spur track 20 rods long ran from the main line in a southwesterly direction to the quarry, curving around an embankment which cut off a view of the main track east of the switch. The spur track was used exclusively for setting in empty cars to be loaded, and shifting loaded cars to the main line. The cars upon it were handled only by one train, an eastbound daily freight, due about 11 o'clock in the morning. Usually the train would stop west of the spur, uncoupling the engine to do the necessary switching. Infrequently it would pass without stopping, in which case it would stop on its eastbound trip on the following morning and do the work. Very infrequently it would go through to Dwight, and after an interval back up from there and take out the loaded cars and set in empty ones. On the day of the accident two crews of workmen were engaged in the quarry. That to which the deceased belonged were stripping or uncovering rock near the switch. Their duties did not require them to be upon the track; they had nothing to do with loading or handling the cars. The other crew were quarrying and loading near the west end of the spur. The freight train referred to was about two hours late. It ran past the switch to Dwight, and later backed up to pick up some cars. Shortly before this a hard rain had set in. Four loaded cars were standing on the spur near the switch, close to, but not touching, each other. All of the crew to which the deceased belonged, except himself, took refuge in the third car from the switch. He, as found by the jury, took shelter under the fourth. The workmen of the other crew retired to a box car provided by the company, used as a tool house and office, situated near the end of the spur, but off the track. The train backed into the nearest of the cars with such force as to push them together and move the furthest one about a car's length. Carey was thereby run over and fatally injured. A special finding stated that the negligence of the defendant consisted in not giving a proper warning signal. We conclude that the plaintiff cannot recover, because the evidence and findings do not disclose any actionable negligence of the defendant, but, on the other hand, do establish that the accident resulted from the want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased. In the absence of a statute a railway company is not required to give warning of the approach of a train, except where it has reason to anticipate that persons will be upon the track. 33 Cyc. 782. Here the train men owed no such duty to Carey, inasmuch as they did not know of his presence, and had no reason to suppose that any person would be under the cars. Liability for negligence can result only from the violation of a duty owed to the person injured. See United States Exp. Co. v. Everest, 72 Kan. 517, 522, 83 Pac. 817, and cases there cited. Shortly after the impact, a brakeman saw one of the work-under the railway, he was held guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery for an injury by the car being suddenly moved. St. Louis Bolt & Iron Co. v. Burke, 12 Ill. App. 372.

But a track laborer living in a boarding car standing on a side track with brakes set was held, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Panebianco, 227 Ill. 170, 81 N. E. 53, affirming 129 Ill. App. 1, not, as matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in crawling under the car to get some water, instead of going around the car, when he had reasonable grounds to believe the car would not be disturbed without any warning to him. In this case an engine was run in upon a side track, and violently collided with the car in which plaintiff was living and around which he was working, causing the injury complained of.

Where a motorman was caught and injured between electric cars by one backing as the trolley was adjusted, because the power happened to be turned on, it was held in Gorman v. Brooklyn, Q. C. & S. R. Co. 147 App. Div. 21, 131 N. Y. Supp. 686, that he could not be held to have contributed to the accident merely because he was upon the track between the cars in the discharge of his duties.

In the following cases, whether the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence was held a question for the jury:

Johnson v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 160 Mo. App. 69, 141 S. W. 475 (employee attempting to pass between standing cars); Erie R. Co. v. Russell, 106 C. C. A. 160, 183 Fed. 722 (brakeman going between cars to adjust coupler); Pittsburgh & B. Coal Co. v. Hudak, 106 C. C. A. 89, 183 Fed. 543 (employee going between cars used in mine to adjust a defective coupling).

So, it cannot be said to be negligence as a matter of law for a servant to pass between standing cars which had been separated purposely to leave a passageway between them. Hickey v. Solid Steel Casting Co. 212 Pa. 255, 61 Atl. 798, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 44.

So, whether a brakeman in attempting to make a coupling while hanging on the side of a car, whereby he was crushed between the car he was on and another car on another track, was guilty of contributory negligence, when the coupling could have been made in two other ways with perfect safety, was held a question for the jury in Parmelee v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. — Mass. —, 102 N. E. 341.

men inside a car and heard the voices of others. The conductor also saw some men in the car about the same time. But if there was then time to give warning to these men, and the company was guilty of negligence toward them, its neglect in this regard did not extend to the decedent. In answer to the question whether any of the train crew knew that Carey was under the car, the jury answered that the train men did not know Carey. The reasonable interpretation of the answer, in view of the question, is that it was intended to mean that the train men did not know that Carey was under the car. But in any event the effect must be the same, for there was no evidence that he was seen by any of the train crew.

Assuming, however, that the company may have been negligent, we think the conduct of the deceased was such as to prevent a recovery. The rule is generally, if not universally, accepted that for one unnecessarily to remain upon a railroad track is negligence as a matter of law; none the less so because customary warnings of the approach of a train may have been omitted. In getting under a car which had been loaded, and only awaited the convenience of the company to be hauled away, the deceased was clearly within this rule. The fact that in this instance the train that did the switching first ran onto Dwight and then backed up, instead of doing the work as usual, upon reaching the spur track from the west, does not affect the matter. At the most such a departure from custom could have no greater effect than an omission to perform some positive duty, and would not render the defense of contributory negligence unavailable. Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. 74 Kan. 528, 533, 534, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 132, 87 Pac. 680, 11 Ann. Cas. 207.

The contention is made that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the company's employees were guilty of misconduct amounting to wantonness in failing to give a warning of the approach of the train, since two of them knew that men were in or about the cars to be picked up. We do not think the fact that the train men saw a workman in one of the cars, and heard the voices of others, was sufficient to suggest to them the probability of anyone being under the cars or in a similar position.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to render judgment for the defendant.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

R. L. CAMPBELL, Appt.,

v.

MOBILE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

MRS. JENNIE CAMPBELL, Appt.,

v.

SAME.

(— Ky. —, 157 S. W. 931.)

Railroad — crossing — statutory signals — injury to animals.

A statute requiring signals when a train approaches a road crossing is for the benefit of roaming animals as well as persons, and the railroad company must, to relieve itself from the statutory presumption of negligence which arises from the killing of animals upon its tracks, show that it gave the required signals upon approaching the crossing at which the animals were killed.

Note. — Railroads: duty to give crossing signals for protection of animals.

As to duty of railroad employees to keep lookout for live stock on track, see note to Harris v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 858.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that statutes requiring the giving of crossing signals are for the protection of animals as well as persons, but in a few jurisdictions a contrary conclusion has been reached. In many cases the question presented in the present note is discussed merely from the view point as to whether or not the failure to give the statutory crossing signals constitutes negligence. In the majority of such cases, such a failure has been held to constitute negligence. In some instances it is characterized as negligence per se, in others as prima facie evidence, and in others as merely evidence of negligence to be considered by the jury. But in any case, the negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury in order to render the company liable.

Another line of cases which has been included in the present note comprises those decisions which determine whether or not the statutory requirements as to crossing signals are for the protection of animals at places other than a crossing. Upon this point the decisions are in greater conflict, but the weight of authority, perhaps, is to the effect that the requirements are for the protection of animals which might be warned by the giving of the proper crossing signals, even though they are at a place other than a public crossing.

Animals at crossing—duty in general.

As before stated, it is the general rule that it is the duty of the railroad company to give the statutory crossing signals for APPLEALS by plaintiffs from judgments of the Circuit Court for Hickman County in defendant's favor in actions brought to recover damages for the killing of plaintiff's live stock by the alleged negligent operation of defendant's train. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

It was the duty of the engineer who was operating this engine that killed the horses, to signal for the public road crossing, and to keep a lookout as his engine approached this public road crossing.

Mr. E. T. Bullock for appellee.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the morning of September 16, 1911, about 3:20 A. M., appellee's south-bound fast train running at the rate of 55 miles an hour killed two horses at a grade crossing in Hickman county. One of the horses belonged to appellant R. L. Campbell, and the other to Mrs. Jennie Campbell. The

When the legislature required the giving of these signals, they may be presumed to have intended them for any purpose which they might naturally or reasonably be supposed to subserve, including the driving of cattle from the railway track. Therefore we are of the opinion that evidence of the omission to give those signals was competent, and it was for the justice to say, under all the circumstances of the case, whether the giving of the signals would have prevented, and the omission to do so caused, the accident."

And the rule that crossing signals are for the protection of animals as well as persons has been held to be especially applicable where the statute makes the railroad company liable, Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 358, 85 N. W. 620; Heise v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 114 N. W. 180, affirmed on this point on rehearing in 141 Iowa, 88, 119 N. W. 371; Swisher v. Interurban R. Co. 151 Iowa, 384, 130 N. W. 404; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 31 Kan. 77, 1 Pac. 298; Barr v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 30 Mo. App. 248; Stoneman v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 58 Mo. 503; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Red Cross Stock Farm, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 114, 53 S. W. 834. (In Graybill v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 112 Iowa, 738, 84 N. W. 946, supra, the court reasoned as follows: "There is nothing in the language of the statute tending to show legislative intent to restrict its operation to the human family. It may be said, and indeed it has been held in two or three states, that the sole purpose of such legislation is to advise human beings of the approach of danger. But we think the reasons given for the decisions to which our attention has been called are not sound. They are based on the thought that all animal nature two actions by agreement were heard together in the lower court, and will be heard together here. The court, after the introduction of all the evidence, gave a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The court placed the burden of proof on the defendant, and it introduced the engineer and fireman in charge of the train, who were the only eyewitnesses to the occurrence. They stated, in substance, that the train was a little late and was running about 55 miles an hour; that the crossing in question is on a curve, and north of the crossing and in this curve is a cut; that upon the occasion in question the fireman was on the east side of the cab, which was the outside of the curve, and the engineer was on the west side; that in the dirt road just east of the railroad crossing was a depression; and that, by reason of the cut in the curve and the depression in the dirt road stock approaching the crossing from the east on the dirt road could not be seen for a very great distance. The fireman stated that he was looking out, and when from 60 to 100 feet from the crossing, for the first time, he saw several horses rapidly running on the dirt road toward the crossing from the east, and immediately below man is incapable of intelligent action, and is not endowed with the sense of self-preservation or of fear. The contrary of these propositions we believe to be true. It is a matter of common observation that the attention of dumb animals is quickly attracted by any unusual noise, though at some distance, and that the approach of an unfamiliar object ordinarily holds the attention and arouses the instinct of fear and of self-preservation, which all animal nature possesses. We think the statute must be construed in the light of this common knowledge, and that the legislature, by requiring this notice of the approach of trains, intended to protect as far as possible animals as well as man.");

—or for all damages caused by the company's "locomotives, train, or cars when the provisions of this section [section requiring crossing signals] are not complied with." Orcutt v. Pacific Coast R. Co. 85 Cal. 291, 24 Pac. 661, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 216, holding that proof of failure to comply with the statute establishes a prima facie case, and that it is not necessary for the owner of the stock to prove that the injuries were a result of the failure to signal;

—or for injuries to one "in property or person" where the statute requires signals. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. v. Hiltzhauer, 99 Ind. 486; Neely v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 33 S. C. 136, 11 S. E. 636 (provided the stock was at the crossing for the purpose of passing from one side to the other).

And under statutory provisions that a crossing signal must be given, and that a railroad company is liable for all damages done to stock resulting from a failure to comply with statutory requirements, it has been held that a failure to give the crossing signal renders the company liable for injuries to stock resulting from such omission. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Deaver, 79 Ala. 216; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. McAlpine, 80 Ala. 73; Hilliker-Krebs Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. 100 Ala. 424, 14 So. 200; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Wood, 129 Ala. 483, 29 So. 775; Western R. Co. v. Moore, 169 Ala. 284, 53 So. 744. And the same rule applies where the statutes require the giving of signals while passing through a town or city, and make the railroad company liable for injuries to stock resulting from a failure to give the statutory signals. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Christian Moerlein Brewing Co. 150 Ala. 390, 43 So. 723.

In a few instances it has been held that the statutes relating to the giving of crossing signals do not impose the duty to give such signals for the benefit of animals. Thus, in Fisher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 126 Pa. 293, 17 Atl. 607, in holding such to be the rule, where the alleged negligence was the failure of the employees of the train which struck plaintiff's mule to give the statutory crossing signal, it was said: "If it was the duty of the engineer to blow the whistle as notice to the mule, I do not see why the mule should not be held to the rule to 'stop, look, and listen.' To apply rules to dumb animals which were intended only for reasonable beings brings us dangerously near to the realm of absurdity." This case (Fisher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra) was quoted with approval in Toudy v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 38 W. Va. 694, 18 S. E. 896, where, in holding that statutes requiring signals at crossings were not for the benefit of animals, it was said: "The statutory requirement that the whistle shall be blown 60 rods from the crossing which the train is approaching is not intended for the purpose of giving notice to horses and cattle running at large in the public road, but to give warning to travelers upon the highway, to persons who have the faculty of reasoning and understanding the object of the signal." And see Whelan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 70 W. Va. 442, 74 S. E. 410, wherein it was again said that ringing the bell and blowing the whistle are not means of warning intended for dumb animals, but in the report of which it does not affirmatively appear that the court referred to crossing signals.

So, in Mills & Le C. Lumber Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 94 Wis. 336, 68 N. W. 996, in holding that crossing signals were not for the benefit of animals, it was said that "signals by the whistle and bell are meant exclusively for the protection of persons who are about to cross the railroad at public crossings. . . . They notified the engineer, but that before anything could be done, and almost simultaneously with such notification, the engine and horses met on the crossing; that, between the time he notified the engineer and the collision, there was no time to give the stock signal. They state they did not give the stock signal or put on the brakes after discovering the stock, because there was no time to do so. The train was equipped with an electric headlight and modern air brakes which were in perfect order. Neither of them stated whether or not the signal for the crossing was given, as required by § 786 of the Kentucky statutes.

The evidence of the plaintiffs was given by witnesses who were not present at the time of the injury, and who were not at the place of the injury for several hours thereafter; but they undertake to state such facts locating the bodies of the two horses, the places where blood was seen, and other signs indicating the point where the horses were struck, certain tracks which were seen on the west side of the railroad, indicating that some horses had approached from that side, and that no tracks were then discernible approaching the crossing from the east side; and from these circumstances it is argued that the physical facts disclose a state of case which justified a submission to the jury of the question of negligence. The evidence further shows that each of the horses was struck on the rump by the engine and thrown to the west side of the track; this fact, if it shows anything, are not designed for the protection of brute animals, which could not be expected to either understand or heed the warning."

Where the statute makes it the duty of the engineer to blow the whistle or ring the bell, he need not do both. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Deaver, 79 Ala. 216; Cathcart v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 113; Summerville v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 29 Mo. App. 48; McCormick v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 50 Mo. App. 109; Milligan v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 79 Mo. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co.* 82 Mo. 90.

The failure to sound the statutory warning for public crossings seems to have been regarded as negligence per se, in some cases at least, among which are the following: Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Foster, 43 Ill. 415; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Ousler, 15 Ind. App. 232, 36 N. E. 290; Swisher v. Interurban R. Co. 151 Iowa, 384, 130 N. W. 404; Central Branch R. Co. v. Phillips, 20 Kan. 9; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 31 Kan. 77, 1 Pac. 298; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Stevens, 35 Kan. 622, 12 Pac. 25; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Pierce, 39 Kan. 391, 18 Pac. 305; Fritz v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 22 Minn. 404; Stoneman v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 58 Mo. 503; Rehman v. Railroad Co. 5 Phila. 450; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Crutcher, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 82 S. W. 341.

While in other cases the failure to sound crossing signals as required by statute has been held prima facie negligence as to animals killed at the crossing. St. Louis, J. & C. R. Co. v. Terhune, 50 Ill. 151, 99 Am. Dec. 504; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Gillis, 68 Ill. 317; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Roper, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 666, 58 S. W. 518, set out in CAMPBELL v. MOBILE & O. R. Co.; Young v. Illinois C. R. Co. 8th Miss. 446, 40 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So. 870; Southern R. Co. v. Murray, 91 Miss. 546, 44 So. 785; Cathcart v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 113; Barr v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 30 Mo. App. 248; Atterberry v. Wabash R. Co. 110 Mo. App. 608, 85 S. W. 114; Roberts v. Wabash R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 6, 87 S. W. 601.

While in still other cases the failure to give statutory crossing signals has been said to be evidence of negligence as to animals injured at a crossing. Locke v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 350, Gil. 283; Palmer v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 38 Minn. 415, 38 N. W. 100; Hohl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 61 Minn. 321, 52 Am. St. Rep. 598, 63 N. W. 742, set out and quoted in CAMPBELL v. MOBILE & O. R. Co.; Croft v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 72 Minn. 47, 74 N. W. 898, 80 N. W. 628; Goodwin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 75 Mo. 73; Schneider v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Mo. 295; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Huttner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 131 S. W. 630.

In the majority of the cases, however, the failure of the railroad company's employees to comply with statutory requirements as to crossing signals has been held to be such negligence as would render the company liable for injuries to animals at a crossing where such injuries were traceable to the negligence, but not liable if the failure to perform the statutory duty did not proximately cause the injuries. The following cases apply this rule: Georgia & A. R. Co. v. Cook, 114 Ga. 760, 40 S. E. 718, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 375; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Tuterwiler, 16 Ill. App. 197; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jessuine, 16 Ill. App. 209; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones, 19 Ill. App. 648; St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Hurst, 25 Ill. App. 181; Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Aten, 43 Ill. App. 68; Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Linn, 67 Ill. 109; Quincy, A. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wellhoener, 72 Ill. 60; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Van Auker, 1 Ind. App. 492, 27 N. E. 119; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fenn, 3 Ind. App. 250, 29 N. E. 790; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Craycraft, 5 Ind. App. 335, 32 N. E. 297; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Ousler, 15 Ind. is an indication that the horses were going from east to west as testified to by the fireman and engineer, and were almost across the track when struck; if they had been struck on the rump while going from west to east, it seems that they would have been knocked off on the east side of the track.

The engineer and fireman are unimpeached; their testimony is clear, explicit, and easily understood; and they fully agree about it. From our understanding of the physical facts and the location of the ground, they furnish no sufficient ground for submission of the question of negligence to the jury in the face of the testimony of the engineer and fireman, if there was no negligence before the train men discovered the horses.

Section 809 of the Kentucky statutes provides, among other things: "And the killing or injury of cattle by the engine or cars of any company shall be prima facie evidence of negligence and carelessness on the part of the company, its agents, and servants."

Section 786 of the Kentucky statutes is as follows: "Every company shall provide each locomotive engine passing upon its road with a bell of ordinary size, and steam whistle, and such bell shall be rung or whistle sounded outside of incorporated cities and towns, at a distance of at least 50 rods from the place where the road crosses upon the same level any highway

But that, in order to recover, the injury need not in all cases be a result of the failure to give the statutory signals, see Orcutt v. Pacific Coast R. Co. 85 Cal. 291, 24 Pac. 661, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 216, as set out supra.

Animals not at crossing.

In the following cases it was held that the statutory requirement as to crossing signals has no reference to stock not at a crossing, and that there is consequently no duty to give a crossing signal for the benefit of stock upon the railroad right of way at a place other than a crossing: Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hembree, 85 Ala. 481, 5 So. 173; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Goodwin, 30 Ill. 117, as construed in Great Western R. Co. v. Geddis, 33 Ill. 304; Ravenscraft v. Missouri P. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 617; Wasson v. McCook, 80 Mo. App. 483; Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Wilson, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 84 S. W. 274; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Bennett, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 126 S. W. 607; Texas C. R.

or crossing, at which a signboard is required to be maintained, and such bell shall be rung or whistle sounded continuously or alternately until the engine has reached such highway crossing."

The question is: Has a railroad company relieved itself of the negligence imputed to it by § 809, where cattle are killed by its engine or cars at a highway grade crossing, until it has shown that it gave the signals for the crossing as provided in § 786? On this question there has been

Co. v. Mallard, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 1117. And in Neely v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 33 S. C. 136, 11 S. E. 636, it was held that statutes requiring the giving of crossing signals, and making the railroad company liable in person or property for injury by collision at a crossing where such signals are not given, applied only to persons and animals at the crossing for the purpose of crossing, and did not apply to animals near by, but not using it to cross from one side to the other. And in Fowles v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 73 S. C. 306, 53 S. E. 534, following Neely v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. supra, it was held that there was no duty to give statutory crossing signals for the benefit of a dog hunting near a crossing, but not in an attitude of one intending to cross.

And in the following case it was held that evidence of failure to comply with statutory requirements as to crossing signals was not of itself sufficient to sustain a recovery for the killing of an animal at another point than at a crossing: Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Parker, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 37 S. W. 973, on subsequent appeal 46 S. W. 280.

But it has been held that while the giving of statutory signals is primarily for persons and things at the crossings, a failure to give such signal might be considered by the jury in determining the question of the company's negligence where such failure contributed to the killing of an animal beyond the crossing, but that the failure alone was not negligence per se as to such an animal. Western & A. R. Co. v. Jones, 65 Ga. 631, wherein the court said that "signal posts and the sounding of the alarm whistle, it is true, are intended to protect life and property at public crossings. . . . The absence of the signal post, the failure to give the usual warning upon approaching the crossing, as well as the neglect of having his train under control at a point where the law declares it his duty to do so, may well be considered by the jury in determining upon the question of negligence in killing the horse just at the place where he was killed;" Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Clary, 103 Ga. 639, 30 S. E. 433; Miller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 21 S. D. 242, 111 N. W. 553; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kincheloe, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 123, 119 S. W. 905; Texas C. R. Co. v. Mallard, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 1117. And the same rule has been held to apply where the animal was killed or injured before the crossing was reached. Port Royal & W. C. R. Co. v. Phinzy, 83 Ga. 192, 9 S. E. 609; Willingham v. Macon & B. R. Co. 113 Ga. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

374, 38 S. E. 843; Mankey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 14 S. D. 468, 85 N. W. 1013. And in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fergusson, 42 Ill. 449, it was said that the animal need not be on the actual intersection of the railway and the highway in order for the owner to claim the benefit of the statute requiring crossing signals.

And in some cases the courts seem to have regarded the failure to sound the statutory signals as negligence per se, where the animal was killed or injured at a place where it was the duty of the company's servants to sound crossing signals, as where the injury was inflicted before reaching the crossing, but within the distance therefrom within which it was the duty to sound warnings. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Foster, 43 Ill. 415, holding also that such failure was not negligence per se as to animals injured beyond the crossing.

But it has been held that, in case animals were injured beyond the crossing, the failure to give the statutory signal must have contributed to the injury, in order to hold the company responsible. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Partee, 107 Ga. 789, 33 S. E. 668; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Phelps, 29 Ill. 447. And see Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Henderson, 63 Ill. 494, wherein the company was held liable for the killing of an animal beyond a crossing for which no statutory signals had been given, and in which the court said that, had the signals been given, the accident probably would not have happened. And see the following cases, wherein it was held that the railroad company was not liable for injuries to animals at a place other than a crossing, for which the statutory signals had not been given, and in which the decision was probably upon the ground that the failure to signal did not contribute to the injury: Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Burke, 93 Ga. 319, 20 S. E. 318; Southern R. Co. v. New, 105 Ga. 481, 30 S. E. 665.

In Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Curry, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 750, where stock was killed near a crossing, it was held that evidence as to the failure to sound the whistle was competent solely for the purpose of showing that the engineer was not keeping the proper lookout.

It has been held, however, that evidence of the failure to blow the whistle for the crossing is admissible in an action to recover for stock injured at a place other than a public crossing, as part of the res geste, although such failure was not the proximate cause of the injury. Southern R. Co. v. Pope, 129 Ga. 842, 60 S. E. 157. G. J. C.

but one opinion by this court, which we have found, and that a very short one which does not give the facts of that case; but it seems to assume that, where the company sought to overcome the prima facie case against it, it must show that the signals for the crossing were given as required by the section quoted. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Roper, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 666, 58 S. W. 518.

Whether the signals required by § 786 are alone for the benefit of persons about to cross the tracks on highways, or whether they are also intended to warn or frighten animals unaccompanied by persons, has not, so far as we are aware, been determined by this court, except in the case referred to. Elliott on Railroads, vol. 3, § 1206, takes this view of it, to wit: "In nearly all, if not quite all, of the states, statutes are in force requiring railway companies at certain distances from crossings to sound the whistle of the locomotive and to ring the bell. The obvious purpose of such signals is to give notice of the approach of trains. Such signals, it seems, are not required alone for the benefit of persons about to cross the track, but are also required to warn and frighten animals away from the track. Where animals are injured on the track of a railway company, proof of the omission to give statutory signals may be evidence of negligence. The failure to give such signals is not actionable negligence, per se, but there are authorities which hold that proof of an injury to the animal and proof of a failure to give statutory signals make a prima facie case for the plaintiff."

The case of Hohl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 61 Minn. 321, 52 Am. St. Rep. 598, 63 N. W. 742, was where a colt was killed at a highway crossing at night, and the question we are here dealing with arose in that case, and the court said: "It was the duty of the engineer in charge of the locomotive in this case to give the signals at the crossing or cause them to be given. A failure to do so is a misdemeanor. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 6637. It is not the province of the court to ingraft upon this statute any limitations not necessarily implied from the language used, and, inasmuch as the giving of such signals has a tendency in some cases to frighten animals from the railway track, we must presume that this was one of the results intended to be secured by the enactment of the law; hence an omission to comply with the statute in this case was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, but whether such omission was the cause of the accident or not was a question for the jury. Palmer v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 38 Minn. 415, 38 N. W. 100."

similar to our own, requiring the giving of signals upon the approach of trains to highway crossings, and in the case of Owens v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 58 Mo. 386, it was held that that statute was intended for the protection of stock as well as for persons.

There is nothing in the language of § 786 from which it might be inferred that its requirements were intended only for the protection of human beings; it is sufficiently broad to hold the company negligent for a failure to observe its provisions whether men or stock may be killed or injured at a grade crossing if its provisions are violated.

The burden being on the company to overcome the presumption of negligence, and it having failed to show a compliance with the provisions of § 786, that presumption was not overcome.

The judgment is reversed for a new trial and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

CONTINENTAL TRUST COMPANY et al.,
Appts.,
v.

BALTIMORE REFRIGERATING & HEATING COMPANY et al.

Judicial sale — defaulted bid — right to charge undisclosed principal.

1. A trustee to make a judicial sale of property, whose acceptance of a bidder has been confirmed by the court, cannot, after he has defaulted and the property has been resold at his risk, maintain a petition to declare the bidder a mere representative of an undisclosed principal, and charge the latter with the deficiency in the resale.

Note. — Liability of undisclosed principal of bidder at judicial sale for purchase price, or for deficiency upon resale of property.

The decision in the case of CONTINENTAL TRUST Co. v. BALTIMORE REFRIGERATING & HEATING Co., based upon the ground of executed contract, of acceptance of the agent as the purchaser, and resale at his risk, and recognition of the agent as the owner of the property, appears to be supported by the little authority there is on the subject.

A distinction should be made between the case of CONTINENTAL TRUST Co. v. BALTIMORE REFRIGERATING & HEATING Co., where the undisclosed principal was sued for the deficiency upon a resale of the property, and cases where the undisclosed principal received the property and was sued for the Appeal — sustaining demurrers — absence of grounds — effect.

2. An order sustaining demurrers will not be reversed because they did not state the special grounds for demurrer, as required by statute, if no exception was taken to them and another demurrer stated the ground, which challenged petitioner's right to relief.

Same — refusal of leave to amend — discretion.

3. An order refusing leave to amend a petition is not subject to review on appeal.

(April 11, 1913.)

APPEAL by petitioner and the Terminal Freezing & Heating Company from orders of the Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City, sustaining demurrers to a petition filed to declare the bidder at a judicial sale required not only a lien upon the property cipeal, and charge the latter with a deficiency in a resale of the property, and refusing leave to amend the original petition. First order affirmed. Appeal from second order dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

purchase price. In the latter instance, the rule is well established in ordinary sales that the undisclosed principal is liable, and there seems no sound reason for a distinction in this respect between ordinary sales and those made by the court. As is said in 31 Cyc. 1574: "Although the third person extended credit to the agent in ignorance of the fact that the latter was acting in a representative capacity, he may elect to hold the undisclosed principal when discovered, it being a firmly established rule that an undisclosed principal is bound by executory simple contracts made by the agent, and acts done by the agent in relation thereto, within the scope of his authority and in the course of his employment."

And in Carney v. Dennison, 15 Vt. 400, a case of judicial sale, the court said that, "in reference to an ordinary sale, it has long been settled that, unless the seller is apprised, at the time of the sale, that the ostensible purchaser is acting as the agent of another, he has an election, upon learning that fact, to resort for payment either to the principal or the agent. Nor is he deprived of such election by a mere notice that the buyer is purchasing for another, if the notice does not disclose the principal's name and place of business. . . . And I am aware of no recognized distinction, in this respect, between a sale at auction, whether under public or private authority, and ordinary sales."

In Carney v. Dennison, supra, it was held that an undisclosed principal who had received property sold at judicial sale was liable for the purchase price; and it was held also that the fact that the return of the officers stated that the sale was made to the agent did not preclude him from 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. J. Southgate Lemmon, Edward Duffy, and J. Wallace Bryan, with Lemmon & Clotworthy, and Bond, Robinson, & Duffy, for appellant Continental Trust Company:

The securities company became bound to pay the price called for by its bid, whether it acted for itself or for others.

Richardson v. Jones, 3 Gill. & J. 184, 22 Am. Dec. 293.

Upon default, however, the vendor acquired not only a lien upon the property enforceable by resale, but the right to recover the deficiency either from the nominal purchaser, or, at his election, from the principal of the purchaser, if he should find one of the larger means than the agent.

afterward recovering from the undisclosed principal, where the fact of the agency was not discovered until after the return was made, the evidence of the agency being introduced not for the purpose of contradicting the return, but to obviate an inference from it,—not to disprove ostensibly a sale of the property to the agent, but to show the capacity in which he acted as regards the principal.

The decision in CONTINENTAL TRUST CO. v. BALTIMORE REFRIGERATING & HEATING CO. is supported by the language of the court in the case of Aukam v. Zantlinger, 94 Md. 421, 51 Atl. 93, from which the court quotes in the former case, although it appears that the undisclosed principal did not appeal from that part of the decision against him. But, as indicated in the quoted part of the opinion, the action of the lower court in refusing to set aside the resale of the property at the instance of the undisclosed principal was approved upon appeal, on the ground that such principal had no interest in the property, the sale having been made exclusively to the agent, to whom alone the seller looked for the purchase price, and who alone was liable for the deficiency upon resale.

In Ranger v. Thalmann, 84 App. Div. 341, 82 N. Y. Supp. 846, affirmed in 178 N. Y. 574, 70 N. E. 1108, action was brought by bondholders of property sold at judicial sale, against the undisclosed principal for the balance remaining unpaid upon the agent's bid, there being a deficiency upon a resale of the property, and it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. The decision supports the conclusion reached in CONTINENTAL TRUST CO. v. BALTIMORE REFRIGERATING & HEATING CO., in that it is based upon the ground of executed contract;

The court cannot be concluded by name assumed by the real purchaser.

Kampman v. Nicewaner, 60 Neb. 208, 82 N. W. 623.

Mr. Clarence K. Bowie, for appellant Terminal Freezing & Heating Company:

The demurrers specify no ground of demurrer, and should have been overruled.

Williams v. Harlan, 88 Md. 7, 71 Am. St. Rep. 394, 41 Atl. 51.

The undisclosed principal was a party to the original offer to buy, and by the order of ratification became a party to the original contract, and the order of resale did not release him from his liability for the deficiency.

Taylor*, 81 Md. 644, 32 Atl. 320, 33 Atl. 886; Vickers v. Tracey, 22 Md. 196; 31 Cyc. 1574; Mealey v. Page, 41 Md. 172; Early v. Dorsett, 45 Md. 462; Brundige v. Morrison, 56 Md. 407; State v. Second Nat. Bank, 84 Md. 325, 35 Atl. 889.

but there was the further circumstance that the agent had given his note in payment of the balance of the purchase price. The court said: "Assuming that Godfrey made the purchase as agent of the defendants, although the fact of such agency was not disclosed to the master in chancery who made the sale, or to the bondholders whose right he was enforcing, when the master in chancery accepted Godfrey as the purchaser, and accepted his note in part payment of the purchase price, and conveyed the property to him individually, the conditions had been complied with, Godfrey had become the owner of the property, and the original contract of purchase had been executed. . . . Assuming this to be the defendants' contract, they had complied with it, had paid the $2,000. and had given Godfrey's individual notes for the remainder of the purchase money. That had been accepted by the master of chancery as a completion of the contract for the purchase of the property, and that contract for the purchase of the property was thus completely executed." And upon the principle that the "rule that, where a simple contract is made by a duly authorized agent without disclosing his principal, and the other contracting party afterwards discovers that the person with whom he dealt is not the principal, he may abandon his right to look to the agent personally, and resort to the principal," does not apply to a note or bill of exchange, it was held that the undisclosed principal was not liable upon the individual notes of the agent given for the balance of the purchase price.

In an earlier decision, in Ranger v. Thalmann, 65 App. Div. 5, 72 N. Y. Supp. 451, before the objections had been cured by an amendment to the complaint, it was held 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Whitelock, Deming, & Kemp and Keech, Wright, & Lord, for appellees:

The effect of ratifying a judicial sale of real estate is to vest the full equitable title to the property in the purchaser.

A decree once enrolled cannot be opened except by bill of review, or by original bill for fraud.

Miller, Eq. Proc. pp. 357, 358.

The exceptions to this rule are (a) cases not heard upon the merits; or (b) cases wherein it is alleged that the decree has been entered by mistake or surprise; or (c) where the entry of the decree was under circumstances satisfying the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, that the enrolment should be discharged.

that the complaint against the undisclosed principal did not state a cause of action, in that it did not sufficiently connect the principal with the transaction, it not appearing that he had paid the consideration or was entitled to the property as against the agent, and in that it did not allege that the fact of agency was unknown when the action was brought against the agent for the purchase price, an election thereby arising to hold the agent, and not the principal, liable upon the obligation.

In State Bank v. Wilchinsky, 128 App. Div. 485, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1002, it was held that, assuming that a bid was made by the son of appellant, who was present and signed the memorandum of sale and furnished the checks to make the required immediate payment, he was the purchaser and liable in damages for failure to carry out the contract.

No case has been found as to the right of an undisclosed principal to a surplus arising upon resale of the property.

Attention is called to the fact that in a number of cases not within the scope of this note it has been held that the agent of an undisclosed principal is personally liable for the purchase price or deficiency arising upon resale of the property by the court. Among possibly other cases of this class are the following: Gray v. Case, 51 Mo. 463 (holding agent liable for deficiency upon resale, on the ground that the contract of sale and purchase was complete when the bids were accepted and entered on the sale books in the agent's name); Adams v. Aycock, 11 Ga. App. 793, 76 S. E. 161 (same); Ogilvie v. Richardson, 14 Wis. 158 (holding agent liable for amount of bid); Chappell v. Dann, 21 Barb. 17 (same).

If a plaintiff suffers his bill to be finally dismissed, the court cannot do otherwise than refuse leave to amend, for there is in fact nothing left to amend.

Miller, Eq. Proc. 230, note 2; Hitch v. Davis, 3 Md. Ch. 266.

The action of the court below was the exercise of a discretion which cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is a narrow one, and in order to get a clear apprehension of it, it will be necessary to refer to the circumstances under which it arises. In 1902 the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company of Baltimore city executed to the Continental Trust Company, as trustee, a mortgage to secure an issue of 2,000 bonds of the par value of $1,000 each. The refrigerating company became insolvent, and in 1908 receivers were appointed and authorized to continue the business of the company until the further order of the court. After the appointment of receivers, two committees of the bondholders of the refrigerating company were formed, one called the Homer-Betts committee, which represented a large majority of the bondholders, and the other called the Middendorf-Heyward committee, representing a minority of the bonds. In December, 1909, some of the bondholders filed a bill against the refrigerating company and the Continental Trust Company, alleging, among other things, that the trust company had wrongfully certified and issued a number of bonds of the refrigerating company, and asking that the trust company be removed as trustee for the bondholders. The trust company answered, denying the averments of the bill, but the controversy resulted in the trust company being restrained until the final hearing, from proceeding to foreclose the mortgage under the power contained therein. While that order was in force the Middendorf-Heyward committee and Robert Spedden, a bondholder, on the 3d of November, 1910, filed a bill against the refrigerating company, the trust company, and the Homer-Betts committee, for a sale of the property of the refrigerating company. A few days later, on the 12th of November, the same plaintiffs filed a petition for a sale of the property before final decree, and after a hearing the circuit court

No. 2 of Baltimore city, on the 7th of December, 1910, passed an order or decree directing the sale of the property, and appointing the Continental Trust Company trustee to make the sale. On February 3, 1911, the trust company, trustee, reported a sale of the property to the Central Securities Company for $503,000, which sale was finally ratified and confirmed by the court. The Central Securities Company, as purchaser, paid the trustee $25,000 on account of the purchase money, but failed to pay the balance, and on March 27, 1911, the court ordered a resale of the property at the cost and risk of the purchaser. On appeal that order was affirmed by this court on December 6, 1911. 117 Md. 17, 82 Atl. 1047. The property was accordingly resold by the trustee to Francis T. Homer and others, constituting a committee of the bondholders of the refrigerating company, for $261,000. That sale was finally ratified July 20, 1911, and the order confirming it was affirmed by this court in February, 1912. 117 Md. 443, 84 Atl. 150. On the 19th of March, 1912, the Continental Trust Company, trustee, filed a petition in the court below, in which, after reciting that the property had been sold to the Central Securities Company for $503,000, that said company had paid $25,000, but failed to make any further payment, and that the property had been resold at its cost and risk for $261,000, it alleged that the Central Securities Company was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Maryland, and that it acted in purchasing the property of the refrigerating company merely as the agent of other persons, among whom were "holders or representatives of the bonds of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company; that no part of the difference" between the said sum of $503,000 and the sum of $261,000 had been paid to the petitioner, except the sum of $25,000; that the persons for whom the Central Securities Company acted were liable for said difference; that "a deficiency decree should be made against them;" and "that none of the bondholders represented by said Central Securities Company should be permitted to receive any part of the funds held by this trustee, as a dividend on any bond held by them." The petition further alleged: "That, while your petitioner has no reason to believe that any of the bonds of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company were improperly certified, issued, or negotiated, nevertheless the plaintiffs in this case, on or about July 21, 1911, filed a petition in these proceedings, in which petition they allege that certain of the 600 bonds, numbered 701 to 1,300, both inclusive, of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company, were improperly issued, and that no portion of the proceeds of sale of the property mentioned in these proceedings should be distributed to the holders of bonds numbered as aforesaid until this court shall, by proper proceedings, have determined which, if any, of such bonds have been improperly certified, issued, and negotiated. That before a distribution account can be passed in this case it is therefore necessary to determine: (1) For whom and for which of the holders of the bonds of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company the aforesaid Central Securities Company was acting as agent; (2) which of the bonds of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company numbered respectively 701 to 1,300, both inclusive, were improperly certified, issued, and negotiated. Wherefore your petitioner prays that these proceedings may be set down for a hearing on the above questions, and that testimony may be taken orally in open court." No one was named as defendant in the petition, but the court passed an order setting it down for a hearing on the 4th day of April, 1912, provided a copy of the petition and order be served on the two committees of the bondholders, the executors of Robert M. Spedden, the Central Securities Company, William R. Pohler, Julia M. Brauer, and William H. Brauer, or their respective counsel, on or before March 25th. Julia M. and William H. Brauer answered the petition, alleging that they became possessed of the bonds held by them as the distributees of the estate of their father; that, as holders of said bonds, they had filed their claims in the case for the purpose of sharing in the distribution to be made under the direction of the court; that they were in no way represented by the Central Securities Company; that they "concurred in the objects sought by the petition," and submitted their rights to the determination of the court. The Middendorf-Heyward committee, the executors of Robert M. Spedden, and the Central Securities Company filed separate demurrers to the petition. Nothing further was done under said petition until the 15th of October, 1912, when the Middendorf-Heyward committee filed an "additional demurrer." In the meantime, however, the Continental Trust Company, trustee, filed its report to the court, showing that the terms of the sale to Francis T. Homer and others had been complied with; that all exceptions to the sale and all appeals that could be taken had been finally disposed of, and alleging that there was no reason why a distribution among the creditors of the refrigerating company should be further postponed. Upon this report the court passed an order referring the case to the auditor to state an expense account and an account making final distribution of the funds in the hands of the trustee; and account "B" of the auditor, distributing the balance of the fund after deducting costs, fees, etc., among the bondholders, was finally ratified August 19, 1912.

The fourth and fifth grounds of the "additional demurrer" filed by the Middendorf-Heyward committee are as follows:

"Fourth. The petition is founded upon the alleged necessity of certain action by the court prior to the distribution of the funds derived from the sale by the trustee of the property mentioned in the petition, and it appears from the proceedings in the cause had since the filing of the petition, that the funds have been distributed by an auditor's account, finally ratified by this court on August 19, 1912, and the court has therefore no longer any jurisdiction or control over said funds.

"Fifth. The petition shows on its face that the property referred to was sold by the trustee to the Central Securities Company, and upon its sole credit, and that the sale to it was finally ratified by this court; and the order of final ratification thereof is unreversed, and remains in full force and effect, and consequently no other person can now be substituted by the court as purchaser of said property in lieu of the Central Securities Company, or held liable by decree of this court for the default of said company in payment of the purchase money of said property."

After a hearing the court below, by its order of November 18, 1912, sustained the demurrers, and dismissed the petition. Thereupon the Continental Trust Company, trustee, on the 17th of December, 1912, filed a petition for leave to file an amended petition so "as to eliminate the matter of distribution suggested in the demurrer, and to present the question of substance," and in the petition filed as the proposed "amended petition," the relief sought was "a deficiency decree against the principals for whom the Central Securities Company acted." The court below on the same day refused to grant leave to the trustee to file the amended petition, and dismissed its petition of that date, and in its order stated that the demurrers had been sustained on the ground that the sale to the Central Securities Company having been ratified, and the property resold at its risk, it was too late to institute an inquiry at the instance of the trustee as to whether any other persons than the company had purchased the property, and that the proposed amendment did not remove the ground of objection. From these orders of November 18th and December 17th the trustee and the Terminal Freezing & Heating Company have appealed.

Distribution of the proceeds of the sale of all the property of the Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company, after deducting costs, fees, etc., having been made among the bondholders of the company, and the account having been finally ratified without objection, the only important question in this case relates to the right of the trustee, under the circumstances stated above, to hold any other person or persons liable as purchasers for the sum the Central Securities Company agreed to pay for the property, and we think that question was correctly determined by the learned court below.

The trustee having accepted the Central Securities Company as the purchaser of the property, and having reported the sale as made to said company, and the sale having been ratified by the court, the Central Securities Company thereby became the equitable owner of the property. The contract of sale was not set aside, but the resale of the property was a summary proceeding for the enforcement of that contract, and the property was resold as the property of the purchaser, and at its cost and risk. If at the second sale the property had sold for more than the Central Securities Company contracted to pay for it, it would have been entitled to the surplus, after deducting the contract price and interest, and all proper costs, expenses, commissions, etc. The property having sold for less than the amount of the original sale, the securities company is liable for the balance remaining unpaid. This is the rule stated in Mealey v. Page, 41 Md. 172, and followed in the more recent cases. In the case of Schaefer v. O'Brien, 49 Md. 253, the lower court, after the sale had been reported, on the application of the trustee, and without notice to the purchaser, ordered a resale of the property at his risk, and this court held that, as the sale had been reported by the trustee, no order affecting the rights of the purchaser should have been passed without affording him an opportunity to be heard, and that there could be no resale of the property at the risk of the purchaser until the first sale was ratified. In that case Judge Alvey said: "The party must be accepted as the purchaser, and the sale ratified, before he can be proceeded against for the enforcement of the contract of purchase. The summary proceeding against a defaulting purchaser, to obtain an order of resale at his risk, is grounded upon the equitable lien held and controlled by the court as vendor of the property, for the benefit of those interested in the proceeds of sale. Such lien is but the incident of the sale, and does not come into existence, to form the ground of proceeding, until the contract of purchase is consummated." In the case of Berry v. Foley, 92 Md. 311, 48 Atl. 146, it was said by Judge Page: "It would seem to be clear, the order of final ratification having been passed by a court having jurisdiction, that its effect was to invest the purchaser with the equitable ownership of the property from the period of sale, and to entitle him to a deed on payment of the purchase money." In Mealey's Case, where the property brought more at the second sale than it sold for at the first sale, and the original purchaser's claim to the surplus was resisted, Judge Alvey said: "It is even contended that the appellant never in fact intended to pay for the property, and that his conduct in regard to the sale was in truth but a fraudulent device whereby to enable him to speculate on the chances of resale. But, be this as it may, it cannot affect the present claim of the appellant. The ground alleged against the appellant's claim may have formed very sufficient reasons for rejecting or refusing to ratify the sale made to him; but, as that sale was allowed to be finally ratified by the court, the appellant is entitled to occupy the position of a purchaser of the property. Trustees and executors can easily, and should, protect themselves and the estates they represent, from such impositions and practices as the appellee alleges here, by observing with strictness the powers under which they act. They can, and should, in all cases where there are doubts of the good faith or solvency of the purchaser, require security for the compliance with the terms of sale, and that before the sale is ratified. By observing this precaution all danger of imposition, such as is here complained of, is at once effectually avoided." And in Schaefer's Case this court said: "If, however, a sale be reported, as was done in this case, and the purchaser refuse to comply with the terms of sale, upon representation by the trustee or other party in interest, the court may order that cause be shown why the terms of sale are not complied with; and, upon the failure of the party reported as the purchaser to show sufficient cause for his refusal or failure to comply, the court may then, considering all the circumstances of the case, if there be no other sufficient cause to the contrary, either ratify the sale or set it aside, as will best subserve the interest of the parties concerned. In such case, if the sale be set aside, the court may properly, as terms of releasing the party from the purchase, and as the consequence of his own act, impose upon him all the costs and expenses attending the sale thus set aside because of his default. But if the sale be ratified, and the party still fail to comply, the court may then proceed, in a summary way, by order nisi and final order, to direct a resale of the property at the risk of the purchaser."

In the case at bar the trustee accepted the Central Securities Company as the purchaser of the property, and that company, in compliance with the terms of sale, paid the trustee $25,000, which was no doubt deemed a sufficient protection for the persons interested, from the consequences of a failure to further comply with the terms of sale. The sale was reported to and finally ratified by the court, and the subsequent proceedings for the resale of the property were based upon the theory that the contract of sale had been consummated by the order of court, and that the property belonged to said company. Whether that company purchased the property for itself or for other persons is a matter not now open for inquiry in this case. The company was accepted as the purchaser, and in any proceeding for the enforcement of that contract of sale, it alone can be held responsible as the purchaser. This we think was directly decided in the case of Aukam v. Zantzinger, 94 Md. 421, 51 Atl. 93, where the property of F. G. Aukam, the mortgagor, was sold under the mortgage, and, the purchaser, his son, having failed to comply with the terms of sale, it was resold at his risk, and the mortgagor filed objections to the ratifications of the second sale. In that case the present chief judge of this court said: "It would seem to be clear from what we have said that F. G. Aukam had no interest in this property when it was resold, and he therefore had no standing to object to the sale. The fact that the appellant bought it to protect or for the benefit of his father could make no difference. The purchaser accepted by the attorney making the sale was George C. Aukam, and to him alone could he look for the purchase money, under this proceeding. Whatever arrangement he and his father made was merely between them, and could in no way affect the right of the attorney making the sale to hold him responsible for the purchase money, and he alone is liable for any deficiency, and entitled to any surplus, that there may be as the result of the resale. The court had no power to set aside the sale at the instance of F. G. Aukam, as it rightly determined." Aukam v. Zantzinger, 98 Md. 380, 56 Atl. 820.

The first three demurrers did not state the grounds of the demurrers, and it is urged on behalf of the appellants that the order of the court below, of November 18, 1912, should to that extent be reversed. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Section 158 of art. 16 of the Code of 1912 (rule 18), in the form there provided, does require the special grounds of a demurrer to be stated. But there were no exceptions to the demurrers referred to in the court below; and, as the "additional demurrer" filed by the Middendorf-Heyward committee October 15, 1912, does state the grounds of the demurrer, and as that demurrer challenges the right of the petitioner to the relief prayed, we will not, because of the defect indicated in the other or original demurrers, reverse the order of November 18, 1912, which, for the reasons we have stated, must be affirmed.

The appellees have filed a motion to dismiss the appeal from the order of December 17, 1912, refusing the petitioner's prayer for leave to amend, and dismissing its petition of that date. That petition was addressed to the discretion of the court, and, according to the settled rule, its action cannot be reviewed on appeal. Calvert v. Carter, 18 Md. 73; Snook v. Munday, 96 Md. 514, 54 Atl. 77. We might add, however, that as the proposed amendment did not remove the objection relied on in the demurrer, and upon which the court below based its decision, it very properly refused to permit the amendment to be made.

Order of November 18, 1912, affirmed with costs, and the appeal from the order of December 17, 1912, dismissed with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF NEW YORK, Appt.,
v.

SICILIAN ASPHALT PAVING COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Respnt.

(208 N. Y. 45, 101 N. E. 696.)

Indemnity — paving contract — judgment against municipality — liability of contractor.

A provision in a paving contract obligating the contractor to maintain, repair, and replace the pavement for a period of years upon notice, and during the performance

Note. — There are two different ways in which the question in the above case as to the liability of a paving contractor to indemnify the municipality for an injury resulting from the breach of his contract to keep the street in repair might arise: namely, where the contractor's contract contains a stipulation for indemnity, and where it does not. In the first instance the question would be, as in NEW YORK v. SICILIAN ASPHALT PAVING CO., whether the provision for indemnity was sufficient to cover the municipality's liability for personal injuries resulting from the breach of the work to indemnify the city for any injury resulting from negligence in such performance, does not render the contractor liable to indemnify the city for a recovery by a traveler against the city because of its failure promptly to make repairs when notified to do so.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover from defendants the amount which plaintiff had been compelled to pay for injuries sustained through a defect in one of its streets which defendants were alleged to be under obligation to keep in repair. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Terence Farley, with Mr. Archibald R. Watson, for appellant:

The contractor obligates himself to maintain the pavement duty on behalf of the public, in the place and stead of the municipality, and, having assumed that burden, he is not only liable, on his agreement, at the suit of a third person who may have been injured through his neglect, but he is also responsible to the municipality for any damages which naturally and proximately fall upon it in consequence of a breach of that duty.

of the general contract; and in the second instance the question would be merely whether the general rule relating to indemnity could be invoked to render the contractor liable in such circumstances. No additional cases have been found which involve either aspect mentioned above. Discussing the question in the first aspect, the writer, in 22 Cyc. 86, says: "A class of indemnity contracts on which damages have been frequently recovered are those containing a covenant to indemnify and save harmless from injuries to the person or property growing out of the performance of contracts for the construction of buildings or other improvements and other similar contracts. But to justify a recovery it must be shown that the damage or injury alleged is such as fairly falls within the terms of the contract." The cases in which municipalities have sought indemnity upon the ground of the contractor's tort are discussed in other notes in this series. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the city of New York to recover from the defendants the amount which had been paid in satisfaction of a judgment theretofore recovered against the former, at the suit of a person injured upon one of its streets. The complaint was demurred to by one of the defendants for insufficiency of the facts alleged to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer has been sustained in the courts below, and the present appeal is from a final judgment, entered upon the plaintiff's failure to serve an amended complaint. The justices of the appellate division were sharply divided in opinion, and the question of law presented upon this appeal turns upon the construction to be given to certain provisions of a contract made by the city for the grading and paving of one of its streets. This contract, which is made part of the complaint, was with the defendant the Sicilian Asphalt Paving Company, respondent here. By a clause of the contract the contractor was to furnish all the labor and materials necessary, in accordance with specifications attached, to regulate, grade, pave, or repave with asphalt pavement a portion of Forty-fifth street, and was to "maintain said pavement in good condition to the satisfaction of the president (of the borough) for the period of five years from the final completion and acceptance thereof." By another clause, the contractor agreed that, "during the performance of the work herein set forth he will place proper guards upon and around the same for the prevention of accidents.

... will indemnify and save harmless party of the first part against and from all suits and actions, of every name and description, brought against them, and all costs and damages to which it may be put on account, or by reason, of any injury or alleged injury to the person or property of another, resulting from negligence or carelessness in the performance of the work, or in guarding the same, or from any improper materials used in its prosecution." By another clause the contractor agreed "to repair and make good, to the satisfaction of the engineer, any disintegration, cracks, bunches, levees, or settlement, or any depression in the pavement that shall measure more than three eighths ($\frac{3}{8}$) of an inch from the under side of a straight edge four (4) feet long, which shall occur at any time during the period of five years from the date of the acceptance of the whole work under the contract, when notified so to do by the president by a written notice to be served on him. . . . During the period of maintenance, the contractor shall, within five (5) days after the receipt of notice so to do, restore the pavement over all openings made by corporations or plumbers for making new service connections, or repairing, renewing, or removing the same, and over all trenches made for carrying sewers, water or gas pipes or any other subsurface pipes or conduits, for the building or laying of which permits may be issued by the president." After the completion and acceptance of the work called for by the contract, and within five years, permission was granted by the president of the borough to the defendant the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Subway Company to open the pavement at Nos. 537 to 547 West Forty-fifth street. This permission was granted with the condition that that company should indemnify the city against all damages which might result from the company's negligence, and with the consent of the defendant the Sicilian Asphalt Company, and upon the express understanding that the latter would restore the pavement at the expense of the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Company. The asphalt company was duly notified to restore the pavement over the openings made, but failed to do so prior to the happening of an accident, which was caused by the opening in the street. The injured party thereafter recovered a judgment against the city for the damages caused to him.

The judgment below, which sustained the demurrer interposed by the asphalt company to the complaint, was correct; for the reason that its contract with the city only made it answerable over for such damages as might be recovered against the city by reason of accidents happening through the contractor's negligence during the performance of the work of construction or of subsequent repairing. The contractor was not responsible generally for what personal injuries might be occasioned by reason of defective conditions in the street; but only became responsible therefor as its agreements in the contract might devolve responsibility upon it. When the work was performed, which the contract required, then no other continuing liability was provided for, except by the agreement to maintain the pavement in good condition for the period of five years. That simply imposed upon the contractor a duty to see to it that the pavement, which it had laid, should be properly serviceable for street purposes during the period stipulated. There was a distinct and separate agreement on its part that, when notified to that effect by the president of the borough, it would repair and make good certain defects specified, which might be found in the pavement, with the right reserved to the president of the borough, upon its failure to do so, to cause the repairs to be done at the contractor's expense. Another provision, which bound the contractor during the period of maintenance, required it, within five days after the receipt of notice so to do, to "restore the pavement over all openings made by corporations or plumbers," for which permits might be issued by the president of the borough. This provision is an amplification of the contractor's agreement to make repairs during the five years constituting the period of maintenance. It contemplated a condition quite likely to arise in the use of the streets. It was a further consideration for the contract, and the city thereby relieved itself of the expense of that class of street repairs. But the primary liability of the city for the safe condition of its streets could not, and never did, shift to the contractor, and the latter never undertook to keep the street in repair. It could neither make repairs, nor be held for failure in that respect, until the notice had been given. O'Keeffe v. New York, 173 N. Y. 474, 66 N. E. 194. Its agreements to repair and to restore the pavement, in no reasonable view of the contract, comprehended a liability over for personal injuries occasioned by defective street conditions; they subjected it to a liability to make good to the city such expense as the latter might incur in doing the work which the contractor had agreed to do. The argument of the appellant is based upon the erroneous premise that the contractor, by force of its agreements, had obligated itself to perform on behalf of the public the duty which rested upon the municipality. The contract imported no such obligation, and the city could not evade, suspend, or cast upon others the duty, as to the public, of maintaining the streets in a safe condition. Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 437; Turner v. Newburgh, 109 N. Y. 301, 4 Am. St. Rep. 453, 16 N. E. 344. The city had not given over the street to the contractor, in which respect the case differed from one where a railroad company, in consideration of the license from a municipal corporation to use the streets, has agreed to keep the portion of the streets used in repair. In such a case the railroad company, as it was said in Brooklyn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 47 N. Y. 475, at page 485, 7 Am. Rep. 469, "contracts to perform that duty to the public in the place and stead of the municipality, and the way is given over to him for that purpose." The railroad company in that case would be liable independently for an injury caused by a defect in its reserved portion of the street by reason of its failure to perform its agreement to keep it in repair.

This contract neither contains, nor imports, any agreement on the part of the contractor, after completion of the work contracted for and during the period of maintenance, to do anything more than to maintain the pavement, as it had been accepted, and to make such repairs, or to do such relaying of the pavement, as are stipulated for and which may be indicated in the notice to be served.

It does not appear that the contractor was at fault here in any respect, except as it had failed to comply with the notice from the city to restore the pavement over the openings made by the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Company. Liability for that failure would be measured by the expense to which the city would be put in causing the work to be done. Enough has been said in connection with the discussion at the appellate division to indicate the grounds upon which we place our affirmance of the judgment appealed from.

UNIVERSITY LAND COMPANY, Appt.

(— Or. —, 133 Pac. 627.)

Penalty — provision of remission of interest on prompt payment.

The provision in a contract for the payment of the purchase price of real estate

Note. — Effect of provision for remission of part of the principal or interest if payment is made at maturity.

The usual question in contracts similar to that under consideration in WRENN v. UNIVERSITY LAND CO. is whether the difference between the larger and smaller sums is a penalty or liquidated damages. (While this note does not consider the question of usury, the reader will remember that contracts of this kind are in general not usury.) 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) in instalments, with interest, that in case all instalments are paid on or before maturity interest will be remitted, does not render the provision for interest a penalty, and therefore the purchaser is not entitled to a conveyance upon paying the principal without interest, if he has not paid the instalments according to the contract, although the delays were only slight and of little importance.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to compel specific performance of a contract to sell real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Ramsey, J.:

This suit was brought by the respondents against the appellant, asking for the specific performance of a contract to convey lots 38, 39, and 40, as described on the plat of University Park as it appears on record in the public records of deeds of Multnomah county, Oregon. The contract is dated February 15, 1907. The respondents claim that they have fully performed said contract on their part, and are entitled to a deed of conveyance of said lots. The appellant claims that the respondents are not entitled to a conveyance of said lots, because they failed to pay the interest amounting to $74.18, which the appellant asserts has accumulated and become due on the purchase price of said lots. The purchase price of the lots was $600, and it was fully paid, but no interest thereon was paid. Whether or not the respondents were entitled to a deed of conveyance depends upon whether any interest accrued on said contract. The facts in the case were agreed upon by stipulation of the parties. The defendant appealed.

Mr. P. L. Willis, for appellant:

The contract could and did draw interest.

Messrs. Platt & Platt, Palmer L. Fales, and J. O. Bailey, for respondents:

Wherever the payment of a smaller sum is secured by a larger, the larger sum thus contracted for can never be treated as liquidated damages, but must always be treated as a penalty.

Whether an agreement provides for the performance or nonperformance of one single act or of several distinct and separate acts, if the stipulation to pay a certain sum of money upon a default is so framed and of such a nature and effect that it necessarily renders the defaulting party liable in the same amount at all events, both when the failure to perform is complete and when it is only partial, the sum must be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages.

Cases are excluded where the obligation of a third party is brought in on agreeing to reduce a debt if paid promptly. See Rose v. Rose, Ambl. 331; Carroll v. O'Connor, 11 Ir. Eq. Rep. 200; Watson v. Mason, 22 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 574 (reversing 22 Grant, Ch. [U. C.] 180).

Where there is an agreement by a creditor to remit part of his debt if paid by a certain day, on a default the whole debt may be recovered, and equity will grant no relief. Sewell v. Musson, 1 Vern. 210, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 28, Pl. 3; Ex parte Bennett 2 Atk. 527; Ford v. Chesterfield, 19 Beav. 428, 2 Week. Rep. 640; Eargle v. Lorick, 55 S. C. 431, 33 S. E. 490.

This rule is recognized in United States Mortg. Co. v. Sperry, 138 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 969, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321.

Where a creditor agrees to take less than his debt if paid by such a day a tender a day or two later will not avoid an action for the whole sum. Sewell v. Musson, 1 Vern. 210.

(But a technical default in payment was relieved against where an attempt to pay in time was made in good faith. Mookerjee v. Masseyk, 9 Week. Rep. 4.)

In some of the cases, as in WRENN v. UNIVERSITY LAND CO., the deduction was to be of the interest or a part of it.

Thus, where a mortgagee lends money at a certain per cent, but agrees in the deed that if the money be paid within three months after it becomes due, that he will accept a lower per cent, after such time he is entitled to the higher rate (Jory v. Cox, Prec. in Ch. 160), for chancery can give him no relief (in Re Powis, 3 Atk. 519).

Where a note made in Alabama was payable in New York for a certain sum, with lawful interest from date till paid, "but if the principal sum shall be punctually paid when due, then, in that case and not otherwise, the interest is to be deducted," it was held that there could be no abatement of interest unless the note was promptly paid; the court laying stress on the fact that in view of the high rate of exchange, prompt payment in New York might be equivalent in advantage to the amount of interest. Ely v. Witherspoon, 2 Ala. 131.

In Ex parte Bennet, 2 Atk. 527, Lord Hardwicke, said: "The general rule of equity with respect to compositions of debts has been rightly laid down, that the court will not dispense with the point of time in compositions; for where a creditor agrees to take less than his debt, so that it be paid precisely at the day, and the debtor fails of payment, he cannot be relieved (Sewell's Case, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 28, Pl. 3)," and he considered that the same should be true where the debtor became a bankrupt.

In Thompson v. Hudson, L. R. 4 H. L. 1, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 431 (reversing L. R. 2 Ch. 255, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 388, 15 Week Rep. 697), it was held that where, in consideration of payment by a certain time, a creditor agrees to remit part of his debt, stipulating that default shall revive the entire debt, upon default the entire debt can be recovered.

The question of form.

There was a clear distinction in chancery between an agreement to pay a certain sum which would be satisfied by the payment of a smaller sum if paid by a certain time, and an agreement to pay a certain sum with a proviso that if not paid by a certain time then a larger sum would be due.

Thus, in Re Powis, supra, Lord Hardwicke said that if a "mortgage had been made, with a reservation of 4 per cent interest, with a proviso that upon nonpayment thereof within a certain time after it is due the mortgagor shall pay 5 per cent, such proviso would not be good, and has been determined several times; because, where the interest is to be increased if not paid at the day, that is but as a nomine pœna, and relievable in equity." See also a similar statement by the same judge in Walmsley v. Booth, Barnard Ch. 475, 2 Atk. 25.

And in Bonafous v. Rybot, 3 Burr. 1374, Lord Mansfield said: "There is a distinction in the court of chancery, 'that if 5

Dec. 486.

Where the construction of a contract is doubtful, the tendency of the court is in favor of the interpretation which makes the sum a penalty.

Wilhelm v. Eaves, 21 Or. 199, 14 L.R.A. 297, 27 Pac. 1053; Cushing v. Drew, 97 Mass. 445; 13 Cyc. 95; Foley v. McKeegan, per cent be reserved for interest on a mortgage, with a condition to accept 4 if punctually paid; this condition must be strictly performed; and the debtor shall not have relief in equity after the day of payment is elapsed (because the 1 per cent was to be abated upon a condition which is not performed), but if 4 per cent be reserved, with an agreement that if the 4 be not punctually paid at the day, the mortgagee shall pay 5, that shall be considered as a penalty added; and the court of equity will, in such case, relieve against it."

Lord Eldon, however, confuses the two forms in his remarks in Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. Jr. 205, where he is reported to have said: "Time is not regarded here as at law. So, in the instance of a mortgage with interest at 5 per cent, and a condition to take 4 if regularly paid; or at 4 per cent, with a condition for 5, if not regularly paid. At law you might in that case recover the 5 per cent, for it is the legal interest. But this court regards the 5 per cent as a penalty for securing the 4; and time is no farther the essence than that if it is not paid at the time, the party may be relieved from paying the 5 per cent by paying the 4 per cent, and putting the other party in the same condition as if the 4 per cent had been paid; that is, by paying him interest on the 4 per cent as if it had been received at the time."

In some of the American cases it has been held that there is no distinction between the two forms of contract. This has been done for the purpose of sustaining the terms of an agreement to pay a larger sum on default in paying a smaller one, the decision being that such an agreement was the same thing as a promise to pay the larger sum, with the privilege of satisfying the contract by prompt payment of a smaller sum. Reeves v. Stipp, 91 Ill. 610; Rogers v. Sample, 33 Miss. 312, 69 Am. Dec. 349; Satterwhite v. McKie, Harp. L. 397; in all of which cases the contract provided for interest if the principal was not promptly paid.

Ramsey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit for specific performance is based on a written contract of which the following is a copy, in part, to wit: "This contract, made and entered into this 15th day of February, 1907, by and between University Land Company, a corporation of Multnomah county, Oregon, as first party to discharge a larger sum by the prompt payment of a smaller sum would be a contract for a penalty if such would be the effect of a contract increasing the sum due on a default. Longworth v. Askren, 15 Ohio St. 370, where the court said: "Nor, in our view, does the order in which the sums are stated change their character, or the legal effect of the instrument; for, whether the amount to be paid is to be reduced upon compliance which the sums are stated change their creased on a default, is only a different mode of expressing the same thing." See also to similar effect Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. v. Selz, S. & Co. 157 Ill. 186, 41 N. E. 625, infra.

It has been asserted that to insure the the enforcement of the contract according to its terms, it is necessary that the larger sum should be the real debt.

Thus, where a promissory note payable in instalments, with interest, in ten years (the contract price of a lot), provided that if every payment was made respectively within ten days after due, "as an inducement to punctuality," one-fifth part of the principal sum would be released, and the balance, with interest on such balance, accepted in full payment, it was held that the four fifths was evidently the amount of the debt and the other one fifth a penalty. Longworth v. Askren, supra.

And in Waggoner v. Cox, 40 Ohio St. 539, where there was given for a dower right a promise to pay $800 on a certain day a few months later, provided that if the promisor should pay the promisee $40 a year for life it should be a discharge of the debt, the court, in holding that upon all the facts $800 was the price of the dower right and became due upon default in instalments, distinguished the Longworth Case and said: "To this state of facts another principle applies and is decisive. When the larger sum is the actual debt, and a smaller sum has been agreed upon as a release if paid under stated conditions, the hereto, and Sara B. Wrenn, Ada A. Schlott, Susie M. Wrenn, as second party hereto, witnesseth: That the said first party, in consideration of the covenants, and agreements, herein contained and the payments herein mentioned, agrees to sell unto the second party, all the land situated in the county of Multnomah and state of Oregon, and described as follows, to wit: Lots thirty-eight (38), thirty-nine (39), and forty (40), block 182, as shown and designated on the plat of University Park as the same appears on record in the public records of deeds of said Multnomah county, and delivers the possession thereof to said second party, all for the sum or purchase price of six hundred dollars ($600), to be paid by the second party to the first party at its office in Portland, Oregon, at the following named times, to wit: Thirty dollars ($30) in cash, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged and the remainder in monthly instalments, as follows: Fifteen dollars ($15) thereof on or before the 15th day of March, 1907, and fifteen ($15) additional dollars thereof on or before the 15th day of each calendar month thereafter until the whole of said purchase price shall be paid. All of which payments said second party hereby agrees to make at the times and place above provided therefor, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable in like instalments immediately after the last instalment of principal shall fall due. All interest shall be remitted if each instalment of principal neglect to comply with the easier terms gives the creditor the right to compel the payment of the larger sum. 1 Sutherland, Damages, 499."

On the other hand, other cases look to the contract. Thus, where a bond was to be void if interest on a certain sum was annually paid during the life of the obligee, but upon default such sum should be due and payable, this was held to be liquidated damages, although at the time of the default the obligee's life interest was worth less than such sum. Berrinkott v. Trap-hagen, 39 Wis. 219 (where the point of the case was that the contract was not unreasonable).

So, in Russell v. Wright, 23 S. D. 338, 121 N. W. 842, where two notes secured by mortgage were executed to pay certain commissions, one of them stating that if the payments on the other were promptly made and certain other payments affecting the mortgage security were made, that then the second note should be void, it was held that the holder of the second note in enforcing a breach was not enforcing a forfeiture but the contract of the parties.

In Jordan v. Lewis, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 426, it was held that a promissory note containing a stipulation that, if paid by a certain day before maturity a certain less sum "is to satisfy this note," does not involve a penalty, and the larger sum may be collected at maturity. This case was followed in Carter v. Corley, 23 Ala. 612 (where there seems to be a misprint in the maturity of the note as copied in the court's opinion).

It will be observed that in these Alabama cases it does not appear which sum was the actual debt. In the Carter Case, the court said, referring to the Jordan Case: "We have heretofore decided that in a note made after this form, where a greater sum may be discharged by the payment of a less sum at an earlier day, the greater sum will not be considered in the nature of a penalty, but the debt actually due, and is recoverable if the less sum be not paid according to the terms of the note."

Discounts.

Where a contract to use the plaintiff's electric lighting service provided that, in consideration of defendant's using it for a year and paying bills by the 10th of the month, certain large discounts would be allowed, it was held on the defendant's ceasing within the year to use such service that the discounts already allowed on bills paid were collectable by the plaintiff, as the real ground of the discounts was the provision to use the service for a year. Missouri Edison Electric Co. v. M. J. Steinberg Hat & Fur Co. 94 Mo. App. 543, 68 S. W. 383.

So, where the defendant failed to keep a similar contract to use the plaintiff's light service exclusively for a certain number of years the discounts of 20 per cent allowed him by the contract were recoverable from him. Missouri Electric Light & P. Co. v. Carmody, 72 Mo. App. 534; Missouri Edison Electric Co. v. Bry, 88 Mo. App. 135.

But, in Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. v. Selz, S. & Co. 157 Ill. 186, 41 N. E. 625, where a lease of machines for monthly rents and royalties provided that if paid by the middle of the month there should be a discount of 50 per cent, it was held that this 50 per cent was too unreasonable to be considered a discount, and must be considered a penalty, and not recoverable. (The contract is somewhat contradictory as to whether the payment to obtain a discount should be in advance or within fifteen days after due.)

But the opposite was held upon a somewhat similar contract in United Shoe Machinery Co. v. Abbott, 86 C. C. A. 118, 158 Fed. 762, where the court, while not entirely approving the Goodyear Case, distinguished it on the ground that in its opinion the contract in the Goodyear Case was for discounts if payment was made within fifteen days after the same was due, and so there was a penalty for more than fifteen days' delay, while the discount in the Shoe Company Case was to be obtained if the payment was in advance.

shall be paid at or before maturity." It will be perceived that the agreed purchase price of the three lots was $600. Thirty dollars of the purchase price was paid at the time the contract was executed, leaving $570 to be paid in 38 monthly instalments on or before the 15th day of each month until the whole $570 should be paid.

The question to be decided arises upon the following clause of the contract: "All of which payments said second party hereby agrees to make at the times and place above provided for, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable in like instalments immediately after the last instalment of principal shall fall due. All interest shall be remitted if each instalment of principal shall be paid at or before maturity." The respondents failed to pay the instalments of principal on or before the 15th day of ten of the months in which said instalments became due, but the 15th days of three of those months fell on Sundays. In two instances the payments were made on the 17th day of the month, and in the other eight instances the payments were made on the 16th days of the months. The defaults were only for one or two days in each instance.

The respondents claim that the provision in the contract for the payment of interest was a penalty, and that no interest became due or payable. This presents the only question for decision on this appeal. While the defaults were only for a day or two in each instance, they were sufficient to preclude the respondents' having the benefit of the clause in the contract "remitting the payment of interest," unless the clause providing for the payment of interest created a penalty. The contract does not use the word "penalty" or the phrase "liquidated damages." It will be observed that by this contract the respondents agreed to make all the payments of principal imposed by the contract at the times and place provided for by the contract, "with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable in like instalments immediately after the last instalment of principal shall fall due," and then provided that all interest shall be remitted, if each instalment of principal shall be paid on or before maturity. The agreement to pay interest is absolute. The clause providing for the remission of interest is an independent sentence, to be construed, however, in connection with the sentence preceding it. The provision for remission of the interest was to be operative only on condition that the respondents should pay each instalment of principal on or before its maturity. The interest was to be 8 per cent 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

per annum, and, according to the terms of the contract, it was to be paid as interest.

Black, in his Law Dictionary, 2d ed. p. 887, defines "penalty" thus: "A penalty is an agreement to pay a greater sum to secure the payment of a less sum. It is conditional, and can be avoided by the payment of the less sum before the contingency agreed upon shall happen." Professor Pomeroy, in § 436, vol. 1, of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, 3d ed., states the rule thus as to penalties: "It may be regarded as a rule of universal application that if a party for any reason is liable to pay, or binds himself to pay, a certain sum of money, and adds a stipulation to the effect that, in case such sum shall not be paid at the time agreed upon, he shall then be liable to pay, or be bound to pay, a larger sum of money, the stipulation to pay the larger sum is invariably and necessarily a penalty. Of course, in this proposition, it is understood that the 'larger sum' is not simply the lawful interest accruing upon the principal actually due." According to Professor Pomeroy, lawful interest to be paid upon money actually due cannot constitute the "larger sum" to be paid, which is necessary to create a penalty. This is a material point in this case, because the "larger sum" to be paid in this case is the 8 per cent interest per annum on the principal sum agreed to be paid for the three lots.

This court held in Close v. Riddle, 40 Or. 596, 91 Am. St. Rep. 580, 67 Pac. 933, that where a promissory note bore interest from its date until maturity at 6 per cent per annum, and contained a clause to the effect that, if it should not be paid at maturity, it should bear interest from the day of its maturity at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, the clause increasing the rate of interest from 6 to 8 per cent per annum was valid, and did not create a penalty. Moore, J., delivering the opinion of the court in that case said inter alia: "While the decisions upon this subject are not uniform, we think the great preponderance of authority supports the rule that, where a higher rate of interest is expressly reserved to be paid after maturity, the rate so stipulated is recoverable if not usurious." That case seems to settle the law in this state upon that question. The point was directly made in that case that the clause increasing the rate of interest from 6 to 8 per cent per annum after maturity of the debt created a penalty, and that equity would not enforce it, but the court held that it was valid and enforced it. In Rumsey v. Matthews, 1 Bibb, 242, the court says: "It has been always admitted that if the contract be for the payment of principal and interest by a given day, with a proviso that if the principal be punctually paid on that day the interest should be remitted, both principal and interest shall be recovered if the principal be not punctually paid. In good sense there can exist no difference between that case and this. In both no interest is demandable if the debt be punctually paid; in both the obligor may discharge himself by paying the principal without interest on the day; and in both the obligee may, if he chooses, demand payment on the day, but without interest. In both cases the contract is equally fair, and the object is the same in both, to wit, the securing punctuality in the payment of the principal. . . . It is just that interest shall be paid for the use of money. In the present case the parties have stipulated as to the time the interest shall begin to run in the way most favorable to the obligor by allowing him to discharge himself on the day without interest. The parties were competent to make this agreement; it is prohibited by no statute; there is no turpitude in it, and there is no principle of sound policy militating against it."

Referring to a contract analogous to the one in question, the court in Rogers v. Sample, 33 Miss. 312, 69 Am. Dec. 349, says: "There is nothing illegal or unconscientious in such a contract; for the debtor can readily avoid the payment of interest by doing that which law and good faith require him to do, viz., paying the principal at maturity. He is therefore subjected to no loss, except what he has occasioned by his own wrong." Chief Justice Christancy in Flanders v. Chamberlain, 24 Mich. 316, says: "As this note shows upon its face that it was to draw no interest before maturity, if then paid, it is claimed that this is in the nature of a penalty; and in an ordinary case, when a note is given for a precedent debt, I am strongly inclined to think such a provision for interest from date at 10 per cent, if not paid when due, ought to be treated as a penalty rather than stipulated damages for nonpayment at the day. But it is shown that this note was given for property sold on these specific terms, such being the condition of the sale, and undoubtedly a vendor has a right to refuse to sell except upon this or any other condition; and, such being the condition of the sale in pursuance of which the note was given, I think it must draw interest from date at the rate mentioned." In Fisher v. Anderson, 25 Iowa, 28, 95 Am. Dec. 761, the court held that where a promissory note stipulated that, if it be not paid when due, it shall draw interest at 10 per cent per annum from date, it is not usurious, and that, if it was not paid at maturity, the principal and 10 per cent interest from date could be recovered, and rejected the contention that it was a penalty. In the case of Reeves v. Stipp, 91 Ill. 610, 611, the court says: "The defense insisted upon is that the interest reserved in the note from the date thereof unless paid at maturity is a penalty, and, as the maker died before the note matured, it is contended the estate, equitably, ought not to be held for it. The fallacy of the position taken lies in the assumption that the rate of interest reserved from the date of the note, which was evidently intended to secure prompt payment, is penalty, and not liquidated damages. Whether the sum named in an agreement to secure performance will be treated as liquidated damages or as penalty is often a question of much difficulty. . . . It is very clear the parties in this case intended the interest reserved should be the measure of damages in case the note was not paid when due. The parties call it neither penalty nor liquidated damages, but that is a matter of no consequence. It is simply a rate of interest which is lawful by contract under our statute from the date of the note, inserted with a view to secure prompt payment. It is a contract the maker could lawfully make, and, if living, it could be enforced against him as valid and binding in law," etc. In Thompson v. Gorner, 104 Cal. 168, 43 Am. St. Rep. 81, 37 Pac. 900, the court held where a promissory note, after providing for the payment of interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, provided also that, if the principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month, such a contract is not to be treated as a penalty, but as a contract to pay 1 per cent per month interest upon a contingency. In McKay v. Belknap Sav. Bank, 27 Colo. 54, 59 Pac. 747, the court says: "On the other hand, counsel for appellee contend that the agreement to pay an increased rate of interest in case of such default (nonpayment of principal at maturity) is a contract to pay a higher rate of interest on a contingency, or a contract for liquidated damages; and that such an agreement, not being in contravention of any statute, or affected by actual fraud, or such circumstances as warrant the inference of undue advantage, is enforceable both at law and in equity. We think the latter view is correct." 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1049, discussing this question, says: "By the weight of authority a stipulation for a higher rate of interest after maturity is valid and enforceable, provided the increased rate which it is sought to recover does not exceed the highest rate allowed by law, and in the absence of a statute limiting the rate which may be contracted for, or where the rate provided for after maturity is not unlawful, a stipulation for a higher rate after maturity will generally be considered as liquidation of the damages, rather than as a penalty for a breach."

We have examined all the authorities referred to in the briefs of counsel and some others, but we deem it unnecessary to refer to any additional cases. While there is some conflict in the decision, we think that both reason and a strong preponderance of the authorities are to the effect that the agreement of the respondents in this case to pay interest is not a penalty, and that it is an agreement to pay interest on $570 at 8 per cent per annum, with a condition that, if each instalment of principal should be paid at or before maturity thereof, the payment of interest should be remitted. We deem such a contract valid and enforceable both at law and in equity. It was in the power of the respondents to avoid the paying of the interest by paying each instalment of principal on or before its maturity as they agreed to do. Their failure to make the payments promptly when due fastens on them the liability to pay the interest stipulated to be paid. The rate of interest to be paid is only 8 per cent per annum.

It is usual for debtors to pay interest on deferred payments, and there is nothing unreasonable in an agreement in a case like this to pay interest at 8 per cent per annum on the principal if the instalments of principal should not be paid promptly when due. The agreement to pay interest in this case is not repugnant to any statute or contrary to public policy, and fraud is not charged. The respondents are not entitled to a decree for specific performance on the contract, because they have not paid the interest provided for by the contract.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the case is remanded to the court below, with instructions to enter in its journal the decree of this court, and to dismiss the suit without prejudice to the rights of the respondents to institute another suit for specific performance after paying said interest.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

C. B. SPENCER, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

New Trial — cumulative evidence.

Newly discovered evidence of a witness to a homicide, that accused did not fire the fatal shot, but that his brother did, is ground for new trial after conviction, if the circumstances were not such as to make accused responsible for the brother's act, although the brother testified at the trial that the shot was fired by him.

(February 12, 1913.)

Note. — Cumulative evidence as ground for new trial in criminal cases.

I. In general, 903.

II. Circumstances under which cumulative evidence has or has not been held to render a different outcome probable, 911.

On the question of cumulative evidence as ground for new trial in general, see note to State v. Stowe, 14 L.R.A. 609.

I. In general.

Newly discovered evidence, in order to be ground for new trial, must satisfy several elementary requirements. The courts are not wholly in accord concerning all these requirements, but, without exception, they agree upon the following:

1. That the newly discovered evidence be such as could not, with reasonable diligence, have been discovered and produced at the trial.

2. That it be not merely cumulative.

3. That it be such as to render a different result probable on the retrial of the case.

The second of these requirements, applied to criminal cases, is the subject of this note. In order to understand the application of this requirement, however, it is necessary to keep the others in mind, especially the third one.

While the rule stated in a majority of the cases is that a new trial will not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is "merely cumulative," or "simply cumulative," other cases append the qualification, "unless under some peculiar circumstances," or, putting the qualification in more definite form, hold that a new trial will be granted in doubtful cases where it is probable that the newly discovered evidence will produce a different result, notwithstanding it is cumulative in character.

It is probable that in many of the cases which state the rule without qualification, this has been done merely because the case presented no facts which would call for the application of the exception, rather, than APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Falls County convicting him of manslaughter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Defendant is not entitled to a new trial.

Harper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, when tried, was convicted of manslaughter, and his punishment assessed because of an intention to negative the existence of any possible exception. This is demonstrated by the fact that many of these cases were decided by courts which on other occasions have been recognized the existence of the exception stated. Furthermore, although certain civil cases (of which Sisler v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 769, 28 S. E. 721, may be mentioned as an instance) have denied that a new trial may ever be had for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative, however decisive such evidence may be, no criminal case has been found which denies a new trial on the ground that newly discovered evidence is cumulative, while admitting at the same time that, if produced on the trial, it would have been likely to bring about a different result. It would therefore appear that the rule that a new trial will not be granted to permit the introduction of cumulative evidence has more sound than meaning; the real test being that applied to all newly discovered evidence, whether cumulative or not, namely, the probability of a different verdict; and that the only significance of the cumulative character of evidence lies in the improbability that evidence of the same character as that which a jury has by its verdict already rejected would lead to a different result.

In this connection the language of the court in State v. Albert, 109 La. 201, 33 So. 196, is interesting. It is as follows: "When a court refuses a new trial on the ground that the newly discovered evidence is merely cumulative, it is tantamount to saying that, were it offered in a new trial, the result of the second trial would not, in its opinion, be different from that on the first."

And in Mitchell v. State, 6 Ga. App. 554, 65 S. E. 326, it is said that the main question is not whether the newly discovered evidence is cumulative, but whether, cumulative or not, it would probably produce a different result on a second trial.

On the other hand, in some of the earlier decisions, it seems very probable that the court found two grounds for refusing a new trial in the failure of the newly discovered evidence to satisfy, first, the requirement against cumulative evidence, and, second, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that against evidence which would not render a different result probable. In some cases this is too clear to be open to doubt. State v. Alvarez, 7 La. Ann. 283, the earliest decision in that jurisdiction on this point, is such a case. After stating the principle requiring the evidence to be such as ought to produce a different result, the court continues: "At all events, we would not interfere with the discretion of the district court in refusing a new trial, because testimony merely cumulative might be produced."

In State v. Lamothe, 37 La. Ann. 43, the court assigns as its reason for denying a new trial that "the evidence was, at most, only cumulative and corroborative in its character, and that it was not such as ought to produce, on another trial, an opposite result on its merits." From this language it is not clear whether the court means to assign a failure to satisfy two requirements, or merely to imply that the cumulative requirement is qualified by the probability of a different result. The court discusses the point no further, but cites Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 854, from which it is evident that two requirements have failed of satisfaction. In this same case the syllabus is as follows: "New trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence will not be enforced . . . when the evidence is merely cumulative and corroborative, and not calculated, in the opinion of the judge, to produce a different result on another trial."

Similar instances are to be found in the early decisions of other jurisdictions, which, like Louisiana, now hold the qualified rule to be the law.

The rule that a new trial will not be granted in a criminal prosecution for newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative is stated in or supported by the following decisions:

at three years' confinement in the penitentiary. The state's evidence would support the verdict, and we do not deem it necessary to state it in detail, but only such of it as will explain the opinion of the court.

On the trial it was proven that deceased and appellant had been friends, but on the morning of the difficulty deceased went into the store of appellant to transact some business; that a dispute arose, and deceased called appellant a son of a bitch. It is not clear which one committed the first overt act in the actual difficulty that occurred; but it is apparent that they "clinched," and a scuffle ensued. A state's witness says that during the difficulty appellant pulled a pistol and shot deceased, and there are circumstances in the case which support this theory. Appellant testified, admitting the difficulty, but says he had no pistol, and did not do the shooting, and did not know who did do it; that deceased had an arm around his neck, and he was so situated he could not and did not see the shooting; that, when the pistol fired, deceased fell and dragged him down with him.

John Spencer, a brother of appellant, who was a clerk in the store, tells of the difficulty, and says that deceased had his brother (appellant) around the neck with his left arm, and run his right hand in his pocket, saying at the time, "I will cut your God damn guts out," and he (John Spencer) then fired the shot that killed the deceased. If John Spencer in fact shot the deceased, there is no evidence that appellant, C. B. Spencer, had any knowledge of such intention on John Spencer's part.

The jury find that C. B. Spencer, appellant, fired the shot, and not John Spencer, and, as we said before, the evidence had on the trial would support their so finding. The amended motion for a new trial, together with the affidavits attached and evidence heard on the motion for new trial, shows that, after the trial, the foreman of the jury met a friend who informed him that they had convicted the wrong man, and in the conversation disclosed his reasons for so believing, stating his source of information. The foreman of the jury went promptly to appellant's counsel and told him what he had heard. Upon investigation, it was discovered that there was a man who claimed he had seen the difficulty, and who would testify that John Spencer, and not appellant, was the person who fired the shot. This witness left Marlin shortly after the difficulty, and is now residing in Missouri. Appellant's counsel went to Missouri, and saw this witness, Mr. Floyd P. Smith, and attaches the affidavit of Mr. Smith, which reads as follows:

In the spring of 1908 I went to Marlin, Texas, to live, for my health, and remained there until July, 1909. During all of that time I was in the employ of Curtis & Company at their store in Marlin. I was working there at the time a man named Thomas was shot and killed in the store of C. B. Spencer, just across the street from the store I worked in. I saw John Spencer shoot Mr. Thomas. C. B. Spencer did not shoot Mr. Thomas. There was only one shot fired, and I saw John Spencer fire that. The circumstances were as follows, so far as I saw: It was about the noon hour, and I had started out the north front door of Curtis & Company to go get a sack of tobacco, and just as I got on the sidewalk (being on Commerce street) I heard a scuffling in the front part of Spencer's store across the street. I looked over there and saw Mr. Thomas scuffling with someone. This party Mr. Thomas was scuffling with was backing before Mr. Thomas caught hold of him, and, just as Mr. Thomas caught him, he backed behind the edge of the door facing from me so that I could only see

Mr. Thomas, and could not see the person he had hold of. As they backed against the wall, I heard a trace chain fall, or something that sounded like it, and just at this time, while these two men were scuffling there by the door facing, I saw John Spencer come up the south aisle of the Spencer store and shoot Mr. Thomas in the side or back with a pistol, and just then I saw C. B. Spencer come out from behind the door facing so that I then knew, and now state as a fact, that it was C. B. Spencer that Mr. Thomas was scuffling with. Mr. C. B. Spencer came instantly into my view after the shot was fired, and he did not then have any pistol in either hand, nor did I see him with one at any time. John Spencer was standing directly in front

Can.—Reg. v. Mellroy, 15 U. C. C. P. 116.

If the newly discovered evidence is cumulative of testimony offered at the trial, on the question of new trial it seems to be immaterial whether such testimony was that of a witness on behalf of the prosecution, or of the defense. People v. Brewer, 19 Cal. App. 742, 127 Pac. 808; State v. Larrimore, 20 Mo. 425; State v. Ray, 53 Mo. 345; State v. Montgomery, 37 Utah, 515, 109 Pac. 315.

The rule that newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative will not constitute a good cause for a new trial is applicable to a case where the evidence on the trial was exclusively the evidence of a party to the suit. Winsett v. State, 57 Ind. 26.

A case where the evidence given upon the trial has been elicited from the party accused as a witness in his own behalf forms no exception to the statutory rule that a new trial cannot be granted for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative. People v. Leighton, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 468.

And the discovery of evidence which is simply cumulative of that of the existence of which defendant knew when the case was tried, and which he might then have introduced, is not ground for a new trial. Jinks v. State, 117 Ga. 714, 44 S. E. 814.

The rule in its qualified form is stated in or supported by the following decisions:

of the door, and about 4 or 5 feet back from it, at the corner of the show case by the south aisle, when he shot Mr. Thomas. When the shot was fired Thomas dropped to his knees or entirely to the floor,—he fell. But I cannot definitely say whether it was just to his knees, his all fours, or entirely down, as I turned abruptly and went immediately back in the Curtis & Company store. As I went in I met Gilbert O. Burgess coming to the front door, and he turned and went back with me. We then looked through the glass door, and I saw Mr. Thomas. He was then standing up again, and he seemed to be leaning on C. B. Spencer, or Mr. C. B. Spencer was trying to hold him up, but he gradually sank to the floor. I knew both of the Spencers well by sight, and came in daily contact with them. I cannot be mistaken when I say it was John Spencer, and not C. B. Spencer, that shot Mr. Thomas. John Spencer was standing in front of the door back only a few feet from it, and in plain view of me, when he fired the shot. He was about 70 feet from me. I have never told anyone what I saw or knew about this matter, except Mr. Gilbert Burgess and Mr. D. W. Stallworth, of Marlin; nor have I told or intimated to anyone else that I knew anything at all about the killing of Mr. Thomas. I have never told Mr. C. B. Spencer, or any of his attorneys or family or anyone else, about my knowing anything of this matter, and he had no reason for suspecting that I knew of it that I know or can think of My reason for not wanting anyone to know that I knew the facts I have stated above, and on the opposite side of this sheet of paper, is the condition of my health at that time. I had gone to Texas and to Marlin for lung trouble, and my doctor, Dr. Allen, of Marlin, had told me that I had a cavity in each lung, and had advised me against any excitement whatever, and I very much feared any excitement whatever. What did happen and my seeing it put me to bed for several hours. I regarded my condition there at that time as serious. Later I went to Dr. Torbett, of Marlin, and in July of that year he advised me to go to San Marcos, Texas, on account of my lung trouble. I left Marlin in July, 1909, and have never been back since. I went from there to San Marcos, Texas, where I remained eleven months, and then came direct to my old home at Laddonia, Missouri, where I now live. My health is now much improved, and I believe I have almost, if not entirely, recovered from my lung trouble, but otherwise my health is not very good at this particular time. If this case is ever tried again in the trial court, it is my intention to be present and give my testimony in this case, and I would have given both sides the benefit of what I know before this, but for the reasons above stated. I am thirty-three years old, have been married fourteen years, and have three children. I have no special interest in this matter, and only a speaking acquaintance with C. B. Spencer. I have

In some cases the qualification of the rule takes the form of the statement that a court will not refuse to grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence for the reason that it is cumulative merely, if it is sufficient to render clear that which was before a doubtful case. See Adams v. State, 55 Fla. 1, 46 So. 152; Andersen v. State, 43 Conn. 514, 21 Am. Rep. 669; People v. Vanderpool, 1 Mich. N. P. 157; Casey v. State, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Though it be the rule that a new trial will not be granted in order to permit the introduction of evidence merely cumulative, the rule is not inflexible. The cumulative evidence, however, should be such as to impress the trial judge that, if added to the other evidence of the case, it would be likely to turn the scales in favor of the accused. State v. Albert, 109 La. 201, 33 So. 196; State v. Ferguson, 114 La. 70, 38 So. 23.

In Dougherty v. State, 7 Ga. App. 91, 66 S. E. 276, the court said: "As a general rule, a new trial will not be granted on account of the discovery of facts and circumstances merely cumulative in their character; but, of course, this rule must be taken in its proper sense, and is not to be understood as precluding a new trial in every case where newly discovered testimony relates to a point contested on a former trial. Where the testimony on the trial was purely circumstantial, and the newly discovered testimony is of a direct and positive kind, from a creditable witness, proving the essential fact in controversy, it would seem that the rule should not be strictly applied. There is a tendency to discredit circumstantial evidence, or at least to attach much less weight to that character of evidence than to positive and direct testimony; and it must be conceded that almost universally evidence of the latter character is given much more weight than evidence of the former character. Evidence, therefore, which is positive and direct as to the existence of a material fact, is not in a strict sense cumulative of circumstantial evidence tending to show the existence of the same fact; for cumulative evidence is additional evidence to support the same point, and must be of the same quality or description as the evidence already produced. Evidence which merely tends to corroborate or strengthen evidence already introduced is cumulative, but evidence which removes all doubt upon a material point which was before doubtful is not in never been convicted of or charged with a felony or any other offense, and no fact exists that would render me incompetent as a witness. I am well known by the business people of Marlin, Texas. I am a member of the Christian church. I have never seen anyone from Marlin since I left there except Mr. Gilbert Burgess. As I recollect it, this shooting occurred in February, 1909. a legal sense cumulative, and such evidence will warrant the grant of another trial, as it shows that injustice has apparently been done, and that on another trial a different result will probably follow. Even merely cumulative evidence, if it has the effect to render clear and positive that which was before equivocal and uncertain, might justify a new trial."

In Holton v. State, 9 Ga. App. 414, 71 S. E. 599, it was said: "The rule is well established—indeed, it is the language of the statute of this state—that new trials should not be granted for evidence merely cumulative in character. The adverb 'merely' in the statute and in the decisions, as qualifying the character of the evidence, is significant. We apprehend that, if the newly discovered testimony as to some facts was that of a witness who was entitled to credit as against the testimony to the same point given by witnesses on the trial who were not entitled to credit, or who have been impeached, the testimony would not be merely cumulative, for the additional fact of the character of the newly discovered witness would take it out of that category, at least to some extent; and it is easy to imagine cases in which a fact, although testified to by many witnesses on the previous trial, while not believed because of the character of the witnesses who testified to its existence, yet might be believed without hesitation, if, on a second trial, it was testified to by only one witness of unquestioned and unimpeached veracity."

The doctrine of the preceding cases is exemplified by State v. Townsend, 7 Wash. 462, 35 Pac. 367. At the trial the defendant had been unable to secure any witnesses except Indians, but since the trial he had discovered evidence in the shape of testimony of a reputable white man. On account of the probability that a jury would give more credit to the white man than to the Indians, and so bring about a change in the verdict, a new trial was granted.

The case of People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 Pac. 226, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 512, is very similar. The only witness for the defense, besides the defendant, was not able to testify positively, but the newly discovered evidence was to the same point and positive, leaving no room for doubt, and so making it probable that a different verdict would result, should an opportunity be given to submit it to a jury. The court reversed its former decision reported in 67 Pac. 14, in which it had upheld the action of the lower court in overruling the motion for a new trial.

By the testimony of a number of witnesses, Mr. Smith is shown to be a credible man, whose general reputation is good for truth and veracity. Appellant testifies as to the diligence used to discover all persons who knew anything about the difficulty at the time and before the trial of his case, and we think it such that any ordinary person would use, and he cannot be held not to have used proper diligence in discovering sooner that Mr. Smith was a witness in his case. However, the state contends that, even if appellant is not lacking in diligence, the testimony is but cumulative of that of John Spencer, and for this reason the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial. This is the general rule of law, as has frequently been announced by covered evidence was to the same point and positive, leaving no room for doubt, and so making it probable that a different verdict would result, should an opportunity be given to submit it to a jury. The court reversed its former decision reported in 67 Pac. 14, in which it had upheld the action of the lower court in overruling the motion for a new trial.

In Cooper v. State, 91 Ga. 362, 18 S. E. 303, it was held that, while authorities to the contrary are numerous, newly discovered evidence relating to specific facts touching which there was no evidence at the trial, but which has no value except as tending to prove and establish the same identical defense which the accused set up at the trial, and touching which he not only adduced some evidence, but enough to clear him if the jury had given it credit, should not be treated as merely cumulative, within the meaning of the rule that a new trial will not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative.

It cannot be objected to granting a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, that such evidence is cumulative, if it is of a different kind or character from that adduced on the trial. Fletcher v. People, 117 Ill. 184, 7 N. E. 80.

Newly discovered cumulative evidence will not be a ground for new trial, where it is of such a nature that its truth may be conceded without justifying acquittal in the face of other evidence. People v. Maruyama, 10 Cal. App. 290, 125 Pac. 924; Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453; Dyer v. People, 84 Ill. 624; People v. White, 251 Ill. 67, 95 N. E. 1036; Reg. v. McIlroy, 15 U. C. C. P. 116.

In New York, Georgia, and doubtless in other states, the requirements which newly discovered evidence must meet in order to be ground for a new trial are prescribed by statute, the requirement that it be not cumulative being one of the number. Under such a statute, the courts have no power to grant new trials for cumulative evidence. People v. Shea, 16 Misc. Rep. 111, 38 N. Y. Supp. 821; People v. O'Connor, 37 Misc. 754, 16 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 445, 76 N. Y. Supp. 511, subsequent appeal in which the this court. The appellant contends that it is not "cumulative only," and enters into a lengthy discussion of what is "only cumulative testimony." The distinction he attempts, and the decisions he cites, we do not deem it necessary to notice under the disposition we make of this case.

There can be no question, under the evidence in this case, that, if John Spencer in fact fired the shot, appellant is not guilty of the homicide, either as a principal, accomplice, or accessory. In other words, if the shot was fired by John Spencer, an innocent man has been sentenced to the penitentiary. The evidence, without the testimony of Floyd P. Smith, renders it extremely doubtful as to which one, appellant or John Spencer did the shooting; and while the testimony would justify the jury in finding as they did on this contested issue, it would also have supported a finding that John Spencer did the shooting. The record being in this condition, can any man say what would have been their finding if Mr. Smith, a reputable citizen, had supported the testimony of John Spencer by testifying that he saw John Spencer fire the shot? We all know how prone human nature, men who compose the juries of the country, as well as the balance of mankind, is to fail to give to the evidence of a brother of one on trial charged with a penitentiary offense, that credence that would be given to his testimony under different circumstances. The testimony of a relative of one on trial is seldom given that weight that is given question here presented was not considered, 82 App. Div. 55, 81 N. Y. Supp. 555; People v. Bonifacio, 119 App. Div. 719, 104 N. Y. Supp. 181, affirmed, but without mention of the point under consideration; in 100 N. Y. 150, 32 N. E. 1098; People v. Way, 54 Misc. 488, 106 N. Y. Supp. 52; People v. Jones, 115 N. Y. Supp. 800; People v. Leighton, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 468.

In People v. O'Connor, 37 Misc. 754, 16 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 445, 76 N. Y. Supp. 511, it was held that, although in civil cases it is a settled rule that newly discovered evidence which is cumulative does not necessarily afford ground for denying the motion for a new trial, the existence of a statute stating the grounds upon which a new trial may be granted in criminal cases, which provides that a new trial may be granted where it is made to appear by affidavit that upon another trial the defendant can produce evidence such as, if before received, would probably have changed the verdict, if such evidence has been discovered since the trial, is not cumulative, and the failure to produce it on the trial was not owing to want of diligence,—precludes the court from granting a new trial for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative.

Where no statute authorizes the granting of new trials in criminal cases on account of newly discovered evidence, the rule against newly discovered cumulative evidence is unnecessary. State v. Bourman, 45 Iowa, 418; State v. Whitmer, 77 Iowa, 557, 42 N. W. 442; State v. Watson, 81 Iowa, 380, 46 N. W. 808. State v. Potts, 83 Iowa, 317, 49 N. W. 845.

Cumulative evidence defined.

For a complete collection of definitions of cumulative evidence, resort must be had to civil as well as to the criminal cases. Those which follow have been gleaned from the decisions falling within the scope of this note.

Cumulative evidence is additional evidence of the same kind to the same point. May v. State, 77 Vt. 330, 60 Atl. 1.

Cumulative evidence is of the same import, of the same kind, and to the same point, as that produced on the trial. State v. Ray, 53 Mo. 345.

Evidence is cumulative which only multiplies witnesses as to one or more facts already investigated, or only adds other circumstances of the same general character. Harrolson v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 452, 113 S. W. 544.

Cumulative evidence is additional evidence offered to establish a fact to which witnesses have already testified. It does not necessarily include all evidence which tends to establish the same ultimate or principally controverted fact. Dale v. State, 88 Ga. 552, 15 S. E. 287.

Evidence is cumulative when it is of the same nature as that previously produced to establish the same fact or facts. People v. Leighton, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 468.

Evidence of a different fact with the same logical bearing cannot be considered as cumulative. People v. Vanderpool, 1 Mich. N. P. 157.

Though newly discovered evidence may tend to establish the truth of a material contention in direct support of which testimony was introduced at the trial, such evidence is not merely cumulative when it relates to a particular fact concerning which no witness has already testified. Fellows v. State, 114 Ga. 233, 39 S. E. 885.

II. Circumstances under which cumulative evidence has or has not been held to render a different outcome probable.

In view of the qualification of the general rule above noted, the question under what circumstances cumulative evidence has been regarded as rendering a different result probable is one of considerable interest. The attempt has therefore been made, where the facts of the cases have been reported with sufficient fulness to enable this to be done, to group the decisions, both those denying and those granting new trials, under headings which will suggest the character of the evidence, or of the issue to which it relates. In many of the cases above cited, the nature of the cumulative evidence to one wholly disinterested, even though they may be men of equal standing and reputation in the community. We all feel and believe that the ties of blood, of brotherhood, will have its weight with a witness; and the law recognizes this by admitting evidence of that fact to show interest, bias, etc. As said in some of the opinions, the reason for the rule forbidding a new trial for the purpose of admitting cumulative testimony is that public policy, looking to the finality of trials, requires that a defendant be held to diligence in preparing their cases for trial; but this policy, which seeks to limit continued litigation, should never be applied where the newly discovered testimony may be of that cogency and force where it might probably show that an innocent man may probably be caused to suffer for a crime he did not commit. Courts are organized, and the object of the law is, that the true facts may be arrived at and justice administered; and where the evidence is about upon an equipoise as to whether a man committed an offense or not, if there is really newly discovered testimony coming from a credible source, this rule will be held in subordination to the great end to be obtained,—that is, meting out justice to each individual citizen. As illustrative of this rule, two men may be charged with crime, and, under such circumstances, neither can be a witness for the other; but if one is first tried and convicted, and then the other tried and acquitted, our courts have always held that a is either not stated at all, or is mentioned so briefly as to render the case of no particular interest save for its relation to the general rule.

Evidence contradicting or impeaching witness for prosecution.

In Fletcher v. People, 117 Ill. 184, 7 N. E. 80, the defendant testified to facts which tended to show that he shot in self-defense. This testimony was contradicted by the only eyewitness which the prosecution had; but after the trial the defense discovered his affidavit which he had made in expectation of death, in which his statements corroborated those of the defendant. While conceding this to be cumulative, the court was of the opinion that it was a proper case to make an exception and grant a new trial.

As the result of a conflict of the testimony of the prosecuting witness and the defendant, the issue arose as to the authority of the latter to sign the name of the former, in People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 Pac. 226, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 512. The only other witness for the defense testified to a prior inconsistent statement of the prosecuting witness on this point, but was not able to do so positively. The newly discovered evidence was positive as to such a statement, and for that reason a new trial was granted, although the evidence was conceded to be cumulative.

In Com. v. Yot Sing, 7 Kulp, 349, it was held that evidence of an admission by the prosecuting witness made since the trial, that the watch of which he claimed to have been robbed was in the possession of his brother, was not merely cumulative, since, in view of the strong evidence of an alibi produced by the defendant, it would probably produce a different result on a new trial.

Newly discovered evidence has been held merely cumulative and insufficient ground for new trial, —where the reputation of a witness for the prosecution has been attacked on trial, and the newly discovered evidence is introduced for the same purpose. May v. Com. 153 Ky. 141, 154 S. W. 1074; State v. Fahey, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

State*, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 20 S. W. 709; Granger v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 31 S. W. 671; Daniels v. United States, 116 C. C. A. 233, 196 Fed. 459;

Hong Quin Moon*, 92 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 1096; State v. Potter, 108 Mo. 424, 22 S. W. 89;

—where it consisted of the affidavit of a witness for the prosecution that his testimony was incorrect, and his corrected statement was similar to testimony offered by the defense at the trial. Osborne v. State, 96 Ark. 400, 132 S. W. 210; State v. Wilson, 114 La. 398, 38 So. 397; Harter v. People, 204 Ill. 158, 68 N. E. 447;

—where it consisted of the affidavit of a witness for the defense, that he became confused and gave incorrect testimony which was damaging to the defendant, if his corrected statement was similar to testimony offered by the defense at the trial. People v. Von Perhacs, — Cal. App. —, 127 Pac. 1048;

—where it was offered for the purpose of contradicting the testimony of certain witnesses for the prosecution on a point on which evidence of the same nature was introduced at the trial. Adams v. State, 100 Ark. 203, 139 S. W. 1116; People v. Louis Tung, 90 Cal. 377, 27 Pac. 295; Porter v. State, 2 Ind. 435; Sutherland v. State, 108 Ind. 389, 9 N. E. 298; Meurer v. State, 129

new trial will be granted if, in a motion for new trial, he swears that the testimony of this witness is material to his defense, and the witness attaches his affidavit, swearing to facts that are material to the defense, even though it should be held to be in some sense cumulative; the reason being that no amount of diligence could sooner have obtained this testimony.

And in this case it is disclosed that the witness wilfully withheld from the knowledge of this defendant the facts he would testify to, until discovered by accident by the foreman of the jury who had convicted him. While the testimony of Mr. Smith, as shown by the affidavit, may be said to be cumulative of the testimony of John Spencer, yet in it are stated some other facts and circumstances not testified to by John Spencer, but corroborative of the theory of the appellant in this case that he was attacked by deceased and retreated. Looking at the relative size and strength of the parties, as shown by the record, Thomas, deceased, being a powerful man, weighing from 190 to 200 pounds, much heavier and stronger than appellant, as the court submitted the issue of self-defense as to appellant, this testimony might have great weight. Viewing the record as a whole, we do not think this alleged newly discovered testimony can be said to be only cumulative in the legal sense of those words; but, if it should be so held, then this case presents one of those rare instances where the evidence adduced on the

Where a witness for the state, upon the trial of one accused of having poisoned his wife, testified that on the afternoon of the day preceding her death the wife requested the accused to give her some medicine, whereupon he stepped to a sewing machine standing in an adjoining room, picked up a glass of water and a spoon, and gave his wife a powder, at the same time giving witness to understand that it was magnesia, and in his testimony the accused, while admitting the giving of the powder, declared that he did not get it from the sewing machine, but from a paper of magnesia standing on the shelf in the kitchen, it was held that the evidence of a witness that, at the time in question, she was at work in the kitchen and that the accused went to the kitchen cupboard and filled a spoon from a paper of magnesia which she had noticed standing on the shelf for several days, was cumulative only, and that its production could not possibly change the result. St. Louis v. State, 8 Neb. 405, 1 N. W. 371.

Eyewitness.

In Adams v. State, 55 Fla. 1, 46 So. 152, the defendant was indicted for murder. He was the only eyewitness to the transaction who testified at the trial, his testimony being to the effect that upon stepping out of a house he found the deceased pointing a gun at him, that he called to him, and then shot. The newly discovered evidence was the testimony of another eyewitness, and, although it merely set out the same facts testified to by the defendant, and was therefore cumulative, a new trial was granted.

In Holton v. State, 9 Ga. App. 414, 71 S. E. 599, the homicide in question took place under the following circumstances: Deceased and the accused had had a dispute over a game, which proceeded to a point where weapons were produced, after which the accused withdrew, and was absent about thirty-five or forty minutes. On returning, he immediately referred to the quarrel and intimated to the deceased that he would not repeat outside of the shop what he had said, and invited him to go outside in the rear of the shop. The deceased accepted the invitation. The accused held the back door open for him to pass out, and they both went outside, where their voices were again heard in dispute, followed by shots. The deceased, upon being shot, turned and endeavored to retrace his steps, and fell dead; and the accused ran away. Upon the trial the theory accepted by the jury was that the parties had engaged in mutual combat; but, according to the statement of the accused, corroborated by two negro witnesses, one of whom was his servant, deceased was advancing on him with a knife, when he shot trial renders it questionable as to whether appellant is guilty of any wrongdoing; and, while we would not feel authorized to disturb the verdict on account of this conflict in the testimony, yet a new trial should be granted to enable appellant to place before a jury of his countrymen this additional testimony, coming, as it does, from a credible source, before being branded as a felon. While the interests of society require that those who violate the law shall be punished and restrained, yet the state desires no innocent man to suffer, and a greater crime is committed against society when a person guilty of no offense is wrongfully made to wear prison stripes than when one guilty is permitted to escape. Our law is that, so long as there is a reasonable doubt of one's guilt, he is entitled to that doubt; and this evidence of Mr. Smith can but create a doubt in the mind of one that, in self-defense. It was held that newly discovered testimony of two credible white witnesses that, shortly before the homicide, they went to deceased's shop, where they found him standing in the door with a pistol in his hand; that they asked him what he was doing with the pistol, and he replied that he was near killing defendant, and was sorry that he had not done it, and that if defendant ever said anything else to him about it, he would cut his throat; and testimony of one who witnessed the affray from a store near by, his account corresponding with that of the defendant, although in a sense cumulative, would under the circumstances require the granting of a new trial.

In Green v. State, 6 Ga. App. 784, 65 S. E. 802, where the fact testified to by the newly discovered witness had been insisted upon at the trial by the defendant in his statement, but he had had no witness to the fact, it was held that the character of the new witness having been duly substantiated, and there being no contrary showing, a new trial should be granted.

And see also State v. Townsend, 7 Wash. 463, 35 Pac. 367, where a new trial was granted for newly discovered testimony of a white eyewitness of an affray, the witnesses testifying at the trial all being Indians.

But in other cases, where the new evidence consisted of the testimony of eyewitnesses, merely cumulative to the testimony of other eyewitnesses at the trial, it has been held not sufficient ground for a new trial. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 70 Cal. 8, 11 Pac. 323; State v. Buchanan, 32 R. I. 490, 79 Atl. 1114; State v. Jones, 49 S. C. 330, 26 S. E. 652; Hogan v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 147 S. W. 871; State v. Molitz, — Utah, —, 122 Pac. 86.

Alibi.

Even the courts which have enunciated the modified rule have hesitated to grant 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if it had been before the jury in this case, a different result might have been obtained.

There are other questions presented in the record, but we deem it unnecessary to discuss them, except to add that, as there was no evidence that appellant and John Spencer were acting together, carrying out a common purpose in accordance with a previous understanding, the court should not have burdened that part of his charge presenting the theory as to whether or not John Spencer killed deceased, with the requirement that the jury must find that "he acted upon an independent impulse of his own." On another trial, if the evidence is the same, those words should be omitted from that paragraph of the charge.

While, under the evidence, this perhaps would not present reversible error, but, on account of the matters above pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

new trials under it except in very forceful cases. Consequently the number of cases in that class is limited. One court, at least, has established a rule requiring the granting of new trials for the admission of cumulative evidence in all cases of a certain class. In this instance the court seems to base its rule on the ground that newly discovered evidence, although cumulative, will probably affect the verdict in cases of that kind.

Such instance is where the newly discovered evidence would tend to establish an alibi, which has been relied upon at the trial. In State v. Stowe, 3 Wash. 206, 14 L.R.A. 609, 28 Pac. 337, a new trial was granted to permit the introduction of testimony tending to prove an alibi. The decision was not placed on the particular facts of the case, but on the general ground that the newly discovered evidence tended to establish the alibi which the defendant had attempted to prove on trial. The court said: "But this rule governing cumulative evidence must be received with some modification, and given a common-sense construction, and, whatever may be its application to other character of testimony, we do not think it applies where the object of the evidence is to prove an alibi."

On the other hand, Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129, 9 S. E. 542, has made alibi the object of more rigid application of the rule against new trials for cumulative evidence. The court says: "The policy of the law is adverse to granting new trials on account of merely cumulative evidence, more especially where the point to which the evidence relates is the defense of alibi."

In Fellows v. State, 114 Ga. 233, 39 S. E. 885, where the defense was an alibi, and the accused introduced witnesses who testified that on the day of the commission of the crime they saw the accused in a county other than that in which it was perpetrated, he being on that day, according to the testimony of some of them, at one place in the county to which their testimony related, and, according to the testimony of others of them, in other places therein, and, according to the testimony of all, too far from the scene of the offense to have been present at the time of its perpetration, newly discovered testimony of still another witness which placed the accused in the county where the other witnesses located him on the day in question, at a different hour and place from any testified to by them, to that extent was a separate and distinct alibi, though harmonizing entirely with all the evidence produced in behalf of the accused, and is not merely cumulative, though it, of course, tends, like the other testimony, to establish the alibi.

Tyler v. State, 13 Tex. App. 205, turns on the peculiar circumstances therein presented. There an application for a continuance was made to permit the introduction of further evidence to establish an alibi. This application was held properly to have been overruled because of a failure to show proper diligence; but it was further held that it was proper to take the matters therein stated into consideration in determining the motion for a new trial based upon the ground of newly discovered evidence tending to establish the alibi. The court accordingly held that although it would not say that on the ground of the newly discovered evidence only the new trial should be granted, yet taking into consideration the meagerness of the evidence upon which the conviction rested, and the absent testimony set out in defendant's application for a continuance, and the additional testimony disclosed by his application for a new trial, a new trial should have been granted.

But where the identity of the accused as the guilty party is clearly and strongly shown by both positive and circumstantial evidence of the most credible and convincing character, a new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly discovered testimony tending to establish an alibi, contained in the affidavit of a witness of doubtful character, whose statement does not exclude the possibility of the presence of the defendant at the time when and place where the crime was committed. Mitchell v. State, 6 Ga. App. 564, 65 S. E. 326.

In Teal v. State, 119 Ga. 102, 45 S. E. 964, it was held that a new trial would not be granted for newly discovered evidence of a witness that he had met accused and another on the road at a certain time and place, where such evidence was merely cumulative to the testimony of such other and the statement of the accused, and the time and place were about the same as the time when and place where the state contended the theft was committed.

Where, on the trial for an assault with intent to murder, the prosecution showed that the defendant was riding a gray horse, while the defense testified that he was riding a dark colored or dark bay horse, there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial because of newly discovered evidence that a person saw defendant riding a dark 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

colored horse at a point 8 or 10 miles from where the shooting occurred, as such testimony was only cumulative, and not likely to produce a different result on another trial, in view of the fact that the defendant was positively identified as the man who did the shooting. Austin v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 47 S. W. 371.

In Johnson v. State, 128 Ga. 102, 57 S. E. 353, where the newly discovered evidence tended to establish a wholly different alibi from that relied on in the trial, and was not such as to exclude the possibility of the defendant's presence at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission, it was held that the newly discovered evidence was not ground for a new trial.

Where the newly discovered witnesses in support of the defense of alibi were unable to say that they recognized the defendant as one of the occupants of a buggy met by them, although they thought that he was, but it appeared that their only reason was the fact that they thought they recognized the rig as defendant's, their evidence is not ground for a new trial. Clements v. State, 80 Neb. 313, 114 N. W. 271.

Where several witnesses had testified in support of defendant's alibi, newly discovered evidence that defendant was seen at the place where they testified having seen him, talking to a witness who had denied seeing him there, is not ground for a new trial. Whitfield v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 14, 48 S. W. 173.

In several other cases new trials have been refused in accordance with the rule against cumulative evidence, without any distinction being made on account of the tendency of the evidence to prove an alibi. Artemus v. State, 79 Ga. 512, 4 S. E. 385; Tipton v. State, 119 Ga. 304, 46 S. E. 436, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 209; State v. Davis, 6 Idaho, 159, 53 Pac. 678; Burns v. People, 126 Ill. 282, 18 N. E. 550; Spahn v. People, 137 Ill. 538, 27 N. E. 688; People v. Probst, 237 Ill. 390, 86 N. E. 588; State v. Nelson, 59 Kan. 776, 52 Pac. 868; State v. Travis, 39 La. Ann. 356, 1 So. 817; State v. Turner, 122 La. 371, 47 So. 685; Bean v. People, 124 Ill. 576, 16 N. E. 656; State v. Cushenberry, 157 Mo. 168, 56 S. W. 737; State v. Bates, 182 Mo. 70, 81 S. W. 408; State v. Moore, — Utah, —, 126 Pac. 322; Reg. v. McIlroy, 15 U. C. C. P. 116.

A statute prohibiting the granting of new trials in criminal cases for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative is applicable where the purpose of such evidence is to prove an alibi. People v. Way, 54 Misc. 488, 106 N. Y. Supp. 52.

Evidence that accused is not the guilty party.

In Sebastian v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 680, it was held that a defendant convicted of murder on conflicting evidence was entitled to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence that witness saw the shooting, which occurred in the evening, and that it was done by another than defendant, although evidence to that effect had been given at the trial.

In Castillo v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 69 S. W. 517, where testimony had been given on a murder trial that a certain person was at the dance where the murder was committed, and disappeared that night, newly discovered evidence of one who stated that he was at the dance and near where the shooting occurred, that he saw such person shoot deceased and run off, and that he had never seen him since, was held to require the granting of a new trial, where of all the attendants at the dance only one witness for the state had given testimony to connect accused with the crime, and he admitted his enmity to accused, and other witnesses had testified that when the shooting occurred accused was in a drunken sleep some distance from the shooting, and was carried home that night in a drunken stupor.

In Casey v. State, 20 Neb. 138, 29 N. W. 264, newly discovered evidence that the killing was done by a third person was held sufficient to require the granting of a new trial, although testimony to that effect had been given at the trial.

Where, upon the trial of a bastardy proceeding, the state's witnesses testified that prosecutrix went to the defendant's house to work at a certain date, and defendant's testimony tended to show that the girl came to his place and left it at an earlier date, his purpose being to show that, according to the ordinary period of gestation, he could not have been the father of the child, and the newly discovered evidence clearly showed that the prosecutrix went to the defendant's house on the earlier date, which was finally admitted by her after hearing the testimony of the witness whose evidence was newly discovered, it was held that, though the effect of the new testimony was to fix the time when the alleged intercourse occurred, it was not of the same kind as that introduced on the original trial, and so not cumulative in character. State v. Lowell, 123 Iowa, 427, 99 N. W. 125.

But in State v. Montgomery, 37 Utah, 515, 109 Pac. 815, the court held that newly discovered evidence of a physician that a child was an eight-months child was nearly enough in accord with the testimony of the prosecutrix to the effect that conception had taken place on a date seven and one-half months prior to the birth, to make the new evidence cumulative, and to destroy its efficacy as ground for a new trial.

In State v. Reilly, — N. D. —, 141 N. W. 720, where, on the trial of a physician for causing the death of a woman by a criminal operation, there was evidence of declarations by the woman that she had performed the operation on herself, it was held that newly discovered evidence of another witness that the woman had made similar declarations to her, and that she had said that she had not told defendant what she had done, would not in any way have influenced the conclusion of the jury, and so was not ground for a new trial.

In Lawson v. Com. 152 Ky. 113, 153 S. W. 56, two witnesses testified that the deceased had made a written statement that a certain person, not the accused, had stabbed him. The new evidence consisted of this written statement itself. It was held merely cumulative, and not sufficient ground for new trial.

In Rawlins v. State, 126 Ga. 96, 54 S. E. 924, it was held that where a father, his three sons, and another were indicted for murder and convicted, though all claimed to be innocent, and the judgments were affirmed on appeal, the fact that the father afterward confessed that he was guilty of sending another to murder the father of the children who were killed, but claimed that he did not authorize the killing of the children, and that his sons were not connected with the crime, but were innocent, would not require the granting of a new trial.

Where, on the trial, a witness for the defendant testified that deceased was killed by a third person, and his testimony was corroborated by others, his subsequent confession that he himself was the guilty party is cumulative, and, in view of the fact that the jury did not believe his corroborated statement on the trial, it is not probable that his uncorroborated confession would produce a different result. People v. Shea, 16 Misc. 111, 38 N. Y. Supp. 821.

In State v. Thurman, 121 Mo. App. 374, 98 S. W. 819, the new evidence was similar to testimony at the trial to the effect that the defendant did not occupy the premises where he was alleged to have sold liquor illegally. The new trial was refused, because the newly discovered evidence was cumulative only.

And in the following cases where new evidence was directed toward the defense that another than the accused committed the alleged crime, it was held to add nothing to the evidence given at the trial: People v. Fong Ah Sing, 70 Cal. 8, 11 Pac. 323; Giles v. State, 6 Ga. 276; John v. State, 33 Ga. 257; O'Shields v. State, 55 Ga. 696; Sahlinger v. People, 102 Ill. 241; State v. Nimerick, 74 Kan. 658, 87 Pac. 722; Williams v. People, 45 Barb. 201; State v. Lilliston, 141 N. C. 857, 115 Am. St. Rep. 705, 54 S. E. 427; Hurst v. Territory, 16 Okla. 600, 86 Pac. 280; Hanna v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 269, 87 S. W. 702.

Time of commission of crime.

Where it is conceded that the crime, if committed by the defendant, occurred before a certain definite time, new evidence tending to prove that the crime had not been committed at that time, although cumulative of evidence at the trial, will be ground for a new trial.

In Young v. State, 30 Tex. App. 308, 17 S. W. 413, it was conceded that the defendant, if guilty of stealing a horse as charged, must have done so before Monday. The owner testified that he had fed the horse on Monday, and the new evidence was the testimony of two others who were present at the time of the feeding. The court, in reversing the trial court's action in overruling the motion, made no mention of the rule against granting new trials for cumulative evidence.

In People v. Vanderpool, 1 Mich. N. P. 157, a new trial was granted on account of newly discovered evidence of a similar nature. The defendant was charged with committing murder between 11 and 12 o'clock in the morning. At the trial, witnesses testified to having seen the deceased about town in the afternoon of the same day. The new evidence was the testimony of others who had also seen him about town on the same afternoon, but in different places from those testified to at the trial. The court, after conceding the new evidence to be cumulative, continues: "But under this definition the rule that a new trial will not be granted on merely cumulative evidence is not of universal application. Such evidence will not be refused if it will make a doubtful case clear."

Self-defense.

In Thompson v. State, 60 Ga. 619, it was held that a new trial would be granted to one who had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter, where newly discovered evidence of a witness to the difficulty between accused and the deceased was to the effect that the deceased was the aggressor, and such evidence, in view of the evidence had on the former trial, might produce a different result.

See also Holton v. State, 9 Ga. App. 414, 71 S. E. 599, under heading "Eyewitness," supra.

In the following cases, the new evidence was held insufficient to warrant a new trial, being cumulative of evidence introduced at the trial to establish the defense of self-defense:

People v. O'Brien, 78 Cal. 41, 20 Pac. 359 (deceased attacked defendant with knife); Howard v. State, 36 Fla. 21, 17 S. E. 84 (assaulted party fired first); McAfee v. State, 31 Ga. 411 (conspiracy against defendant); Smith v. State, 81 Ga. 479, 8 S. E. 187 (opponent struck first); Jefferson v. State, 137 Ga. 382, 73 S. E. 499; Prator v. State, 8 Ga. App. 436, 89 S. E. 496 (assaulted party was advancing on defendant with ax); Harp v. Com. — Ky. —, 119 S. W. 1191 (deceased was about to strike defendant with rock, defendant having testified to that effect); Parks v. Com. 145 Ky. 364, 140 S. W. 544 (the newly discovered evidence that defendant did not cut when deceased made the first assault was cumulative of evidence that defendant did not cut until the second assault); Traynor v. Com. 149 Ky. 462, 149 S. W. 904 (evidence supporting defendant's statement that deceased knocked defendant to his knees before he shot, contradicted by witnesses for state); Cousins v. State, — Miss. —, 34 So. 323 (deceased was advancing with fence rail); State v. Bybee, 149 Mo. 632, 51 S. W. 470 (assaulted party had rock in hand); People v. Leighton, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 468 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the above cases the cumulative evidence corresponded almost exactly to the evidence on the trial. In the following cases, the newly discovered evidence is cumulative, not because the factum probans of the evidence on the trial and that of the affidavits are the same, but because the purpose of each is to prove the same factum probandum:

Evidence tending to show the animus of the deceased toward the defendant was introduced on the trial in Park v. State, 126 Ga. 575, 55 S. E. 489, and People v. Demasters, 109 Cal. 607, 42 Pac. 236. A new trial was refused for newly discovered evidence of another statement of the same nature by the deceased.

In Leigh v. People, 113 Ill. 372, the new evidence was a statement of the deceased that he wanted to borrow a pistol to use in coming trouble with the defendant's family. This was held to be cumulative of other talk and threats on the part of the deceased, evidence of which was before the jury.

In order to prove that he shot in self-defense, the defendant asked for a new trial that he might adduce evidence that he was standing in the open road when the shot was fired, and was not concealed from the deceased. The court overruled his motion on the ground that it was merely cumulative of his own testimony at the trial that he shot in self-defense, and, in view of the fact that he was convicted of manslaughter only, would not be likely to change the result. Reagan v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 642, 124 S. W. 685.

Where, upon the trial, there was testimony that the deceased advanced upon the defendant with a knife, which was sufficiently described for all the purposes of the defense, the finding of the knife under the house of the deceased, where it had apparently been concealed, is no cause for a new trial. People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 Pac. 1100.

Where the newly discovered evidence was that the morning after a fight between defendant and prosecuting witness, affiant visited the scene and found and picked up two pocket knives there, one of which he believed belonged to the prosecuting witness, and upon the trial five persons testified for defendant, none of whom stated that the prosecuting witness had a knife in his hand at the time of the difficulty, though they were all close by the combatants during the fight and there was nothing to prevent them seeing all that occurred, there is no possibility that the newly discovered evidence, if introduced at the trial, could produce a different result. State v. Keener, 225 Mo. 488, 125 S. W. 747.

And in the following cases, a new trial was refused for newly discovered evidence.

—as to whether deceased had a knife on the day of the affray. Garner v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 356, 30 S. W. 782;

—where the new evidence was that a wound upon defendant's hand, which defendant claimed was inflicted by deceased in jerking from him the stick with which it was alleged he tried to strike him, was seen by witness immediately after the homicide was committed, or on the same day, and the existence of the wound had been established upon the trial by the testimony of defendant and perhaps that of another. Wilson v. Com. 141 Ky. 341, 132 S. W. 557;

—where the new evidence was that a razor found upon the premises where the killing occurred belonged to the deceased, and there was testimony on the trial that deceased had a weapon when he was killed. Lewis v. Com. 93 Ky. 238, 19 S. W. 664;

—where there was evidence that the other party had a weapon, and the new evidence consisted of the finding of such weapon on the scene of the crime (Edwards v. State, 90 Ga. 143, 15 S. E. 744; Henry v. People, 198 Ill. 162, 65 N. E. 120; State v. Griffin, 87 Mo. 608, or on the person of the other party (Carter v. State, 2 Ga. App. 254, 58 S. E. 532);

—on an indictment for murder, where there was testimony on trial that deceased was armed, and the new evidence set out the finding of cartridges upon his person after his death. Territory v. Yarberry, 2 N. M. 391.

Threats.

Newly discovered evidence has been held cumulative, and not sufficient ground for a new trial, where it consisted of threats which were in evidence, or which were similar to those in evidence. Williams v. Territory, 13 Ariz. 306, 114 Pac. 556; Milam v. State, 108 Ga. 29, 33 S. E. 818; Adams v. People, 47 Ill. 376; Williams v. State, 170 Ind. 630, 85 N. E. 113; Malone v. State, — Ind. —, 96 N. E. 1; State v. Kearley, 26 Kan. 77; Williams v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 753, 18 S. W. 364; Wilson v. Com. 141 Ky. 341, 132 S. W. 557; State v. Carpenter, 182 Mo. 53, 81 S. W. 410; Territory v. Clayton, 8 Mont. 1, 19 Pac. 293.

Intoxication.

Newly discovered evidence has been held cumulative, and not sufficient ground for a new trial, where it consisted of evidence of intoxication, and evidence of the same was before the jury. Williams v. State, 170 Ind. 630, 85 N. E. 113 (intoxication of deceased in murder case); Straub v. State, — Ind. —, 100 N. E. 754 (intoxication of prosecuting witness at time of crime); Futrell v. Com. 141 Ky. 310, 132 S. W. 555 (intoxication of deceased in murder case); People v. Hovey, 30 Hun, 354 (intoxication of defendant); Anderson v. State, — Tex. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Crim. Rep. —, 100 S. W. 153 (intoxication of prosecuting witness at commission of crime).

Insanity.

According to the theory of Anderson v. State, 43 Conn. 514, 21 Am. Rep. 669, "a large number of acts indicating insanity will generally produce a greater effect upon the mind of the trier than a smaller number." For that reason a new trial was granted in order that the accused might have the opportunity of putting before the jury the evidence of additional acts which would tend to show his insanity. The decision in this case, however, seems to be limited to capital offenses.

In all other cases where a new trial has been requested on the same ground, it has been refused. People v. McDonell, 47 Cal. 134 (evidence as to delusions to which accused was subject); People v. Kloss, 115 Cal. 567, 47 Pac. 459 (evidence was as to the pathological effect of a blow received by accused, cumulative of evidence of the same fact on trial); Roberts v. State, 3 Ga. 310 (evidence of irrational conduct); Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450, 5 S. E. 782 (evidence cumulative as to accused having epilepsy, a disease resulting in insanity); Lilly v. People, 148 Ill. 467, 36 N. E. 95 (evidence that defendant was eccentric, excitable and nervous); People v. Quimby, 134 Mich. 625, 96 N. W. 1061 (evidence at trial of insanity of father and brother of accused; after the trial a sister had been adjudged insane); Newcomb v. State, 37 Miss. 383; State v. Church, 199 Mo. 605, 98 S. W. 16 (newly discovered evidence of accused's early history, and past and present condition of his mother and her other children. Evidence at trial did not extend to these); State v. Redemeier, 8 Mo. App. 1; State v. Brooks, 23 Mont. 146, 57 Pac. 1038; State v. Hardee, 28 Mont. 18, 72 Pac. 39; Hamblin v. State, 81 Neb. 148, 115 N. W. 850, 16 Ann. Cas. 569 (evidence consisted of incidents in earlier life of accused); People v. Gambacorta, 197 N. Y. 181, 90 N. E. 809, 18 Ann. Cas. 425 (where evidence tending to establish defendant's insanity was given at the trial, and the newly discovered evidence was of insanity in the family, and of his being an epileptic); People v. Jones, 131 App. Div. 921, 115 N. Y. Supp. 800; Com. v. Hine, 213 Pa. 97, 62 Atl. 369; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617, 20 S. W. 169; Mathews v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 77 S. W. 218; Baccigalupo v. Com. 33 Gratt. 807, 36 Am. Rep. 795; State v. Bridgham, 51 Wash. 18, 97 Pac. 1096.

And in State v. Schreiber, 111 Minn. 138, 126 N. W. 536, a prosecution for murder, newly discovered evidence of the appearance and conduct of the deceased, to support the theory that he had committed suicide, was held cumulative, and insufficient to warrant a new trial.

Marks.

Where the evidence raises an issue as to the existence of certain marks at a definite time, new evidence to support the defendant's contention is merely cumulative, and not ground for a new trial. People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 Pac. 404; Martin v. Territory, 18 Okla. 370, 90 Pac. 13.

And where the prosecution attempted to establish the identity of the defendant by a bite on his finger alleged to have been received while perpetrating the crime, and the defendant testified that a horse had bitten him, newly discovered evidence of one who saw the horse bite him was merely cumulative. State v. Bradford, 97 S. C. 546, 70 S. E. 308.

Measurements.

Cumulative evidence has been held not to require a new trial where it consisted of measurements which were in evidence at the trial. Russell v. State, 97 Ark. 92, 133 S. W. 188; Coffman v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 478, 103 S. W. 1128.

Speed.

In State v. Buchanan, 32 R. I. 490, 79 Atl. 1114, it was held that where, upon a trial for operating an automobile at an unlawful speed, evidence had been given as to the speed indicated by the speedometer, newly discovered evidence consisting of the opinion of a civil engineer who was in a trolley car at the time, and who noticed the automobile, as to the rate at which it was going, would not be likely to change the result.

Mode of death.

Where, upon a trial for the murder of a child found dead on a tide flat, inside a sack weighted with a stone, the witnesses for the prosecution testified that the child had been drowned, while the defendant claimed that the child had died from an overdose of chloroform inadvertently given, and was afterward concealed by him, and it was one of the main contentions of the defendant that closed eyes and open hands were symptoms of death by chloroform, and opposed to death by drowning, and much of the evidence in the trial was devoted to this question, newly discovered evidence consisting of a photograph of the dead child, taken before the post mortem examination, which showed the open hands and closed eyes, and of the testimony of the undertaker to the fact that when he took the child out of the sack the eyes were closed and its hands were open, does not require the granting of a new trial. State v. Underwood, 35 Wash. 558, 77 Pac. 863.

Identity of person or thing.

In Dale v. State, 88 Ga. 552, 15 S. E. 287, where the identity of the accused in a prosecution for bigamy with one who had theretofore been married to another woman was in issue, it was held that newly discovered testimony bearing upon the question of identity, but relating to special marks and peculiarities of person which were present in the other person, but not 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

present in the defendant, such as a broken tooth, a scar, etc., as to which no testimony had been introduced upon the trial, was not merely cumulative, and that, the case as presented to the jury being a very close one, and it being probable that if this testimony had been before them the verdict would have been different, a new trial should be granted.

In State v. Tyson, 56 Kan. 686, 44 Pac. 609, where the identity of a man and woman seen together in a spring wagon by two occupants of a buggy and a man driving a carriage was in question, and both the occupants of the buggy testified that the persons were defendant and his daughter, but the daughter testified to the contrary, it was held that newly discovered testimony of the occupant of the carriage that the persons in the wagon were not the defendant and his daughter is not merely cumulative, as it would probably have produced a different result at the trial.

But in Oliver v. State, 7 Ga. App. 695, 67 S. E. 886; and May v. State, 77 Vt. 330, 60 Atl. 1, where the issue of the identity of the defendant was raised on the trial, and the new evidence went to the same point and tended to support the defendant's contention, a new trial was refused.

In State v. Hunter, 18 Wash. 670, 52 Pac. 247, where, at the trial, the state introduced in evidence a shirt which it claimed was worn by the defendant at the time of his arrest, and the defendant produced three witnesses who testified that the shirt was not the property of the defendant, but belonged to a fellow prisoner, newly discovered evidence of the mother and sister of the fellow prisoner, that the garment in question was made by the mother, was held to be insufficient ground for awarding a new trial.

Chastity.

Although it set forth facts material to the defense, newly discovered evidence has been held cumulative, and not sufficient ground for a new trial, —where it consisted of evidence of the lack of chastity of the prosecuting witness, and evidence had been introduced at the trial to establish the same fact. Hunt v. State, 8 Ga. App. 374, 69 S. E. 42; Potter v. State, 12 Ga. App. 315, 77 S. E. 186; State v. Hollier, 49 La. Ann. 371, 21 So. 633;

—where, on the issue whether the defendant was the only one who had had sexual intercourse with a certain female, evidence that a second had had such intercourse with her was offered on the trial, and the new evidence consisted of testimony of a third who had had intercourse with her. Eddingfield v. State, 12 Ind. App. 312, 39 N. E. 1057; Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okla. 156, 65 Pac. 837.

But in Dougherty v. State, 7 Ga. App. 91, 66 S. E. 276, a prosecution for seduction, where, on the trial, evidence was introduced wholly of a circumstantial nature, against the character of the female, but this evidence, when most strongly considered against her, was entirely consistent with her innocence of any immoral act, and there was newly discovered evidence of a credible witness that, previously to the time of the alleged seduction by the defendant, he had had intercourse with the girl, and the guilt of the defendant rested solely on the uncorroborated testimony of the girl, it was held that a new trial should be granted.

Age of prosecutrix.

In Walters v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 79 S. W. 539, it was held that where, upon the trial, evidence was conflicting as to whether prosecuting witness was over the age of consent and her reputation for chastity, truth, and veracity was shown to be bad, newly discovered evidence tending to prove that she was over the age to which she had testified warranted a new trial.

Lawful acquisition of personal property.

Where the issue was the lawful acquisition of personal property by the defendant, who claims to have received it in a lawful transaction with its owner, newly discovered evidence of the owner or his agent to establish such transaction has been held cumulative, and not ground for a new trial. State v. Hill, 39 Or. 90, 65 Pac. 518; State v. Beeman, 51 Wash. 557, 99 Pac. 756.

So, also, where the new evidence is that of one who has knowledge of the transaction by which the defendant got possession, although not a party to it. Gass v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 56 S. W. 73; Bales v. State, 3 W. Va. 685; Thompson v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 244, 76 S. W. 561.

And where the new evidence merely states circumstances making such a transaction possible, there is still more reason to refuse a new trial. Even in jurisdictions where it is freely conceded that cumulative evidence will be ground for a new trial if it makes a different verdict possible, it could scarcely be claimed that such evidence would have that effect. Cravens v. State, 95 Ark. 321, 128 S. W. 1037; People v. Chrisman, 135 Cal. 282, 67 Pac. 136; Douthitt v. Territory, 7 Okla. 55, 54 Pac. 312.

In Dansby v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 53 S. W. 105, where the new evidence was as to statements made by a codefendant in a prosecution for stealing certain hogs, on the morning of the day of the alleged theft, that he was going after two hogs that he had bought, and a subsequent declaration that he had brought home the hogs, a new trial was denied.

But in Langham v. State, 26 Tex. App. 533, 10 S. W. 113, where, upon the trial of a defendant for the theft of a colt, the ownership of which was laid in the indictment as unknown, evidence was given by one who testified that he owned the colt, that it got away, and that he told a certain person to hunt and get it up for him, and the third person testified that he told defendant to take the colt and keep it until witness could come and get it to carry it home, it was held that newly discovered evidence of other witnesses that they heard the owner tell the third person about losing the colt, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and ask him to look out for it, and of another person to prove the ownership of the colt, warranted the granting of a new trial, defendant having proved a good character for honesty.

Title to personal property.

On an issue of title to personalty, newly discovered evidence of witnesses who have knowledge of defendant's ownership is cumulative of his testimony of title, and is not sufficient ground for a new trial. State v. Matkins, 45 Mont. 58, 121 Pac. 881; Shaw v. State, 27 Tex. 750; Harrolson v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 452, 113 S. W. 544; State v. McCool, 34 Kan. 613, 9 Pac. 618, 745.

In Simmacher v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 512, the issue was the ownership of cotton. Pecan leaves were discovered in it, and evidence of this, together with the fact that pecan trees grew in defendant's field, and not in that of the prosecuting witness, was the ground for the motion for a new trial. It was, however, overruled, because such evidence was cumulative of defendant's testimony of title.

And where a defendant charged with larceny of a steer branded "Bar P Bar" claimed the steer she was driving was her own, and branded "I Bar X," newly discovered evidence to the effect that the brand was "I Bar X" was merely cumulative, and a new trial was refused. Mitchell v. People, 53 Colo. 479, 128 Pac. 61.

In Jones v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 105 S. W. 349, where the prosecution averred that the pistol with which the shooting was done belonged to the person shot at, and the defendant testified that he was the owner of the pistol, it was held that evidence of the man from whom it was purchased would be simply cumulative.

But where, on a trial for receiving stolen property, defendant sought to establish that he had been the owner of the mare in question since it was foaled, newly discovered evidence of different witnesses that they had seen the identical mare alleged to have been received as stolen property by the defendant, in the possession of and used by the defendant prior to the time it was alleged to have been stolen, and other witnesses had testified to the same fact at the trial, the new evidence relating to different times and places than those testified to by any of the witnesses on the trial, is not cumulative, though directed to the establishment of the same ultimate fact. State v. Laper, 26 S. D. 151, 128 N. W. 476.

Value in larceny cases.

In State v. Blain, 118 Iowa, 466, 92 N. W. 650, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 535, the defendant had been found guilty of larceny of a saddle the value of which was assessed at $25 by the jury. A new trial was asked to admit new testimony estimating the value at below $20. This was considered merely cumulative of testimony offered by the defense estimating the value at from $10 to $18, and new trial was denied.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

TOWN OF NEW HAVEN

v.

E. S. WESTON et al., Appts.

Estoppel — town orders — assignment to bank — right to collect.

1. A bank which by arrangement with the town treasurer cashes his check given in payment of town orders, and receives from him as collateral the assigned orders so paid, may enforce them against the town, although the treasurer had no authority to make the agreement; since, having received the benefit of the agreement, the town will not be permitted to repudiate it so far as its obligations have been liquidated by money furnished by the bank.

Note. — Liability of municipality or other public corporation on implied contract.

Earlier notes on this subject may be found in 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 473; 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 72, and 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117. This note is supplemental to the foregoing.

As to the liability of a municipality or other public corporation on an implied contract for labor or services rendered, see notes in 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 43, and 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1125.

It has been asserted that a contract by an officer or agent of a municipality with himself, although prohibited by law, may be ratified to the extent of rendering it liable as upon implied contract for the reasonable value of the services or property received under it. Minneapolis v. Canterbury, — Minn. —, 142 N. W. 812.

And it has been said to be well settled that municipal corporations cannot be made liable on implied contracts which would be ultra vires if attempted to be made in express terms, or which they are forbidden by statute to enter into except in a particular manner. On the other hand, there is no reason, in the absence of statutory objection, why the general obligation to do justice should not bind a town so as to make it liable for the reasonable worth of a permanent improvement constructed under an imperfectly executed contract, and retained by the town as a part of a highway. Vito v. Simsbury, — Conn. —, 87 Atl. 722.

Notwithstanding the rule that a binding contract with the officers of a school district can be made only when they are in session, a district may be required to pay the value of material received by it when it has knowingly permitted it to be furnished and has received and used the same and enjoyed the benefits thereof, although the material was not furnished or received under a contract binding upon the district. Watkins v. School Dist. 85 Kan. 760, 118 Pac. 1069.

So, where a municipality has authority to operate a waterworks system, the value 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Injunction — against enforcement of town orders — assignment to bank.

2. Injunction will not lie at the suit of the town to prevent the use by a bank of town orders which it has taken as collateral from the town treasurer, to whom it agreed to advance money to pay the orders upon his agreement to assign the orders to it as collateral; since the town, having received the benefit of the agreement, is estopped to deny the bank's right of reimbursement.

Town — power of treasurer to borrow money.

3. A town treasurer has no authority, by virtue of his office, to borrow money for the use of the town.

Same — power of selectmen.

4. The selectmen of a town are authorized to borrow money on its behalf, from time to time, as the necessities of the town require.

of coal ordered by it in operating same may be recovered, and there is an implied promise to pay from a fund which the municipality is authorized to devote to waterworks purposes. Martin-Strelau Co. v. Dubuque, 149 Iowa, 1, 127 N. W. 1013.

Although there is no lawful preliminary action on the part of a town through its financial town meeting or its town council whereby a valid and enforceable contract for the construction of a state road, or for the hire of road-making machinery, may lawfully be made, yet where the contract made has been fully executed, the road built, the road-making machinery used, and the contract price paid to and received by the town, it is liable for the reasonable value of the benefit received under the contract, it having the power to make such a contract under certain formalities. Pocasaset Ice Co. v. Burton, — R. I. —, 85 Atl. 277 (quoting from the note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117).

Although the forms of law are not complied with in effecting a loan to a municipality, and the contract is invalid for that reason, yet if the lender acts in good faith, and the money is paid into the municipal treasury, and subsequently expended for a purpose authorized by law, the municipality is liable therefor. The foundation of this liability is the fact that the municipality has received money or property for a legitimate municipal purpose for which equity and good conscience require payment. First Nat. Bank v. Goodhue, 120 Minn. 362, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 84, 139 N. W. 599, citing note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117 (in this case the contract for the original loan was invalid also because the lender was trustee of the municipality).

But where a city treasurer is without authority to borrow money for a city, the latter cannot be held upon an implied contract for money loaned by a bank to the city at the request of the treasurer, although the money was placed to his credit as treasurer, where, however, at the time he was in default. First Nat. Bank v. Newcastle, 224 Pa. 285, 132 Am. St. Rep.

Same — ratification of loan.

5. The selectmen of a town may recognize and validate receipts given by the town treasurer without authority for money advanced to him by strangers to meet current expenses.

Trusts — orders in possession of treasurer — right of bank.

6. Orders paid by a town treasurer and laid aside by him before his death to be delivered to a bank as security for money advanced upon his check to pay the orders, in accordance with an agreement that it shall have the orders as collateral security, belong to the bank after the death of the treasurer, as against the claims of the town.

Assumpsit — money advanced — possession of collateral.

7. Possession of the orders is not necessary to enable a bank which, by agreement with a town treasurer, has honored his check drawn in payment of them in consideration that they be turned over to it as collateral security for the advances, to recover the amount of the advances from the town.

(May 20, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Addison County Chancery Court in complainant's favor in a suit to enjoin the payment or collection of certain outstanding town orders and to compel their surrender for cancellation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles J. Button and Marvella C. Webber, for appellants:

The orders were not void when they came into the hands of the bank, but they were then valid and subsisting obligations of the town, and the defendant bank should not surrender them, but may enforce their collection against the town.

The town auditors audited the books of the treasurer annually, finding and allowing each year the item charged by the treasurer for interest paid on orders deposited, and this report was published and acted upon by the town, and accepted by vote, and ordered to be placed on file and recorded. This amounted to a ratification by the town.

The findings in regard to apparent shortage in Roscoe's accounts are immaterial. The defendants are in no way responsible, and the validity of the orders that came into the bank's hands are in no way affected by any such shortage.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For more than fifteen years prior to his death on May 19, 1909, Alfred P. Roscoe was treasurer of the town of New Haven. During all or a part of this time he was town clerk, postmaster, trustee of public money, treasurer of a local church society, treasurer of the county agricultural society, and handled and invested some of the funds of Beeman Academy. He carried on a fire insurance business and acted as a banker for his neighbors, issuing and cashing checks for their convenience. He kept an account at the Middlebury National Bank in his own name, and to the credit of this account he deposited money coming to his hands from these various sources, except such as he received as postmaster and as treasurer of the agricultural society. Against this account he drew his personal checks in payment of such bills as he was called upon to pay, including personal obligations and debts against the town. He issued accommodation checks against this account in exchange for cash, and either deposited the cash so received to the credit of the account, used it to pay his own bills, or to redeem town orders, as occasion required. When town orders were presented to him in the regular course of town business, after requiring the holder to write his name across the backs of them, he would either give the holder the amount called for in cash or his personal check drawn against this account in the bank. Later on he would take the orders, or a part of them, write the word "accepted" on the backs of them, sign his name as treasurer thereunder, and from time to time send them to the bank to be credited to his said account as outstanding obligations of the town. These acceptances were dated as of the day they were forwarded to the bank, but the orders generally came to his hands some time before. Sometimes orders were presented directly to the bank; these were cashed by the bank, charged to Roscoe's account, and sent to him for acceptance. When received by Roscoe he would indorse his acceptance thereon and return them to the bank, and they were then credited to Roscoe's account like the others. At the time of his death, the amount of orders held by the bank was $2,201.29, and his account was overdrawn $344.55. About the time that Roscoe became treasurer of the town, the selectmen made arrangements with the bank to provide the money for the payment of the town's state taxes at a special rate of 5 per cent interest, and in consideration thereof the bank was to have the town's business. It was the practice of the selectmen to issue town orders for the amount of the state highway and school taxes. These were drawn to Roscoe, and he put them in the bank and thereby raised the money for the payment of these taxes. None of these orders were in the bank at the time of Roscoe's death. While the bank held town orders, it charged interest thereon until the condition of Roscoe's account was such that they or some of them could be taken care of, when they would be charged up and retired.

The foregoing method of handling the town business was according to an arrangement entered into between Roscoe and the cashier of the bank, and had existed for at least ten years prior to the former's death.

During his last sickness, Roscoe directed a member of his family to forward some of these orders to the bank for deposit, but on one occasion at least the orders were not sent as directed. After his death, orders amounting to $329.19 were found among his papers, and checks drawn and paid during this illness correspond with these orders, indicating that he had taken up the orders with checks and laid them aside to be forwarded and deposited according to the usual course. Except as stated, no arrangement was made between the selectmen and Roscoe, or between the selectmen and the bank, as to how the business should be conducted; nor was there any evidence that the selectmen knew the method or details of any of the transactions between Roscoe and the bank. They had, however, for a good many years, drawn orders to themselves for the amount of their salaries, some of which were paid by Roscoe's personal checks. No vote of the town was ever passed regarding borrowing money for the use of the town.

The accounts of the treasurer and other town officers were audited annually, and a report was published and distributed purporting to show the standing of the town finances, and the contents of these reports were known to the selectmen. From the time of the March meeting until the taxes were paid in the fall, the selectmen drew orders for the current expenses of the town. Taxes were payable to the treasurer, and the selectmen knew that they were not paid in large amounts until about the 1st of September, and that orders were drawn by them between March and September in excess of the money in the treasury. They also knew that Roscoe took care of such orders in some way. The reports of the auditors, published as aforesaid, were annually accepted by vote of the town and ordered to be filed and recorded; and, while Roscoe had been behind in his accounts for ten years, the auditors did not discover it, but reported his accounts to be correct.

No town orders remained in the bank on October 7, 1908. All had been previously paid, and Roscoe's account then showed a credit balance of $330.99. Between that date and the date of Roscoe's death, May 19, 1909, he deposited orders amounting to $2,001.29, and during the same time the bank cashed his checks drawn for the payment of valid obligations to the town to the amount of $3,882.48. And during the time specified no other town funds went into his account. So, treating all of the money left in his account on October 7th as belonging to the town, the town has, since that date actually been benefited by this method of doing business, $1,350.10.

An examination of Roscoe's books discloses certain irregularities and errors covering his entire term of office. Some of these, the master says, are clearly clerical errors; others, he says, are difficult to understand. Some are in his favor; some are against him. The net result, however, is a shortage, but the amount is disputed, and we find no occasion for determining it.

After the defendant Weston was appointed town treasurer, the selectmen discovered that the treasury was empty; and, in order that the new treasurer might have money in hand, they drew an order for $500, which was cashed by the bank. Weston then began paying orders when presented, and paid orders held by the bank at the time of Roscoe's death to the amount (including interest) of $1,039.77, leaving orders amounting to $1,171.52 in the bank. The legal agent of the town, Mr. Hunt, advised Weston that these orders were invalid, and protested against their payment; but Weston maintained that it was his duty, as treasurer, to pay orders so far as he had funds, and informed Hunt that he should continue to do so.

The town brings this bill in chancery to restrain the collection or payment of the outstanding orders hereinbefore and hereinafter specified, and to compel the holders to surrender the same, and to require the bank to pay back the $1,029.77 received from Weston. The bank, by way of cross bill, seeks to compel the town to deliver to it the orders amounting to $329.19 set apart by Roscoe as stated.

Three groups of town orders are involved: (1) Those deposited by Roscoe; (2) those issued to retire the McIntyre receipts, as hereinafter stated; (3) those amounting to $329.19 found among Roscoe's papers after his death. A fourth class might have been made of those presented directly to the bank, but there is no way of identifying them, and so they cannot be separately considered.

1. In the argument before us regarding the validity of the orders deposited by Roscoe, counsel have made the character and legal effect of the transactions between Roscoe and the holders of the orders the test of the town's liability to the bank. The claim of the town is that these transactions were, in law, payments, and that the well-established rule "once paid, always paid," applies to them, and therefore they cannot be enforced. The bank's claim is that, in view of its arrangement with Roscoe, the transactions amounted to purchases of the orders by Roscoe for the bank. In our view this question is not controlling. Let us assume that the orders were, in law, paid when Roscoe took them up. Roscoe undertook to make an agreement for the town whereby he was to procure money for the town's use by depositing these orders as he did. As between Roscoe and the bank, Roscoe, in effect, either bought the orders for the bank, or, in effect, he borrowed money for the use of the town. Whatever the character of the arrangement was, the bank has fully carried it out. The town has had the benefit of it. It proposes to retain this benefit, which as we have seen amounts to at least $1,350, so far as the dealings are here concerned. In other words, the town now repudiates Roscoe's authority to make an agreement, under which it has, in effect, received and retains over $1,300 of the bank's money. The injustice of such a result must be apparent to everybody.

It should be remembered that we are not dealing with a contract which a town is forbidden by law to make, nor yet with one which a town is unauthorized to make for itself, nor are we dealing with a contract wholly executory. We have here a contract fully executed on the part of the bank, the benefits of which are retained by the town—a contract which is (we will assume) unenforceable, but only because made with an officer who had no authority to make it. In short, a loan under a contract with an unauthorized agent, the avails of which have gone to pay the valid debts of the principal. Between individuals, on plainest principles, the law would require repayment of this money. It remains to consider whether a municipal corporation can avoid this result.

We approach the discussion of the law of this subject with these general principles established: Towns are mere creatures of the legislature, constituted for governmental purposes (Burlington v. Central Vermont R. Co. 82 Vt. 5, 71 Atl. 826; Sargent v. Clark, 83 Vt. 523, 77 Atl. 337), and possess only such powers as are expressly granted, or are implied because necessary to carry into effect such as are expressly granted. Swanton v. Highgate, 81 Vt. 152, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 867, 69 Atl. 667. Like all corporations, both public and private, they necessarily act through agents; but municipal officers derive their authority, largely, if not wholly, from the law, and not from the municipality, and all persons dealing with them are bound to know the extent and limitations thereof. Taft v. Pittsford, 28 Vt. 286; Barre v. Perry, 82 Vt. 301, 73 Atl. 574. There is a marked tendency, however, on the part of the courts to treat these public corporations, in their ordinary business affairs, more nearly as private corporations and individuals are treated than was formerly done. And while there are some who hold that the contract of an unauthorized municipal officer is void, and cannot be enforced, and gives rise to no available equities, no matter how unjust the result, there is plenty of authority for the more reasonable and just rule that where the infirmity in the contract lies merely in the lack of authority of the one who assumes to make it for the municipality, and the latter has received and retains the benefit of the contract, the law will not refuse relief to the other party, at least to the extent of the benefit conferred. This last clause is added for the reason that, as will be seen from the cases following, courts which arrive at practically the same result differ in this one respect. Some say that the municipality is estopped to deny the validity of the contract; others say that the contract as made is invalid, but one who has carried it out may recover, not on the contract, but quantum meruit or quantum valebant. In other words, some, in effect, make the contract binding; others, in effect, make it binding to the extent of benefits received and retained by the municipality.

Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 255, is a leading case on the subject under discussion. Two opinions appear in the report of the case. Cope, J., expressed the view that while an executory contract, made without authority, cannot be enforced in the case of a contract which has been executed, the benefit of which the municipality has received, the law interposes an estoppel, and will not permit the validity of the contract to be questioned. Field, Ch. J., took this view: "If the city obtain the money of another by mistake or without authority by law, it is her duty to refund it, not from any contract entered into by her on the subject, but from the general obligation to do justice, which binds all persons, whether natural or artificial,"—though he says the rule does not apply where money or property was received in disregard of a positive prohibition.

East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gaslight & Coke Co. 98 Ill. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 97, involved the validity of a long-term contract for lighting the streets of the city. The city had authority to contract for service of this character, but it was claimed that a thirty-year term was beyond its authority, and that the contract, as made, would result in exceeding the debt limit fixed by the charter. The court left the question regarding the term undecided, but applied the rule governing private corporations, and held that, at least so far as executed, the contract was binding; that, the light having been furnished and enjoyed by the city, it ought to be paid for.

In Des Moines v. Welsbach Street Lighting Co. 110 C. C. A. 540, 188 Fed. 906, it is said: "The complaint made of the contract in question is not that it was one beyond the scope and power of the city to enter into, but that it was not entered into in the manner prescribed by law. A business contract, which is within the scope of the powers of the city to make, but illegal because entered into in an irregular manner, when fully executed by one party, and the city has received and accepted the full benefit of the contract and cannot restore what it has received, is enforceable; the city being estopped to assert the irregular execution when the ends of justice would thereby be defeated."

In Schneider v. Menasha, 118 Wis. 298, 99 Am. St. Rep. 996, 95 N. W. 94, the rule is thus stated: "The result is that no one can successfully plead ignorance to save himself from loss in dealing with a municipality as to matters expressly prohibited, nor as to any matter beyond the scope of corporate authority, except in case his money or property has actually been used for legitimate corporate purposes. In that event, on equitable grounds, the court will afford a remedy to the extent of the corporate benefit, but no further."

It is held in Alabama that, where a city's contract is illegal because it is prohibited, it is utterly void, and the city is not in any wise bound, though it has used the money received thereunder. But where the contract is merely unauthorized, and the money or property has been received by the city and applied to its authorized objects, it is liable to an action of implied assumpsit. That, while no suit can be maintained on the contract, "persons who have in any way advanced money to a corporation, which money has been devoted to the necessities of the corporation, are considered in chancery (and at law in the equitable action for money had and received) as creditors of the corporation to the extent to which the loan has been so expended." Bluthenthal v. Headland, 132 Ala. 249, 90 Am. St. Rep. 904, 31 So. 87; Allen v. La Fayette, 89 Ala. 641, 9 L.R.A. 497, 8 So. 30; Ensley v. Hollingsworth & Co. 170 Ala. 398, 54 So. 95, Ann. Cas. 1912 D, 652. The same distinction is made in Pennsylvania, and it is held that municipalities must account for money or other property applied by their officers to authorized uses, although it was received under an agreement that is wholly unenforceable. Aspinwall-Delafield Co. v. Aspinwall, 229 Pa. 1, 77 Atl. 1098; Rainburg v. Fyan, 127 Pa. 74, 4 L.R.A. 336, 17

Valley Falls Co. v. Taft, 27 R. I. 136, 61 Atl. 41, involved the validity of a contract to construct a highway on payment of certain advances which were made. It was argued on behalf of the town that the council had no power to bind the town as they assumed to do. "If this is so," said the court, "the money was paid without consideration, and may be recovered back."

In Eden v. Stevens, — Iowa, —, 138 N. W. 927, a town treasurer had deposited the public funds in a private bank. The bank failed, and the funds were tied up. In this situation of affairs, the treasurer voluntarily paid certain warrants with his own money, expecting to be reimbursed when the public funds should become available. The court held that he was entitled to a recovery, saying: "It would be a reproach to the law if there were no remedy available to the defendant under such circumstances. We can think of no fair reason, either legal, equitable, or moral, why he should not be reimbursed." See also Bell v. Kirkland, 102 Minn. 213, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 793, 120 Am. St. Rep. 621, 113 N. W. 271; First Nat. Bank v. Goodhue, 120 Minn. 362, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 84, 139 N. W. 599; Nebraska Bitulithic Co. v. Omaha, 84 Neb. 375, 121 N. W. 443; Ft. Scott v. Eads Brokerage Co. 54 C. C. A. 437, 117 Fed. 51; 1 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 226; 2 Herman, Estoppel, § 1222; 1 Abbott, Mun. Corp. 579-581.

In Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 659, a contract for street work payable in bonds was under discussion. The right of the city to make such a contract was denied. But it was held that the validity of the provision regarding payment was not controlling. "If," said the court, "payments cannot be made in bonds because their issue is ultra vires, it would be sanctioning rank injustice to hold that payment need not be made at all. Such is not the law." And in Chapman v. Douglas County, 107 U. S. 348, 27 L. ed. 378, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, not only was this proposition affirmed, but the following language from Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Cal. 362, was approved: "The city is not exempted from the common obligation to do justice, which binds individuals. Such obligation rests upon all persons, whether natural or artificial. If the city obtain the money of another by mistake, or without authority of law, it is her duty to refund it, from this general obligation. If she obtain other property, which does not belong to her, it is her duty to restore it, or, if used, to render an equivalent therefor from the like obligation." (Argenti v. San Francisco, 16

Cal. 282.) The legal liability springs from the moral duty to make restitution."

And it is this very doctrine, we think, which underlies our own cases. Burnham v. Strafford, 53 Vt. 610, and Brock v. Bruce, 59 Vt. 313, 10 Atl. 93. In the former, the plaintiff being one of the selectmen, borrowed a sum of money of a certain person and gave therefor a town order, to which he signed his own name and the names of the other selectmen. He claimed that he paid the money over to the town treasurer. The town denied his right to sign the names of the other selectmen, and denied that the treasurer ever received the money; and refused to pay the order. Thereupon the plaintiff went to the holder of the order and took it up, and brought suit against the town, declaring in general assumpsit. It was held that he could not recover on the order, as it was not negotiable in form, nor could he recover on the ground that it was paid at the request of the town, since he knew when he took it up that the town had repudiated it; but that, in the circumstances, if he could prove that he turned the money over to the town treasurer and it was received for the town, he could recover, for it would be "a loan directly from the plaintiff to the town—money had and received of him by the town to its use—for the payment of which the law would imply a promise."

In the Brock Case the prudential committee of a school district borrowed a sum of money on the credit of the district, and used it for the purposes of the district, and assessed a tax large enough to cover it. It was claimed that the committee had no authority to borrow this sum. But it was said that the money was needed and used for paying the expenses of the school, and, "if the committee had no authority to borrow it on the credit of the district, it may be treated as if they borrowed it of themselves; and, it being to supply a temporary need in respect of expenses for which a tax might legally be assessed under the vote, it was properly a part of those expenses and ought to be so regarded." See also State v. St. Johnsbury, 59 Vt. 332, 10 Atl. 531.

It is especially appropriate that the rule of restitution should be applied when a municipality, while holding benefits which it does not offer to surrender, applies for relief, against the enforcement of alleged illegal warrants or orders, to the court of chancery, wherein the maxim is, "He who seeks equity must do equity." To permit this town to deny the bank the right to compensation for actual value received would be manifestly inequitable and unjust, and would amount to an utter disregard of the maxim. Turner v. Cruzen, 70 Iowa, 202, 30 N. W. 483; Natchez v. Mallery, 54 Miss. 499; Grand Island Gas Co. v. West, 28 Neb. 852, 45 N. W. 242. So we need not assert the legality or illegality of the orders deposited by Roscoe. If they are valid, of course their collection will not be enjoined. If they are invalid, they correctly represent the amount advanced by the bank, and can be used as evidence. There is no danger to the town in their remaining in the hands of the bank, and an injunction is unnecessary and should not be granted. Allen v. La Fayette, 89 Ala. 641, 9 L.R.A. 497, 8 So. 30.

2. Roscoe had another method of procuring money. He borrowed various sums from different persons in the community, giving as evidence thereof a writing, signed by himself as treasurer, reciting that he had received a certain sum of the person named, "for the use of the town, payable on demand, with interest annually." When he had money of the town, Roscoe would call in these receipts and pay the holder the amount specified, with interest. This practice he had followed for a number of years. These transactions did not appear in the reports, but he charged in his account each year a considerable sum as interest in excess of that paid to the bank. Soon after Roscoe's death, the defendant McIntyre presented to the selectmen receipts of the kind described, issued between December 1, 1908, and February 1, 1909, to the amount (including interest) of $1,642.24, and asked for orders in exchange therefor. He asked for two orders,—one for $1,500, and one for $142.24. After some discussion these were issued to him by the selectmen, and he surrendered the receipts. The larger of these orders McIntyre deposited in the defendant bank in his check account, and soon after checked out most of it. The other he holds. These receipts did not appear on the books as an outstanding liability, and it did not appear before the master that the town ever received the money on them. McIntyre was one of the auditors and assisted in the audit of the town books in February, 1909, and at that time the books showed a substantial balance on hand in all departments. He said nothing about his receipts, though it is not found that he intentionally concealed the fact that he had them. He had let Roscoe have money for his own use, taking his personal note therefor, and held one such note when Roscoe died. The selectmen knew nothing about this method of raising funds.

It is apparent that these orders differ from those hereinbefore discussed in a vital particular: They do not represent money which it is found went to the town's use.

So, if these are to be held valid when issued, it must be on the ground that a town treasurer has ex officio authority to borrow money for the town, in which case it would make no difference whether the town actually received the money or not; or on the ground that the action of the selectmen in issuing orders to take up the receipts bound the town by way of ratification.

That a town treasurer has no authority by virtue of his office merely to borrow money for the use of the town seems clear enough. His duty is to receive and keep the money of the town (Middlebury v. Rood, 7 Vt. 125) and pay it out on proper orders, or otherwise account for the same. Certain special duties are put upon him by statute, but his fiscal duties are limited as stated. The selectmen, however, are officers of more general authority. They are commonly spoken of as the "fathers of the town," and by express enactment have general supervision of the affairs of the town, and are to cause duties required of the town, not committed to any particular officer, to be duly performed and executed. Pub. Stat. 3467. See Middlebury v. Rood, supra. They are especially the financial agents of the town. Thayer v. Lyman, 35 Vt. 646; Burnham v. Strafford, 53 Vt. 610. They are to audit and in their discretion allow claims against the town for money paid or services performed, and draw orders therefor. Pub. Stat. 3471. They may submit disputed claims to arbitration, and the award will bind the town. Dix v. Dummerston, 19 Vt. 262; Hollister v. Pawlet, 43 Vt. 425. They may, in certain cases, employ counsel (Burton v. Norwich, 34 Vt. 345), settle cases in which the town is interested (Cabot v. Britt, 36 Vt. 349), and control by contract an invalid tax bill (Miles v. Albany, 59 Vt. 79, 7 Atl. 601). Their authority approximates that of general agents.

It was said by Chief Judge Poland, in Cabot v. Britt, that "selectmen cannot be said to be, in a strict legal sense, general agents of towns, because specific subjects and duties, committed by law to other officers, do not belong to them. Nor are we prepared to say that in other respects they are general agents of towns to such an extent as to be authorized to exercise all the corporate authority of the town, and by their action bind the town in all cases where the town itself could by a corporate vote. But, in all matters pertaining to the ordinary and usual corporate interest, we think it was intended by the statute to clothe selectmen with authority to act without calling a town meeting to act upon it." It follows, we think, that the selectmen are authorized by law to borrow money, from time to time, as the necessities of the town require. No one denies that they have authority to continue to draw orders for the payment of town debts, and thereby make the town liable on such orders, though to their knowledge the treasury is empty. Such orders, on due presentment, would bear interest at the legal rate. It would be a misfortune if they should be held to be unauthorized to borrow money to pay current bills and issue the order to the lender, instead of the creditor, and thereby secure to the town the lower rate of interest which can always be obtained. It is a matter of common knowledge that towns are usually out of funds between spring and fall. During this time the usual bills for roads, schools, and the poor must be met. It is altogether reasonable and quite consistent for this court to hold that the selectmen may pledge the credit of the town for money borrowed to meet its current bills, without a vote of the town on the subject.

If they could borrow money for the town, the selectmen could authorize the treasurer to do so in their stead, or ratify his acts in that behalf. For the rule is that ratification may be by the principal or his authorized agent. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 387; Clarke v. Lyon County, 8 Nev. 188; People v. Swift, 31 Cal. 28. This is shown by our own cases. In Langdon v. Castleton, 30 Vt. 285, the plaintiff continued to serve the defendant as attorney after his office of town agent expired, without an express contract with the town or the new agent. It was held that he could recover for his services, for the agent must have known about the matter and it was taken that he assented.

Topsham v. Rogers, 42 Vt. 189, arose under a statute which made it unlawful for liquor agents to purchase liquors for their agencies, and imposed that duty upon the selectmen. Not regarding this provision, and in spite of a contract to like effect, the defendant bought liquors for his agency, used the town funds to pay for them, sold them in violation of law, and refused to account for the proceeds. It was held that these acts were unwarranted, and that the town might repudiate them, but that the selectmen might have made the defendant their special agent to buy the liquors for the town, and had an undoubted right to adopt and ratify the transaction after the acts were done. See also Mt. Holly v. Buswell, 45 Vt. 354; Hett v. Portsmouth, 73 N. H. 334, 61 Atl. 596.

These receipts might or might not have been valid against the town. There was no fraud perpetrated on the selectmen, and they chose to treat them as valid. Exercising that discretion which the statute vests in them, they allowed the claims made by McIntyre for the money represented by the receipts. "If the right surrendered," said this court in Gregg v. Weathersfield, 55 Vt. 385, "is of doubtful validity, or indeed of no validity at all, its surrender may be a valuable consideration for a promise." What the result would be had the McIntyre receipts been of acknowledged invalidity and his claim wholly invalid, we need not say. It did not appear before the master that the money went to the use of the town; but it does not appear, nor can we assume, that it did not appear to the satisfaction of the selectmen that the town had the benefit of the loans. In the circumstances, the claim was within their jurisdiction to allow or disallow.

3. In equity the orders which Roscoe had laid aside to be sent to the bank belong to the bank. Equity regards that as done which ought to be done, and so what is agreed to be done. Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, 33 Am. Dec. 193. When Roscoe drew his checks for these orders and laid them aside to be forwarded to the bank pursuant to the arrangement, he held them as a quasi trustee for the bank, and, when the bank paid the checks, it became entitled to the orders. But it does not here appear that these orders ever passed into the control of the town. Roscoe's representative is not a party here, and it only appears that these orders were found among his papers. They are not necessary to a recovery of the amount paid by the bank; and, it not appearing that the town is in a position to make delivery of them, no decree regarding them should be made. Angus v. Robinson, 62 Vt. 60, 19 Atl. 993.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill, with costs.

personal injuries survives the death of the person injured, and the right of action for death is not an independent one in favor of survivors, but is a survival of a right belonging to the deceased, an amendment by an administrator after the death of the person injured, of an action brought by him before his death, claiming additional damages for the death, does not constitute an abandonment of the original cause of action for one not originating until after the action was begun, so as to preclude a recovery in such action.

Death — intentional injury — right of recovery.

2. Under an amendment of a statute permitting recovery for death caused by negligence by omitting the reference to negligence, and permitting a recovery in all actions surviving to an administrator for injuries resulting in death, a recovery can be had for death resulting from injuries intentionally inflicted, although the statute provides that the action must be brought within one year "from the neglect complained of."

(July 25, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wilful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Prentice, Ch. J.:

David Kling, the present plaintiff's intestate, brought this action in his lifetime, claiming damages for an alleged malicious and wilful assault, resulting in severe injuries and a fractured skull, endangering life. Following his death, which occurred two days later, the present plaintiff, as the administrator upon his estate, entered to prosecute the action, and thereafter filed a substituted complaint. This complaint repeated the same allegation of an assault upon the original plaintiff, causing a fracture of his skull, and added that as a consequence thereof he died. Upon the trial evidence was offered by the plaintiff tending to show the commission of a wilful assault as alleged, and the death of the plaintiff's intestate three days later as its proximate result. Upon the defendant's motion a verdict was directed in his favor.

At common law, in conformance with the maxim, Actio personalis moritur cum persona, no action would lie for damages caused by the death of a human being by the wrongful or negligent act of another. This view was general except in a few jurisdictions where the exception was made that where the death of a wife or child, caused by a wrongful act, was not instan-

Messrs. Charles J. Martin and William T. Minor, for appellant:

The statute indirectly creates a cause of action for death.

The statute has been construed to be remedial.

Judgment may be rendered for the relief demanded upon any right of action which the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient in law to support.

Cole v. Jerman, 77 Conn. 375, 59 Atl. 425; Morehouse v. Throckmorton, 72 Conn. 449, 44 Atl. 747.

The filing of a substituted complaint, by the administrator of David Kling, deceased, did not change the nature of the case.

Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Quinncipiac Brewing Co. 63 Conn. 551, 25 L.R.A. 856, 29 Atl. 76; Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co., supra.

The gist of the action is that the statute of our state, instead of in terms creating a new right of action, provides that the right of action of the party injured shall survive, and thus indirectly accomplishes the same result as do those statutes which taneous, the husband or father could recover for the loss of services and for medical and other expenses up to the time of death without the aid of any statute (see 13 Cyc. 310). This general denial of a right of action at common law led to the enactment of statutes giving a right of recovery in such cases in practically every jurisdiction. The first of these statutes (9 and 10 Vict. chap. 93) was enacted in 1846, and is commonly known as Lord Campbell's act, and with various minor variations is now embodied in the law of practically all the states of the union. These statutes are of two kinds; namely, those generally known as survival statutes, and in which the right of action was that which the deceased would have had had he lived, and those creating a new cause of action independent of any right of action which the deceased might have had. In some jurisdictions, however, the statutes embrace both of these classes. (See generally, 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 858 et seq.)

But few decisions seem to have passed directly upon the question whether or not such statutes give a right of action for an intentional killing, but most of the statutes are undoubtedly sufficiently broad to embrace such cases.

Thus, under statutes giving a right of action for death caused by wrongful act or negligence, etc., of such character as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, it has been held that recovery for death intentionally inflicted may be had provided the killing was not justifiable. Morgan v. Barnhill, 55 C. A. 1, 118 Fed. 24; Howard v. Hunter, 126 Ky. 685, 104 S. W. 723; Randolph v. Snyder, 139 Ky. 159, 129 S. W. 562 (dictum); Tucker v. State, 89 Md. 471, 46 L.R.A. 181, 43 Atl. 778, 44 Atl. 1004; White v. Maxcy, 64 Mo. 552; Nichols v. Winfrey, 79 Mo. 544, on subsequent appeal, 90 Mo. 403, 2 S. W. 305; Vawter v. Hultz, 112 Mo. 633, 20 S. W. 689; Besenecker v. Sale, 8 Mo. App. 212; Kain v. Larkin, 56 Hun, 79, 9 N. Y. Supp. 89; Darling v. Williams, 35 Ohio St. 58; Wilson 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 322. In Howard v. Hunter, 126 Ky. 685, 104 S. W. 723, supra, the court, in discussing the scope to be given the term "wrongful act," said: "The words 'negligence' and 'wrongful act' are sufficiently broad to embrace every degree of tort that can be committed against the person. . . . As the word 'negligence' has a limited meaning, the words 'wrongful act' were used to embrace every injury that might be committed against the person, whether negligently done or not. A wrongful act may or may not be negligent, depending on how it is committed and the relation between the parties. Many wrongful acts are committed in which there is no element of negligence,—no breach of duty is committed. A wrongful act may be criminal, wilful, wanton, or reckless. In short, every injury inflicted upon the person without legal right or excuse is a wrongful act without reference to the relation existing between the perpetrator and his victim. Clearly the death of a person caused by the careless, wanton, or malicious use of firearms is a wrongful act. . . . Any act that is wanton or malicious is necessarily wrongful, and whenever death is caused by a wrongful act, however it may be committed, or whatever the means or instrument used in its commission may be, a cause of action survives to the personal representative. Any other interpretation would seriously impair, if not destroy, the meaning of the words 'wrongful act,' found in the Constitution, and inserted for the purpose of allowing a cause of action for the death of any person, caused by such act."

And a right of action for the intentional, unjustifiable killing of a person existed in Texas under the act of February 2, 1860, which gave a right of action for compensatory damages in case of death caused by wrongful act, etc., for the benefit of the surviving husband, wife, child, or parent of the person killed, and the cumulative provision of the Constitution of 1869 (§ 30) to the effect that every person or corporation that may commit a homicide in express terms create a new cause of action.

Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 33 Conn. 51; McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, 29 Am. St. Rep. 181, 22 Atl. 1094; Connors v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 490, 60 Am. Rep. 814, 32 N. W. 465.

The death does not form an essential part of the cause of action, but is only an element in ascertaining the damages arising therefrom.

through wilful act or omission shall be responsible in exemplary damages, etc. March v. Walker, 48 Tex. 372.

And a statute providing that an action for actual damages on account of injuries causing the death of any person may be brought where the death was caused by the "wrongful act," etc., of another, although the killing might have amounted to a felony, and without regard to any criminal proceedings, was held, in Croft v. Smith, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 51 S. W. 1089, to give a right of action for damages resulting from the intentional and unjustifiable killing of a person, against the person doing the killing.

So, under a statute providing for reparation for killing by "careless or wanton or malicious use of firearms or other deadly weapons, not in self-defense," recovery may be had for an intentional killing done with firearms, and not in self-defense. Becker v. Crow, 7 Bush, 198; Spring v. Glenn, 12 Bush, 172. And see Young v. Young, 141 Ky. 76, 132 S. W. 155.

And in McClurg v. Igleheart, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 913, 33 S. W. 80, it was held that a statute allowing recovery for a killing done "wantonly and maliciously" embraced every wrongful and intentional killing.

And in the following cases it was held, without indicating the nature of the statute under which the action was brought, that recovery could be had for an intentional unjustifiable killing: Weekes v. Cottingham, 58 Ga. 559; McKinney v. Carmack, 119 Ga. 467, 46 S. E. 719; Forbes v. Snyder, 94 Ill. 374; Head v. Martin, 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622; Brinkmann v. Gottenstroeter, 160 Mo. App. 596, 140 S. W. 1194, adopting opinion as reported in 153 Mo. App. 351, 134 S. W. 584; Marks v. Borum, 1 Baxt. 87, 25 Am. Rep. 764; Wallace v. Stevens, 74 Tex. 559, 12 S. W. 283, on subsequent appeal 10 Tex. Civ. App. 44, 30 S. W. 1099; Gray v. Phillips, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 148, 117 S. W. 870.

And in the following cases it seems to have been assumed that an action may be maintained under a statute giving a right of action for death by wilful or wrongful act where the intestate could have maintained an action for the act causing death if death had not ensued, for having intentionally killed a person, provided the killing was not justifiable: Lawrence v. Seay, — Ala. —, 60 So. 937; Suell v. Derricott, 161 Ala. 259, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996, 49 So. 895, 18 Ann. Cas. 636; Richards v. Burgin, 159 Ala. 282, 49 So. 294, 17 Ann. Cas. 898; Gobb v. Owen, 150 Ala. 410, 43 So. 826; 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Rutherford v. Foster, 60 C. C. A. 129, 125 Fed. 187, construing an Arkansas statute: Baker v. Bailey, 16 Barb. 54. And in the following cases wherein the statutes under consideration were not disclosed in the reports of the respective cases, the courts seemingly have proceeded upon a similar assumption: Brooks v. Haslam, 65 Cal. 421, 4 Pac. 399; Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 101 N. E. 411; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Starks, 174 Ind. 345, 92 N. E. 54; Pierce v. Myrick, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 345; Garcia v. Sanders, 90 Tex. 103, 37 S. W. 314.

But under a statute allowing recovery for death of one, caused by "wilful neglect" of another, no recovery can be had where the killing was intentional. Spring v. Glenn, 12 Bush, 172; Morgan v. Thompson, 82 Ky. 383. In Spring v. Glenn, supra, the court said: "While wilful negligence may be quasi criminal, and such a high degree of neglect as is equivalent to an intentional wrong, still it can scarcely be said that when one commits a wrong intentionally, and to accomplish a certain purpose, he is guilty of wilful neglect; nor can it be supposed that the legislature had this class of wrongs in view when enacting the statute authorizing the personal representative to sue when his intestate's death was the result of the wilful negligence of another. The element of negligence must enter into the act of killing in order to create a cause of action under the statute."

Under statutes which are broad enough to allow recovery for an intentional killing, the action must be brought by a party designated in the statute as one for whose benefit recovery is allowed. Morgan v. Thompson, supra, holding that an action for intentional killing could not be maintained by the administrator of the deceased where the statute gives the right of action to the widow and minor children of the person killed.

And under those statutes which give a right of action in cases where the wrongful act was such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, an action cannot be maintained unless decedent could have maintained an action for damages for his injury had he survived. Wilson v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 322, holding that no action could be maintained under the statute, where the deceased could not have sued had she survived, because she was the wife of the defendant.

Watson v. Hall, 46 Conn. 207.

Prentice, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record does not disclose the reasons assigned by the court for its direction of a defendant's verdict. Examination of the transcript of testimony clearly indicates that the reason was not found in the insufficiency of the proof of the alleged assault, and of the intestate's death as a consequence thereof. Presumably the reason was that which defendant's counsel insists was sufficient; to wit, that as the proof was of injuries resulting in death, intentionally inflicted, there could be no recovery under the substituted complaint. Possibly it was for the reason that the substituted complaint set up an independent cause of action, founded upon the death of the intestate, which was unrelated to that contained in the original complaint, and which therefore did not accrue until death had occurred, which death, the evidence showed, was subsequent to the commencement of the action.

The first of these reasons, to be adequate, involves the maintenance of two propositions, to wit: (1) That under the substituted complaint there could be no recovery except for the death of the intestate; and (2) that there can be no recovery in this state for death intentionally caused.

The maintenance of the first of these propositions is an essential preliminary to the second. Upon the assumption that the alleged assault was made as claimed, and that David Kling survived it for three days before death intervened, he, while living, had a right of action for substantial damages. That right of action, by force of the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

statute, survived to the plaintiff administrator. Pub. Act 1903, chap. 193, p. 149. Before his death, suit to enforce this right of recovery in him, being the present action, was begun. The plaintiff was entitled to enter, as he did, to prosecute it to a judgment, which should be compensatory for all that the intestate, while living, suffered as the consequence of the injuries inflicted. Soule v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 24 Conn. 575, 577; Goodsell v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 38 Conn. 51, 55. Unless the amendment of the complaint operated to withdraw this right of action from the consideration of the jury, and to preclude recovery for the consequences of the assault, which antedated the death which ensued, the direction of a verdict for the defendant was manifestly unwarranted.

The original and amended complaints differ from each other in only one particular of possible significance. That arises from the added allegation that death had resulted from the injuries inflicted by the defendant. The former averred that these injuries were so severe that the plaintiff was in danger of death therefrom; the latter, that death had resulted. What did this change in allegation signify in the matter of the plaintiff's right of recovery upon the complaint as it finally stood?

Under Lord Campbell's act, 9 and 10 Victoria, and those statutes in this country which have followed its general lines, a right of action is given where death results from injuries, which is entirely independent of and unrelated to any which the deceased might have had in life. It is not a continuation of or incidental to any right of action existing in favor of anybody prior to the death, and attaches itself to no such right. It is a new thing, which springs into existence upon the death. It is independent of every other right of action, and different in its theory, quality, and object from every other. It does not rest upon the basis of an injury suffered by the deceased's estate; its foundation is the loss sustained by certain persons designated as beneficiaries of the recovery. American R. Co. v. Didricksen, 227 U. S. 145, 149, 57 L. ed. 456, 457, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 70, 57 L. ed. 417, 421, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 228 U. S. 173, 175, 57 L. ed. 785, 786, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426. "A totally new action is given against the persons who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived; an action which . . . is new in its species, new in its quality, new in its principle, in every way new." Seward v. Vera Cruz, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 59; Blake v. Midland R. Co. 18 Q. B. 93, 109. In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227

U. S. 59, 68, 57 L. ed. 417, 420, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, the court, speaking of the Federal employer's liability act of 1908 (act April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1322), similar in its provisions upon the subject now under discussion to those of Lord Campbell's act, said that the right of action which it created was independent of any which the decedent had, proceeded on altogether different principles, and permitted the inclusion in the judgment of no damages which the decedent might have recovered, if he had survived. In the jurisdictions where these statutes exist it would necessarily follow that the substitution of a complaint counting upon the death for one averring sufferings during life only would be the desertion of one cause of action for a radically different one, and the presentation of a right of action which in no way could be made to comprehend, as a basis of recovery, consequences to the deceased during his lifetime.

The situation is very different in this state. The right of recovery for the death which our statute gives is not one which is independent of or unrelated to the right of action which was in the deceased at his death. Our statute is framed upon an entirely different theory, and effectuates quite a different policy. Goodsell v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. supra. The right of action which the executor or administrator is permitted to pursue is not one which springs from the death. It is one which comes to the representative by survival. The right of recovery for the death is as for one of the consequences of the wrong inflicted upon the decedent. The amount of recovery is determined from the standpoint of the deceased, and not from that of the statutory beneficiaries. Its measure, within the statutory limitation, is the value of life to him whose life has been cut off. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 73 Conn. 614, 620, 84 Am. St. Rep. 176, 48 Atl. 751. When one, as the result of injuries inflicted, suffers during life, and death later results, there are not two independent rights of action. There is but one liability, and that is for all the consequences of the wrongful act, including the death. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 73 Conn. 614, 617, 84 Am. St. Rep. 176, 48 Atl. 751. There cannot be two recoveries. Goodsell v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., supra; McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, 159, 29 Am. St. Rep. 181, 22 Atl. 1094. If the injured man survives to recover, he recovers once for all; if he dies before recovery, his executor or administrator stands in his place. The survival statute operates to transfer to the representative the right of action which the deceased had for his sufferings and disability during life, while the death enlarges his right of recovery by permitting an award of additional damages for the death itself as one of the harmful results of the wrongful act. The court is, by the statute, as it was not by the common law, authorized to take that event into consideration, as it might any other physical development consequent upon the injuries, whether occurring before or after action brought. The new event is not regarded as one which creates a cause of action, but one which has a bearing upon the award of damages. Instantaneous death may of itself bring into existence a right of action which is confined, in the matter of recovery, to the event of death. Murphy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 30 Conn. 184, 188. But if the death is not instantaneous, the right of action is not so confined. It reaches back to the antecedent harmful results, and the death is, by force of the statute, made one of the incidents, in the story of results, which is material in a determination of the amount of recovery to which the representative is entitled. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. supra.

Our long-continued practice has conformed to this view. Repeatedly have judgments been rendered where there was a single recovery for the death and antecedent sufferings. The utterances of this court from early days have uniformly sanctioned this procedure. Soule v. New York & N. H. R. Co. supra; Murphy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 496, 499. The language of our statute comports with this view, and would not be in harmony with any other. Pub. Acts of 1903, chap. 193, p. 49.

A complaint which avers both suffering during the life of the decedent and his resulting death does not therefore embody inharmonious or inconsistent allegations of damage. It specifies damages which flow from a common source, and which our law regards as having such source. In a given case the field of damages recoverable may include both sorts of damage, or only one. A complaint which avers both cannot therefore be regarded as presenting for consideration only the damages flowing from the death, and recovery is not precluded for the damages suffered during life. In such case recovery may properly be had for both or either cause, as the proof may justify. Accordingly in the present case it was competent for the plaintiff to recover for the intestate's pain, suffering, and disability during his period of life following the assault, even if he failed to recover for the death. This was distinctly recognized in the earliest of our cases: Soule v. New York & N. H. R. Co. supra; Murphy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 496, 499.

We have next to consider whether or not he was entitled to recover for the intestate's death; it having been caused, as the evidence showed, intentionally. It is unnecessary to trace the development of our statutes imposing a civil liability for injuries to the person, resulting in death. A partial outline of their history is given in Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. supra. Prior to the enactment of chap. 193 of the Public Acts of 1903, that liability was, and always had been, confined to injuries occasioned by negligence. The statute then in force provided that the executor or administrator of any person whose death was caused by negligence might recover of the party legally in fault just damages, not exceeding $5,000. Gen. Stat. 1902, § 1094. Chapter 193 of the Public Acts of 1903, which is the statute now in force, except as the maximum of recovery was changed in 1911, omits the limiting words "caused by negligence," and provides that in all actions surviving to and brought by an executor or administrator for injuries resulting in death, whether instantaneous or otherwise, such executor or administrator may recover from the party legally in fault for such injuries just damages, not exceeding $5,000. We must believe that this omission of the pre-existing limitation to injuries caused by negligence, and the substitution of general comprehensive language, was intentional, and with the purpose of extending the right of recovery to all cases where death was the result of injuries wrongfully inflicted. Otherwise it is difficult to conceive of a sufficient reason for the enactment of this chapter of the Public Acts of 1903. Possibly there was a desire to bring together into close relation the provisions touching the survival of actions and those concerning the right of recovery in cases of death, which had been separated in the Revision of 1902, after having been grouped in successive sections in that of 1888,—§§ 1007-1009. But that desire would scarcely be sufficient to prompt the enactment of the legislation of 1903, and if so, certainly not sufficient of explain the radical change in language which was made in dealing with the subject of recovery for injuries resulting in death. Evidently a change of policy was intended and one which should complete the gradual development of our law upon that subject from its small beginning, in cases of death from defective conditions in highway and bridges through negligence in certain other relations, to the point already reached, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where recovery was permitted in all cases where the death arose from negligent conduct, by including all cases of death, however wrongfully caused. Quite likely the not unnatural notion prevailed that there was something unseemly in excepting from liability one who had caused a death intentionally, when one whose offense grew out of want of care was subjected to liability, and that it was time that the existing discrimination in favor of intentional wrongdoers should be removed.

The language of the act would leave no ground for question that the intent was as indicated, were it not that it is provided in the latter part of the section in question that the action must be brought "within one year from the neglect complained of." The act of 1903 unfortunately is not well drafted. Its shortcomings appear in other of its provisions, and the presence in it of this phrase is apparently the result of a careless appropriation of the language of former statutes, without an appreciation of its inappropriateness to the new conditions created. Judging from the similarity of language, the draftsman had before him the act of 1877, chap. 78, and borrowed from its phraseology, including the precise language used by him, prescribing the time within which action must be brought. Identically the same language appears in § 1009 of the Revision of 1888; and the thoughtless transfer may have been from that source. However that may be, the phraseology of the time limitation provision cannot be fairly regarded as of such consequence as to wrest the comprehensive language of the main provision, defining the right of action, from its plain meaning, and to control its construction. We are satisfied that the statute authorizes recovery for injuries intentionally inflicted, resulting in death.

Our discussion, already had, of the theory upon which our law proceeds in authorizing the recovery for death where it results from personal injuries received, and the nature of that recovery in its relation to the original wrongful act, and to the consequences of such act to the injured person during life, renders it unnecessary to further consider the second reason, which we have suggested as having, by possibility, induced the court to direct the verdict. The right of action which was being pursued under the substituted complaint had accrued when the action was begun, and there was no prosecution of a right of action which did not accrue until death ensued.

There is error, and a new trial is ordered.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

EUGENE M. STOCKTON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(— C. C. A. —, 205 Fed. 402.)

Postoffice — scheme to defraud — loaded dice.

Sending through the mails offers to sell loaded dice and marked playing cards does not render one subject to punishment under a statute subjecting to a penalty whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, shall, for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice, place in the mail any letter, circular, advertisement, etc.

(April 15, 1913.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment convicting defendant of using the postoffice in furtherance of a scheme to defraud. Reversed.

Statement by Gelger, District Judge:

The plaintiff in error seeks review of a judgment of conviction and sentence herein

Note. — Communications offering the means or paraphernalia by which frauds may be perpetrated as an offense against the postal laws.

But few reported cases have been found where, as in STOCKTON v. UNITED STATES, the use of the mails was for the purpose not of defrauding the one communicated with, but of offering him the means by which he might defraud others; but, few as they are, they present a contrariety of opinion as to whether the sending of such a communication constitutes an offense within the meaning of the statute.

Prior to 1889, the statute under which the indictments in these cases were brought read as follows: "If any person having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud or be effected by either opening or intending to open correspondence or communication . . . etc." (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5480.)

In 1889 the statute was amended so as to read: "If any person having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud or to sell, . . . any counterfeit or spurious coin . . . to be effected by either opening or intending to open correspondence or communication . . . etc." (25 Stat. at L. 873, chap. 393, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3696.)

So that cases considering an indictment under the amendment, charging the offense to sell counterfeit money, while within the scope of this note, are not authority 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon an indictment charging violation of § 215 of the Penal Code.

The first count of the indictment charges the defendant with having "devised a scheme and artifice to defraud a class of persons," i. e., "persons . . . whom the said Eugene M. Stockton intended would engage in playing games of chance for money and other valuable consideration, in the manner and by the means hereinafter in this count of the indictment set forth, with one Ike Nichols of Kingsville in the state of Texas," which scheme and artifice to defraud was and is as follows:

"That said Eugene M. Stockton planned, devised, and intended that the said Ike Nichols would purchase from him, said Eugene M. Stockton, and planned, devised, and intended that he, the said Eugene M. Stockton, would sell and deliver to the said Ike Nichols for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, certain gambling devices; to wit, loaded dice and marked playing cards hereinafter more particularly described, for money to be paid therefor by the said Ike Nichols to the said Eugene M. Stockton, and the said Eugene M. Stockton planned, devised, and intended that the said Ike Nichols would engage the said persons intended to be defrauded in playing games of chance for money and other valuable where the indictment was under the first clause, charging an intent to defraud.

Such a case is Streep v. United States, 160 U. S. 128, 40 L. ed. 365, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244, decided after the amendment, holding that as the indictment charged a scheme not to defraud, but a scheme to sell counterfeit obligations of the United States, by means of communications through the mails, no proof of a scheme to defraud was necessary to support it.

The earliest reported case found is that of United States v. Jones, 20 Blatchf. 235, 10 Fed. 469, involving an indictment charging the devising of a scheme to put counterfeit money in circulation by sending through the mail a letter calculated to produce the purchase of counterfeit money at a low price for the purpose of putting it off as good, and based on the statute prior to the amendment of 1889. The court, in holding that the offense was within the scope of the statute, said: "The scheme to defraud, described in the information, may be a scheme to defraud any person upon whom the bad money might be passed, and it is within the scope of the statute, although no particular person had been selected as the subject of its operation. Any scheme, the necessary result of which would be the defrauding of somebody, is a scheme to defraud within the meaning . . . [of the statute] and a scheme to put counterfeit money in circulation is such a scheme." This decision, which seems to be directly opposed to STOCKTON v. UNITED STATES, is not mentioned in that decision.

consideration to be wagered thereon in the manner commonly known as gambling; and the said Eugene M. Stockton planned, devised, and intended that the said dice so to be sold as aforesaid, would be constructed in such manner as to enable the said Ike Nichols to cause said dice in the playing of such games of chance with the said persons intended to be defrauded, as aforesaid, to fall on certain six sides of the said dice, to be determined in advance, as he, the said Eugene M. Stockton, then well knew, without intending that the said persons intended to be defrauded should have any knowledge that the said dice were so constructed as aforesaid; but, on the contrary, he, the said Eugene M. Stockton, by and through the said Ike Nichols, intended to cause the said persons intended to be defrauded, to believe that the said dice were constructed in the same manner as ordinary dice are commonly constructed, to wit: without any mechanical or other device by which it could be determined in advance on which of the six sides the said dice should fall in the playing of the said games of chance."

The indictment further described the marked playing cards, and contained similar averments respecting the plaintiff in error's intention that said Nichols would, in the use of such cards, have an unfair advantage over the persons intended to be defrauded; that the defendant "so having devised the said scheme and artifice, in and for executing the said scheme and artifice, in and for attempting to do so, and in and for defrauding by and through the said scheme and artifice the said persons intended to be defrauded, unlawfully, wilfully, fraudulently, and feloniously, did place in the post-office of the United States, at Chicago, and cause to be placed in the postoffice of the United States, to be sent and delivered by the said postoffice establishment of the said United States, to said Ike Nichols at Kingsville, in the state of Texas, aforesaid, a certain printed catalogue" (not set forth in the indictment, but identified).

The second count is similar except in respect of the alleged gambling device contemplated to be sold and the person to whom the catalogue was mailed; also setting forth a letter alleged to have been written by the defendant, accompanying the catalogue, amplifying some of its contents, and containing discussion of the use of gambling devices.

The facts in the case are that the plaintiff in error, Eugene M. Stockton, in December, 1910, at the time of his indictment, was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling magical goods, cards, dice, and

In Milby v. United States, 48 C. C. A. 574, 109 Fed. 638, where the indictment was for using the mails in attempting to sell counterfeit money, the court held that the indictment was insufficient because the scheme was to sell counterfeit money, and there was no allegation or proof that the seller did not in fact intend to send counterfeit money, and so it did not disclose an intent to defraud. The court, as pointed out in Stockton v. United States, entirely overlooked the amendment of 1889, which provided for just such offenses as in the case at bar. A new indictment was found in that case, and upon appeal from a conviction thereunder the court (opinion by Day, J., 57 C. C. A. 21, 120 Fed. 1), held that the indictment in any event sufficiently charged an offense under the clause added by the amendment of 1889, but also expressed the opinion that an intent that a fraud should be perpetrated on other and unknown persons by the person to whom the communication offering to sell counterfeit money was sent was sufficient to sustain a prosecution under the other clause to which a fraudulent intent is essential. The court observed that the defect in the former indictment was that there was no allegation of intent to defraud the persons directly dealt with or others who might obtain the counterfeit money. The court said: "It is further argued that the first count, which charges an intention to defraud persons unknown by subsequent circulation of the counterfeit money after its receipt by the persons to whom it was originally sent, is insufficient. It is urged that, as the person ordering counterfeit money would know what he was to get, he could not be defrauded. We think, however, that the allegation of the indictment as to defrauding others by the subsequent circulation of the counterfeit money brings it within the statute. It must always be borne in mind that the use of the mails in aid of schemes of spoliation is the thing sought to be prevented and punished. The allegation of the indictment was distinct that there was an intention to defraud those whom it was intended should obtain the counterfeit money from the postmasters to whom it was sent."

This decision, it will be seen, is in harmony with United States v. Jones, supra, and though criticized in Stockton v. United States, would seem to be based on sound reasoning.

It will thus be seen that Stockton v. United States, in holding that the offense was not within the statute where the scheme is to defraud persons other than the purchaser, is opposed to the majority of the prior decisions in that court. The court in the principal case said that until by appropriate amendment the scope of the statute is further expanded, it did not and cannot comprehend the situation as disclosed in the proofs of that case; and this would seem to be true, especially where the courts entirely overlook earlier decisions of the same court, and criticize other decisions which take a sound and sane view in the construction of the statute.

kindred articles, including those specified in the indictment. Catalogues, describing the goods and giving prices of the articles manufactured and offered to be sold, were issued and sent through the United States mail to customers, and persons, firms, and individuals to whom such merchandise might be sold.

It is undisputed that catalogues were sent to the two persons named in the indictment; that they contained detailed descriptions of loaded dice, marked playing cards, and other gambling equipment referred to in the indictment.

Argued before Baker and Kohlsaat, Circuit Judges, and Geiger, District Judge.

Messrs. Edward Maher and Bernhardt Frank, with C. S. O'Meara, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant manufactured and sold the devices, and was not a party to any intent to defraud others by the employment thereof.

The indictment expressly shows that both Moore and Nichols knew the nature of the articles advertised. There was, therefore, no fraudulent representation by the defendant.

There is no proof that the mails were used in the execution of a fraudulent scheme.

Federal Penal Code of 1910, § 215; United States v. McCrory, 175 Fed. 804; United States v. Clark, 121 Fed. 191; United States v. Ryan, 123 Fed. 636.

The devices are not within the statute, and the maxim of ejusdem generis does not embrace them.

United States v. Beach, 71 Fed. 161.

Messrs. Henry W. Freeman and Walter P. Steffen, with Mr. James H. Wilkerson, for the United States.

Geiger, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 215 of the Penal Code, so far as pertinent to the question presented, is as follows: "Whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, or for obtaining . . . shall, for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice, or attempting so to do, place, or cause to be placed, any letter, postal card, package, writing, circular, pamphlet, or advertisement, whether addressed to any person residing within or outside the United States," etc. [35 Stat. at L. 1130, chap. 321, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1653.]

It will be observed that the ingredients which go to make up the offense under this section are:

(1) A scheme or artifice to defraud which the accused has devised, or is intending to devise.

(2) The use of the mails for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice, or attempting to do so.

Assuming that marked cards and loaded dice may be—or are, almost exclusively—used to cheat or defraud in gambling, has the plaintiff in error, in selling or offering to sell to one knowingly desiring to purchase these articles at an agreed price, devised or intended to devise a scheme or artifice to defraud? Does he, by mailing a catalogue accurately descriptive of these articles and their prices, execute or attempt to execute such scheme or artifice? Without attempting comprehensively to define the language of the act, it is apparent that each of the words "devise," "scheme," and "artifice" embodies elements found in the other two. As understood in the law of crimes or torts, to "devise" conveys the idea of being devious, contriving, disingenuous; a "scheme," machination, intrigue, or plan whose appearance differs from the reality; an "artifice;" a trick, false pretense, or token. But the degree to which this conception of the language of the statute is satisfied is never material, nor does the first essential ingredient of the offense exist, unless the scheme or artifice devised or intended to be devised is one to defraud.

We start, as we must, with the concession that, although marked cards and loaded dice may be used, as stated, they are none the less lawful subjects of commerce. They may be manufactured, sold, and purchased. If, therefore, upon purchase and sale, the parties thereto understand precisely the subject-matter, and the seller proposes to and does give to the purchaser just what the latter wants,—even though it be gambling apparatus,—the transaction is an ordinary contract. The seller has neither devised nor executed a scheme or artifice. But the government, to sustain the indictment and conviction in the present case, seeks to impute or ascribe to the plaintiff in error the fraudulent intent of the purchaser or possessor of the gambling devices, and thereby charge a fraudulent scheme. Its claim is thus stated in the brief: "That Stockton, the defendant below, intended that the persons to be defrauded would engage in playing games of chance for money and other valuable consideration, with the persons to whom the catalogue described in the indictment was mailed, and that he planned, devised, and intended that these addressees should purchase from him (Stockton), and that he would sell them certain gambling devices, namely, loaded dice, marked playing cards, electro magnets, etc., by means of which the persons intended to be defrauded, while playing at games of chance with the possessors thereof, were to be defrauded of their money by being deprived of a fair and equal chance of winning in playing such games."

In other words, plaintiff in error by mailing the catalogue intended to induce Moore and Nichols to purchase gambling apparatus from him; if they purchased, he intended that they would engage persons at play and defraud them. Therefore he devised a scheme to defraud, because he intended to supply the instrumentality, i. e., marked cards, etc. Now, if plaintiff in error had, through personal solicitation, sold or offered to sell this apparatus to Moore and Nichols; or if they had called at his place of business and entered into and concluded negotiations with him, there would in each case be present every element disclosed in the indictment. The mailing of the catalogue is not an element of the scheme; the arbitrary allegation of the intention of plaintiff in error that Moore and Nichols would engage persons in play, etc., is in effect an allegation of knowledge on his part that such purchasers would put the apparatus to a use for which it was obviously intended; and it adds and can add nothing unless and until by appropriate averment of facts it appears that he was to be in some relation of confederacy or participation, beneficial or otherwise, in such use. The real scheme or artifice to defraud, if any, is that devised and perpetrated by the possessors of the apparatus when they use it. The actual intent of the plaintiff in error was coextensive only with his transaction in selling or offering to sell; and in case he sold—the subject-matter being disclosed and known—his whole intention and expectation would have been fully realized. His relation to the matter would have been at an end; and granting that Nichols and Moore would or might defraud persons as alleged in the indictment, they would not do so upon the prompting nor in obedience to any act or intention of the plaintiff in error. So, too, the defrauded victims could point to no act of, or circumstance affecting, plaintiff in error, in justifiable reliance whereon they could claim to have entered into a situation wherein he defrauded them. Therefore, to uphold the indictment by imputing to him the fraudulent design or acts of subsequent possessors of the gambling apparatus, without averment or proof of participation therein, would by construction enlarge the statute. The statute (except in the particulars to be noted) neither defines nor denounces, but aims only to punish using the mails in effectuating, what, without it, would still be schemes or artifices to defraud.

This application of the statute is quite conclusively demonstrated by the course of its amendment and construction respecting counterfeit money and transactions specifically enumerated. Prior to the amendment by act of March 2, 1889, chap 393, 25 Stat. at L. 873, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3696, the section under consideration was limited to forbidding the use of the mails to effectuate schemes or artifices to defraud; but by such amendment there was added, in the disjunctive, the particular specification, now found, denouncing schemes or artifices to sell or deal in counterfeit money, "paper goods," the "sawdust swindle," and the like. The Supreme Court, in passing upon the amended section, said: "The statute, in very words as well as in manifest intent, applies to any person who devises either a scheme to defraud, or a scheme to sell counterfeit money or counterfeit obligations of the United States, provided the scheme is intended to be effected, and is effected, by communications through the postoffice. This indictment charged, not a scheme to defraud, but a scheme to sell counterfeit obligations of the United States; and therefore no proof of a scheme to defraud was necessary to support it." Per Gray, Justice, Streep v. United States, 160 U. S. 128, 40 L. ed. 365, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244.

The distinction between cases now, but not formerly, comprehended by the statute, is thus stated by Judge Adams in Lemon v. United States, 90 C. C. A. 617, 164 Fed. 953: "There is an obvious difference between schemes to defraud and those to sell or deal in counterfeit money. The one necessarily involves a scheme to defraud some person or persons, while the other may or may not involve such scheme. It may be only a scheme to do an unlawful act in which all concerned knowingly participate. . . .

"The amendment of 1889, instead of limiting, expanded the operation of the statute. It brought within its comprehension, in addition to what was there before, the subject of dealing in counterfeit and spurious money and other articles there specified."

Prior to the amendment it therefore was possible for one person to communicate to another an undisguised offer to sell counterfeit money. It was not a scheme to defraud within the meaning of the act, although counterfeit money could be dealt in only in violation of law, and was universally recognized as a means to defraud. How much more clearly is this true of gambling devices which may be lawfully bought and sold. Were it not true, we would have the anomalous situation of permitting the sending of gambling devices themselves through the mail, but forbidding communications respecting them. The plaintiff in error, without objection on the part of the government, could have sent the loaded dice or marked cards through the mail to Nichols and Moore, but could not have sent a letter soliciting the purchase.

Counsel for the government urge the authority of Milby v. United States, 57 C. C. A. 21, 120 Fed. 1, in support of the indictment and conviction. The case will be examined in the light of an earlier determination (48 C. C. A. 574, 109 Fed. 643) by the same court, involving the same defendant. The facts were these: Milby was originally indicted for using the mails in attempting to sell counterfeit money. Demurrers were overruled, and motions in arrest of judgment denied. He was convicted. Upon appeal (48 C. C. A. 579, 109 Fed. 643), the indictment was held insufficient because the scheme was—"plainly a direct, undisguised proposition to sell counterfeit money.

. . . It is plainly evident," said the court, "from the course pursued in relation to the letter by the postmaster at Albany, Oregon, that he was left in no doubt or difficulty whatever as to the meaning and object of the proposition contained in the defendant's letter. If there was any misrepresentation, direct or indirect, or other facts and circumstances, which would constitute a scheme devised by the defendant to defraud Stites, the particulars in this respect are not given in this indictment. There is no averment to the effect that the defendant was not engaged in making counterfeit money, and in every way prepared to comply with his proposition if accepted. In what method and by what scheme was Stites to be deceived or defrauded, looking alone to the facts disclosed in this indictment? . . . Or, again, putting the transaction in a past aspect, if Stites had concluded to accept the proposition, and use the spurious money offered, and had sent money to the defendant, and received counterfeit money in return therefor at the agreed rate of exchange, in what respect would Stites have been defrauded or misled? In this last aspect of the case both the defendant and Stites would have committed an offense, but Stites would not have been defrauded or deceived. The proposition contained in the letter was entirely devoid of artfulness, and could not have been misunderstood in the ordinary case; and, as we have said, no exceptional circumstance or fact is alleged in the indictment."

It is to be noted that, although the case was decided many years after passage of the amendment of March 2, 1889, no reference is made to such amendment, nor to the case of Streep v. United States, supra, which definitely construed it as expanding the statute to comprehend situations not therefore within its terms, and comprehending precisely the accusation against Milby.

A new indictment, charging in several counts the subject-matter of the first prosecution, was then returned. After trial and conviction, the case was appealed, being reported as Milby v. United States, 57 C. C. A. 21, 120 Fed. 1, and now relied upon. It was urged that the first count, which charged an intention to defraud persons through subsequent circulation of the money, was insufficient. The court said: "It is further argued that the first count, which charges an intention to defraud persons unknown by subsequent circulation of the counterfeit money after its receipt by the persons to whom it was originally sent, is insufficient. It is urged that, as the person ordering counterfeit money would know what he was to get, he could not be defrauded. We think, however, that the allegation of the indictment as to defrauding others by the subsequent circulation of the counterfeit money brings it within the statute. It must always be borne in mind that the use of the mails in aid of schemes of spoilation is the thing sought to be prevented and punished."

But the court further held that, even if defendant's contentions were sound, the count was sufficient as charging an offense within the amendment, and the conviction was sustained because other sufficient counts of the indictment were covered by the proofs and a verdict of guilty. However, the infirmity of the position taken in the language quoted is this: It is always possible to impute to a seller knowledge, and (in an inaccurate sense) an intention, that an article sold may be put to uses for which it is obviously intended. Hence, if the wrongful intent or scheme of the purchaser of counterfeit money could be ascribed to the seller as his scheme, there would have been no necessity for amending the statute. The sale, or offer to sell, would be a devising, and the scheme or artifice could always be charged and found, solely upon the inherent character of counterfeit money.

The views which we have expressed respecting the scope of the statute and its application to the indictment render unnecessary extended discussion of the facts established by the testimony. The plaintiff in error mailed the catalogues which were descriptive of the articles in his possession and described in the indictment. He sustained no relations toward Moore and Nichols, the addressees, other than such as arose through a desire to sell to them articles described in the catalogue. Until, by appropriate amendment, the scope of the statute is further expanded, it does not and cannot comprehend the situation thus disclosed in the proofs; and neither the indictment nor such proof shows either a scheme or artifice to defraud devised by the plaintiff in error, nor an execution or attempted execution thereof by him, through the use of the mails.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the indictment, and to discharge the defendant.

Writ — service on corporation — leaving with officer in other state.

1. A provision for service of process on a domestic corporation by delivering it to an officer of the corporation while he is in another state where he resides does not deprive the corporation of due process of law. Statute — construction — legislative declaration — effect.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Davis, Lyon, & Gates, for appellant:

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order of the circuit court of Lyman county denying defendant's motion to vacate a judgment against appellant. The complaint in the action alleges the breach of an agreement by defendant to sell and convey to plaintiff certain farm lands situated in Lyman county, and demands damages in the sum of $300, with interest. The defendant is a domestic corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state. The summons and complaint were served by one Phillips, a deputy sheriff of Lyon county, Iowa, by delivering to and leaving the same with one Charles Shade, the treasurer of said corporation, a resident of Lyon county, Iowa, on the 7th day of February, 1908, in Lyon county, Iowa. No appearance or answer was made in the action, and the summons, complaint, and return of service, as stated, were filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Lyman county, February 26, 1910, and on March 15, 1910, judgment was entered against the defendant corporation in the sum of $403.95, damages and costs. Thereafter, on the 21st day of August, 1911, defendant appearing specially moved the court, upon affidavit and the files and records of the court, to set aside and vacate the alleged pretended judgment, upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to enter the same. The affidavit accompanying the motion discloses the mode of service as indicated; that there was no affidavit or order for publication of summons; and that no other service was made or attempted than as above stated, and no appearance made in the action by defendant, or by anyone in its behalf. In resistance of the motion plaintiff's counsel filed an affidavit of M. A. Brown, stating that summons was issued in said cause on January 8, 1908, and an attempt made to serve the same upon officers of said corporation, residents of this state; whereupon it was disclosed that all the resident officers of said corporation had resigned, and that Charles Shade, the treasurer, was a resident of and in Lyon county, Iowa; whereupon service was made upon him, as stated. Upon the hearing an order was entered, denying defendant's motion to vacate the judgment, to which ruling defendant excepted, and has brought the action to this court for review, alleging error in the denial of the motion to vacate the judgment.

It is appellant's contention that service of the summons upon an officer designated by statute as one of the officers upon whom service of process may be had, but who resides and is served outside of the state, does not constitute due process of law in an action against a domestic corporation, so as to authorize a judgment for damages against such corporation.

It is respondent's contention, on the other hand, that § 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes such service in an action against a domestic corporation, and that such service constitutes due process of law. Section 110 provides: "The summons shall be served by delivering a copy thereof as follows: 1. If the action be against a private corporation, to the president or other head of the corporation, secretary, cashier, treasurer, a director or managing agent thereof; but such service can be made in respect to a foreign corporation only when it has property in this state, or the cause of action arose therein, or when such service shall be made within this state personally upon the president, treasurer, secretary, or duly authorized agent thereof. . . . Service made in any of the modes provided in this section shall be taken and held to be personal service. . . ."

None of the other provisions of the section affect the question involved in this appeal. It seems plain to us that the clauses of the section above quoted are intended to distinguish broadly between domestic and foreign corporations as to the mode of service of summons. It will be observed that as to domestic corporations service may be made upon "the president or other head of the corporation, the secretary, cashier, treasurer, a director or managing agent thereof;" while as to foreign corporations such service can only be made upon "the president, treasurer, secretary, or duly authorized agent thereof." The section also expressly provides that as to foreign corporations such service shall be made within this state, personally, upon the officers named; while as to domestic corporations the statute does not say that service shall be made within the state. It is almost universally held that service of process within the state upon officers of a foreign corporation, pursuant to statutory enactments, is sufficient to bring the foreign corporation within the jurisdiction of the state court, and to authorize the entry of judgment against such corporation in any case; and such statutes are upheld by an overwhelming weight of authority.

If service upon an officer of a foreign corporation within this state may be deemed due process of law, we see no reason why service of process upon an officer of a domestic corporation residing in a foreign state may not likewise be deemed due process as well. A domestic corporation is necessarily resident within the state, and cannot remove itself therefrom, either permanently or temporarily. Such corporation is at all times to be deemed an inhabitant of the state, and never beyond the territorial jurisdiction of its courts. A natural person may voluntarily remove from the state, either temporarily or permanently. Where the removal is temporary, the statute prescribes a mode in which process may be served and jurisdiction of the absent defendant obtained by leaving a copy of the summons at the usual dwelling place, with a member of the family over fourteen years of age,—a mode of substituted service. Such service is upheld by the courts, upon the theory that it is reasonably designed to give the defendant notice of the proceeding in court and an opportunity to be heard in defense of the action. A corporation is an artificial person, and can be served with process only through its agents. The statute does not say that service of the summons upon a domestic corporation shall be made within the state; and upon principle we see no reason for adding such limitation by construction. Such a corporation is at all times within the territorial jurisdiction of the state courts, and service upon its agents or officers designated by the statute, without the state, is as reasonably certain to convey notice of the pendency of the action as would like service upon the same officer within the state. The theory of such statutes is that any of the officers designated, when so served, will take proper and necessary steps to protect the interests of the corporation in the pending proceeding. It appears to have been held at common law that jurisdiction of a corporation could not be acquired by service of process on its officers outside of the state which gave it existence. M'Queen v. Middleton Mfg. Co. 16 Johns. 6; Barnett v. Chicago & L. H. R. Co. 4 Hun, 114; Peckham v. Haverhill, 16 Pick. 286. In almost all if not in every state of the Union, statutes have been enacted which provide that if a foreign corporation engages in business in the state it will be suable there in regard to such business; and service within the state on its officers designated by statute is sufficient to bring the corporation within the jurisdiction of the state courts. Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 24 N. J. L. 234; Bawknight v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 55 Ga. 195; National Bank v. Huntington, 129 Mass. 444; Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369, 24 L. ed. 853; Hagerman v. Empire State Co. 97 Pa. 534; McNichol v. United States Mercantile Reporting Agency, 74 Mo. 457. The latter case also holds that such service may become the basis of a judgment in personam. Hinckley v. Kettle River R. Co. 70 Minn. 105, 72 N. W. 835; Clearwater Mercantile Co. v. Roberts, J. & R. Shoe Co. 51 Fla. 176, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 117, 120 Am. St. Rep. 153, 40 So. 436. In the latter cases it is held that if the mode of service provided in the statute is, under the circumstances, reasonable and appropriate to the case, it is "due process of law," and, as to a resident of the state, will give jurisdiction of the person and support a personal judgment. It is also held that due process of law does not require that there be actual personal notice to the party whose property is in question. It is sufficient if a kind of notice is provided by which it is reasonably probable that the party proceeded against will be apprised of what is going on against him, and an op-

The purpose of such a statute is not to bring the nonresident officer of the corporation within the jurisdiction of the court, but to bring the domestic corporation within its jurisdiction. It does not seek to have the process of the court affect the personal or property rights of a person or corporation resident in another state; and therefore is not an attempt to extend the process of the court beyond the territorial limits of the state within which it is established. It follows that the only question really involved is whether or not such service constitutes due process of law within the state. The fundamental principle involved in "due process of law" is that it shall give sufficient notice of the pendency of the action or proceeding, and a reasonable opportunity to a defendant to appear and assert his rights before a tribunal legally constituted to adjudicate such rights. And whenever a statutory mode of service is reasonably designed to accomplish that end service in accordance therewith constitutes due process of law, and confers jurisdiction on the state court.

Counsel for appellant note the fact that chap. 226, Laws of 1911, being an amendment to § 110, Code Civ. Proc. provides that service on a domestic corporation may be made by delivering a copy to a designated officer of the corporation, "either within or without the state," and urge that this enactment is a legislative recognition of the insufficiency of the existing statute to authorize such service. A legislative declaration as to the construction to be given a previous statute is not conclusive or binding on the courts. The amendment, however, may be regarded as an express legislative adoption of the principle announced in this decision as to what constitutes due process of law. No question of discretion is involved in the ruling of the trial court. It is not alleged that the defendant corporation did not receive notice of the pendency of the action, nor that it has a good defense thereto. We are clearly of opinion respondent is right in his contention, and that the principle underlying the decisions in Clearwater Mercantile Co. v. Roberts, J. & R. Shoe Co. and Hinckley v. Kettle River Co. supra, and the cases there cited, is controlling in this case.

The order and judgment of the trial court are therefore affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Smith, J., on May 24, 1913, handed down the following additional opinion (— S. D. —, 141 N. W. 979):

This cause is before us on rehearing, which was granted and a reargument permitted because of the importance and novelty of the main question involved. The original opinion is reported, in — S. D. —, ante, 941, 138 N. W. 959. We are not disposed to change the views there expressed as to the interpretation of the provisions of § 110, Code Civ. Proc. This statute by necessary implication divides corporations into two general classes,—domestic and foreign. It also distinguishes certain classes of cases in which service may be made on foreign corporations. As to this class of corporations, service can be made only: (1) When the corporation has property in the state; (2) when the cause of action arose in the state; or (3) when such service shall be made in this state personally, upon some one of four of its officers named in the statute. It would seem also, under the first clause of the statute, it was intended that when a foreign corporation has property in this state, or the cause of action arose therein, service may be made upon any one of the six officers named in the statute, either within or without the state; but that question is not before us, and we do not decide it. Necessarily, all corporations not embraced within the limitations applying to foreign corporations are domestic corporations. The provisions of the statute as to property within the state, that the cause of action arose in the state, or that service must be made within the state, have no application to domestic corporations. We think, as to domestic corporations, the statute was intended to authorize service, either within or without the state, upon any one of the six officers or agents named in the statute.

The important and crucial question is, as stated in appellant's brief on rehearing, whether the service thus authorized, constitutes "due process of law." In a discussion of this question, it must be borne in mind that a domestic corporation is always, not only a resident of the state, but is at all times within the state, and cannot be absent therefrom even temporarily. The real question, then, is whether the mode of service provided by this statute upon a corporation, resident of and at all times within the state, constitutes "due process of law." The case before us, we think, is distinguishable from a case where a natural person, either resident or nonresident, is attempted to be served with process without the boundaries of the state. It seems to us that appellant's counsel has failed to distinguish between "process" as a writ, and "due process of law." The question is not whether "process" may be served upon a person outside the boundaries and jurisdiction of the state, but whether service upon a domestic corporation, a resident of and within the state, by delivery of a summons to one of its officers named in the statute, outside the state, constitutes "due process of law." Appellant, in its brief on rehearing, says: "We concede to the fullest extent the doctrine of the (former) opinion in this case, that a state has the right to prescribe the method of service upon its own citizens, and that the method of service adopted by the legislature, whatever it may be, if personally (properly) designed to give notice to the defendant, is sufficient to support a personal judgment."

The statement of counsel makes it unnecessary to refer to the authorities which discuss generally and establish this doctrine. But counsel in their brief further say: "The power of the state to designate the method of service of process is, however, subject to a very well-defined restriction. The power must be exercised within the territorial limits of the state."

Counsel found this supposed restriction upon the universally recognized doctrine that a state cannot send its process over a state line and thus make its laws operative in another jurisdiction. A moment's reflection, we think, will make it clear that this statement of an alleged exception or restriction is inaccurate. As an approximately correct statement, it may be said that the power to proceed under a state statute, prescribing a particular mode of service as to citizens of the state, can only be constitutionally exercised when the citizen is within the territorial limits of the state. Thus stated, we think the rule is sustained by practically all the authorities. But statutes may be found under which it has been contended, by reason of the general rule as stated by appellant's counsel, that a state may authorize service of process upon its own citizens outside its territorial jurisdiction. This view could only be sustained, if at all, upon the theory that a citizen of the state is always constructively within its boundaries and subject to its laws. A statute seemingly enacting this principle is discussed by Justice McLain, in Raher v. Raher, 150 Iowa, 511, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 292, 129 N. W. 494, Ann. Cas. 1912 D, 694. In that case, service was made in South Dakota, on the defendant Raher, who was at the time a resident and citizen of Iowa. It was contended that service outside the state of Iowa was valid, because authorized by the laws of that state and because Raher was a citi-

man or resident of that state. Justice McLean said: "The precise question involved in this case is absolutely without precedent in this or any other state in the Union." He reaches the conclusion that the statute authorizing such service is unconstitutional, both under the state and Federal Constitutions.

We have no criticism to offer, either as to the reasoning or the final conclusion in that case; but we think it has no application to the case before us, because not only was the service made outside the state, but the defendant himself was outside the state at the time of service. In the Raher Case, it was held that such service did not constitute "due process of law," and therefore the statute authorizing it was unconstitutional. But what constitutes due process of law, as to a citizen within the state, is a different question, and we think is settled by the authorities. It may be conceded that no person, resident or nonresident of the state, can be required by service of process or notice in a foreign state to appear and defend in the courts of the state from which such notice or process issues, except in those cases in which the impending action is intended to affect property or status of such person already within the jurisdiction of the state or its courts. The exception is founded upon the theory that, while the process or writ of the state court cannot reach a person outside the state, it can reach his property which is within the state. But even in this class of cases, the procedure is unconstitutional unless it is such as to constitute "due process of law." It is essential to due process of law in such cases that some method of service of notice be provided, reasonably designed to reach the defendant, and that an opportunity be offered him to appear and defend. It is not the fact alone that property of the absent defendant is within the state, or is seized under a writ of process of the state court, that constitutes due process of law. It is the notice, and opportunity to appear and defend provided by the statute, which constitutes such process.

In Carter v. Frahm, — S. D. —, 141 N. W. 373, this court quoted with approval the language in Freeman on Judgments, § 611, where it is said: "The mere seizure of property does not confer jurisdiction upon the court to proceed to judgment. To this end, some notification of the proceedings, beyond that arising from seizure, prescribing the time within which the appearance must be made, is essential. Such notification is usually made by publication in some form. The manner of notification is immaterial, but the notification itself is indispensable." (The italics are ours.)

necessary to sustain the proposition that such notice as is required to constitute "due process of law" when a person or a foreign corporation has property within the state may be served outside the state. The notice thus required is not, in itself, due process of law; it is merely one of its essential parts. The fact that the notice in this class of cases may be served outside the state is alone sufficient, we think, to demonstrate the fallacy of appellant's contention,—that the notice essential to due process of law as against our own citizens within the state cannot be served or given outside the state boundaries. It is apparent that the cases cited by appellant, which hold that a judgment in personam cannot be entered upon service outside the state upon either residents or nonresidents, of either notice or process, have no application to the case before us. In this case, we are dealing with a resident of the state which never was and never can be outside its boundary lines. The constitutional limitation as to persons without the state does not apply to persons actually within its boundaries. As to persons within the state, the only constitutional restriction is that they shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. As to this limitation, no distinction exists between actions in rem and actions in personam. The only question is whether the procedure provided by the statute is such as to constitute due process of law. If service of summons outside the state, upon a non-resident who has property in the state, is sufficient notice to afford an opportunity to appear and defend against the taking of its property, we see no reason for holding that, as to a domestic corporation, a like service upon its agent or officer, outside the state, is not likewise sufficient to constitute due process of law. We think the rule is that, when a citizen of the state is within its territorial jurisdiction, the state may authorize any mode of service reasonably designed and calculated to give him notice of the judicial proceeding impending, and to afford him a reasonable opportunity to defend in its courts, and any statutory mode of service which fulfils these requirements affords "due process of law."

In some cases, the courts, while recognizing the authority of the legislature to prescribe the mode of service as to citizens within the state, have held that the service prescribed by a particular statute was not due process of law, because not reasonably calculated to bring notice of the commencement of the action home to the defendant. Pinney v. Providence Loan & Invest. Co. 106 Wis. 396, 50 L.R.A. 577, 80 Am. St. Rep. 41, 82 N. W. 308.

197, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1186, 116 Am. St. Rep. 133, 80 N. E. 109, a case not before referred to, was an action on the case against a domestic corporation of the state of Illinois. The statute of that state in substance provides that, when the sheriff makes return upon the summons that the defendant company has no officer or agent upon whom summons can be served in the county, service may be made by publication and mailing. This statute was attacked as unconstitutional. The court said: "In this case actual service could not be had upon the defendant, although the suit was properly brought in the court from which the process was issued and the defendant was a resident of and was in the state, and the question here is narrowed to this: Can the legislature provide a constructive or substituted service of process by publication and mail, in lieu of actual service of process, in a case where the process cannot be actually served upon the defendant in the county where the statute expressly authorizes the suit to be commenced, although the defendant resides and is in the state? . . . While the authorities are not in entire harmony upon the subject, the Illinois cases and the greater weight of authority clearly establish, we think, the proposition that a personal judgment in an action at law may be rendered against a defendant residing in and who is in the state where the suit or proceeding is pending, who has been notified of the pendency of the suit by constructive service of process, where it appears actual service of process could not be had upon the defendant, if the constructive service provided for was required to be had in such manner that the reasonable probabilities were that the defendant would receive notice of the pending action or proceeding before judgment or decree was rendered against him." The statute was held constitutional.

A similar statute was sustained in the case of Clearwater Mercantile Co. v. Roberts, J. & R. Shoe Co. 51 Fla. 176, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 117, 120 Am. St. Rep. 153, 40 So. 436, in an action in personam. In that case the appeal was from the denial of a motion to vacate a personal judgment against a domestic corporation upon default. It was admitted that service was in accordance with the statute. The court said: "The fundamental object of all laws relating to service of process is to give that notice which will, in the nature of things, most likely bring the attention of the corporation to commencement of the proceedings against it, and, when the legislature carries out this clear design, it should not be stricken down by the courts."

had no officer in the state upon whom service of process could be made, an action might be commenced in any county where the cause of action arose, by depositing a copy of the summons, writ, or other process or citation in the office of the secretary of state, which should be deemed and treated as personal service on such corporation. The statute was assailed as unconstitutional, because such service was not due process of law. The court says: "If the mode of service provided for is, under the circumstances, reasonable and appropriate to the case, it is 'due process of law,' and, as to citizens and residents of the state, will give jurisdiction of the person, and support a personal judgment against them, although they were not served in person. Freeman, Judgm. § 127. There is no class of cases where there is greater necessity . . . for service in person than where domestic corporations have no officers who can be found in the state upon whom to make service of process; and we can conceive of no other form of service which would in such cases be more appropriate and more likely to communicate notice of the commencement of the action to the corporation, than the one provided in this statute." Hinckley v. Kettle River R. Co. 70 Minn. 110, 72 N. W. 836.

In their brief on rehearing, appellant's counsel attempt to distinguish the Florida and Minnesota cases, upon the ground that in neither case did the statute declare that the notice might be given or any act done outside the boundaries of the state. No authority is cited to sustain this contention, and, as suggested in our former opinion, we see no reason for holding that service, sufficient in itself to comply with the requirement of notice as one of the elements of due process of law, when made outside the state upon the proper officer or agent of a domestic corporation, is not due process of law. The essential thing is that the notice required be given or served in such manner as to afford a reasonable probability that it will reach the defendant who is within the state. That a notice personally served upon an agent of a domestic corporation outside the state would be less likely to reach the corporation within the state than would a notice filed with the secretary of state or published in some newspaper in the state would seem unreasonable.

We are of opinion that the statute, as we have construed it, should be held to provide due process of law as to a domestic corporation, and that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. E. RAY, Guardian of John H. Ray,
v.
ELMER YOUNG, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 142 N. W. 393.)

Fixtures — repair shop — right to remove.

1. A frame building covering 30 by 50 feet of space, erected by a tenant on the Note. — Termination of estate of uncertain duration as affecting right of sublessee to remove trade fixtures.

Under the general rule that where the lessee's term is for an indefinite period, as at the will of the landlord, the former has a reasonable time after its expiration in which to remove his fixtures (19 Cyc. 1068), it would seem reasonably to follow that he should have the same privilege where the uncertainty of duration characterizes his lessor's estate, rather than his own.

This is the rule laid down in RAY v. YOUNG, where it was held that the right of the lessee of a life tenant to remove trade fixtures from the leased premises does not terminate immediately by virtue of the death of his lessor, but that he is entitled to a reasonable time thereafter in which to remove such fixtures.

So, where the owner of premises went abroad for an indefinite period, and left an agent in charge "while he was gone" to make the premises pay the best way he could, and the agent leased the premises for a term of years, it was held that the return of the owner terminated the agency, and that his demand of the premises terminated the tenancy, but that the lessee had a reasonable time thereafter in which to remove his fixtures. Antoni v. Belknap, 102 Mass. 193.

And in Oakley v. Monck, L. R. 1 Exch. 159, 4 Hurlst. & C. 251, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 87, 12 Jur. N. S. 213, 14 L. T. N. S. 20, 14 Week. Rep. 406, it was said that where a tenant for life leases premises to another with the stipulation that all fruit trees and shrubs planted by such sublessee during his term and remaining on the premises at the expiration of the lease shall be taken by the landlord at a valuation, if the landlord dies the tenant may either call on his executors to take the trees at a valuation, or he may exercise the ordinary right of a tenant holding an uncertain interest to remove within a reasonable time such fixtures as in the trade of a nurseryman are in the nature of trade fixtures. In that case, the tenant took neither course, but remained in possession, paying rent to the next succeeding proprietor, and it was held that such proprietor was not thereby bound by the special stipulation in the original lease not known to him.

leased property, which is placed on a cement foundation and is connected by a shed with the building on the lot when the lease was taken, and which is used as a garage and repair shop, may be removed at the end of the term as a trade fixture if it can be done without injury to the premises.

Life tenant — lessee — right to remove trade fixtures.

2. The right of a lessee of a life tenant to remove his trade fixtures from a leasehold does not terminate instantly upon the death of the life tenant, but he has a rea-

But it has been held that a tenant for life cannot, by contract with his tenant, bind the remainderman so as to authorize the subtenant after the termination of the life estate to remove structures which, but for such contract, would in law constitute a permanent accession to the estate. White v. Arndt, 1 Whart. 91 (stable); Haflick v. Stober, 11 Ohio St. 482 (barn).

In Haflick v. Stober, supra, it was said that the right of a sublessee of a tenant who holds for an uncertain period to remove fixtures after the expiration of such tenancy must be confined to such fixtures as the sublessee would be entitled to remove as a matter of legal right without reference to any contract on the subject.

Again, on the falling in of the particular estate, the remainderman is entitled to all the improvements which the law denominates fixtures, without regard to the manner in which they are constructed, the persons who may have erected them, or whether they may contribute to enhance the value of the property or not. It is not competent for the life tenant and the subtenant to make an agreement which affects the inheritance, without the assent of the remainderman. And without such assent, fixtures or permanent improvements cannot be removed after the termination of the life estate. White v. Arndt, supra; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975.

And the termination of the life estate also terminates the interest of the lessee of the life tenant, and thereupon the remainderman becomes entitled to the property with all improvements thereon, and a frame building erected by such lessee cannot thereafter be removed by him, especially where the remainderman expressly refuses to join in the lease and where the building was erected against his will. Jones v. Shufflin, supra.

And Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538, 5 So. 387, is authority for the proposition that one who holds land under conveyance from a life tenant must be presumed to know the nature and duration of his estate, and that upon the termination of the life estate the land must go to the remainderman, with all permanent improvements erected thereon by the subgrantee, and that in such case the latter is not entitled to compensation there-

3. Delay of a tenant to remove the fixtures after termination of the lease does not become unreasonable while negotiations for the renewal of the lease are pending.

4. Failure to reserve right to remove fixtures when renewing a lease does not work an abandonment of them to the landlord.

(July 2, 1913.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the District Court for Linn County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendant from removing a building which had been erected by him on premises which he occupied as tenant. Reversed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

Suit in equity on behalf of the owner of real estate to enjoin a tenant from removing a building therefrom which had been erected by the tenant thereon during his tenancy. The defendant tenant was the lessee of Mrs. L. E. Ray, who subsequently died and who owned a life estate only in the premises, although this latter fact was not known to the defendant at the time of his lease. The defendant entered upon the premises in November, 1909, under a written lease which permitted him to erect a building thereon with the right of removal thereof. He erected his building and continued in possession until after the death of his lessor. He thereupon proceeded to remove the building. The plaintiff, as remainderman, brought this action by his guardian to restrain such removal. There was a decree for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Mr. J. H. Preston, for appellant:

When the building in controversy was erected by appellant, it, by express agreement between landlord and tenant, was personal property.

Mickle v. Douglas, 75 Iowa, 78, 39 N. W. 198, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 137; McCarthy v. Trumacher, 108 Iowa, 284, 79 N. W. 1104; Union Terminal Co. v. Wilmar & S. F. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 392, 90 N. W. 92; Daly v. Simonson, 126 Iowa, 720, 102 N. W. 780.

When the improvements are placed on the land by the tenant under a lease authorizing him to remove the same, he does not lose his right thereto by taking a lease from a subsequent purchaser while in possession, which failed to reserve the same.

Daly v. Simonson, 126 Iowa, 719, 102 N. W. 780; 25 Cyc. 1103.

Messrs. Deacon, Good, Sargent, & Spangler, for appellee:

At the expiration of a life tenancy the remainderman is entitled to the property with all the improvements thereon.

Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538, 5 So. 387; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975; Booth v. Booth, 114 Iowa, 79, 86 N. W. 51.

Any agreement made by a life tenant with his lessee in reference to removing buildings placed on the land by said lessee does not bind the remainderman or the person holding the reversionary interest.

Haffick v. Stober, 11 Ohio St. 484; White v. Arndt, 1 Whart. 91.

Buildings placed on land by a tenant, under an agreement with a life tenant that the same can be removed, must be removed, if at all, during the life of the life tenant, and not afterward.

Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975; Haffick v. Stover, 11 Ohio St. 484; White v. Arndt, 1 Whart. 91; Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301.

A tenant must take notice of his landlord's title, and if he erects improvements on a life estate he does so at his own risk, as he cannot charge the remainderman therefor or remove them.

Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538, 5 So. 387; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the great grandson of the former husband of Mrs. L. E. Ray. Some years before the lease in question Mrs. Ray and her husband had conveyed the real estate involved herein to the plaintiff, subject to a life estate therein in favor of Mrs. Ray, and such conveyance appeared of record. The property so conveyed consisted of a lot in the town of Palo, Linn county, and a small and old building thereon 16 by 24 in dimensions. The negotiations between the parties to the lease began with the following letter dated October 17, 1909, from Mrs. Ray to the defendant Young.

Mr. Young,

Kind Friend:

I received a letter from Ed Sisley to-day in regard to renting of the shop on the corner and the lot. I will say do you not think 3 dollars is a small sum per month. I think that I ought to get 4 dollars per month out of it, by paying the tax out of it. If you wish to have it at that price you can have it as long as you want it with the privilege of removing the part you put on when the lease expires. I will see my brother Ed he lives at Walkerton to write up a lease to that effect as soon as I can, if everything is all right with you. I hope this will be satisfactory to you. Mr. Young my address is 820 East Washington street. Hoping to hear from you soon.

If you want it at that price you can commence it to-morrow and take possession at once and I shall see that the lease is coming all right.

Later a written lease was executed under date of November 1, 1909, by which the premises were leased to the defendant for the term of one year, with the privilege of five, for the sum of $48 per year in advance. Such lease contained the following provision: "Mr. Elmer Young having the privilege of adding to this building and removing the same at the expiration of the lease." Young went into possession and built a building on the premises "30x50" and connected the same with the old building, as will be indicated later. The purpose of the building was for use as garage and repair shop, and it was so used during the entire tenancy of the defendant. The defendant continued in possession of the premises under the lease until the death of Mrs. Ray, which occurred June 8, 1911. He had previously paid the rent in advance to January, 1912. He continued in possession of the premises throughout the year 1911 with the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiff and his guardian. There is some dispute at this point between the parties, which will be considered later, as to what the understanding between them was during this continued occupancy after the death of Mrs. Ray. But it is undisputed that such occupancy did continue with the consent of the plaintiff. There were in the meantime negotiations between the parties, looking to a new lease; the plaintiff, however, demanding a larger rental. On January 3, 1912, the defendant, while preparing to remove his building, was served with a temporary writ of injunction issued herein. The injunction was made perpetual upon final decree. The effect thereof is to wholly deprive the defendant of all right of property in his building.

The equity of good conscience is not with the plaintiff in this case. If he is entitled to the decree awarded below, it must be upon the ground of absolute legal right unaffected by equitable considerations. The argument on behalf of the plaintiff is that he is not bound by the terms of the contract between the defendant and his lessor; that the rights of the defendant under his contract terminated with the death of such lessor; that the death of such lessor terminated not only the defendant's right of occupancy, but his right of removal of the building; that the right of removal provided for by the terms of the lease could only be exercised during the term of the tenancy; and that at the death of the lessor the building passed to the remainderman as a part of the real estate. It is also contended that after the death of the lessor the defendant entered into a new oral lease with the plaintiff, and that he became thereby estopped from claiming ownership of the building. We will consider these contentions in the order stated.

It must be conceded that the terms of the contract between the defendant and his lessor are not binding as such upon the plaintiff as remainderman. Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538, 5 So. 387; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975. This contract can be considered only as bearing upon the rights of the defendant as they were up to the time of the death of his lessor. It is the contention of the plaintiff that such contract cannot be considered for any purpose. In view of such contention, we may as well inquire first whether, independent of the provision of the contract for the right of removal, the defendant had a right as between him and his lessor to remove the building erected by him. And this depends upon the further question whether or not the building should be classified as a trade fixture.

The following testimony of the witness Hall is the only consistent and intelligible description of the property which we find in the record:

I live in Palo and am a carpenter by occupation; I assisted in building the building for Mr. Young on the lot in controversy; he employed me to do so. I am familiar with the whole of the building as it now stands. The old building was one story, 16x24, facing south; it was moved back about 60 feet, turned around so it faces the side street to the west. There was a shed addition on the east end to make it come out even with the new building. There is 12 feet of space between the old building and the new one; the new building was built 30x50 and then gabled up with a kind of quarter pitch roof, then this was shedded down to the old one in between the full width of the building. There was cement floors over the whole thing, the old ones and the new. It was used as a garage and blacksmith shop; before the old building was moved it was down to the ground and had no foundation under it; then it was moved back with a cement foundation under it; after it was moved back I helped to tear the floor out; the joists were all pretty near gone; wasn't any good at all. The sills were old; the pine floor held it together; that floor was taken out and a cement one put in.

Cross-examination:

The new part of the building was frame 2x6 2 feet apart and 10 feet high, rafters 2 feet apart covered with shiplap or drop-siding. It wasn't plastered inside; the roof was a common, ordinary roof, rubberoid. It ran back about 50 feet from the front to the rear, and then the roof sloped off for the last 12 feet and shedded down to the old building. It had a cement floor, which extended from the back end of the old part to the front end of the new part. The sills to the new building ran back 62 feet; the shed was connected round the rear end of the old building the same as one of those barns you have in the country with the cowshed built on the side.

By the Court:

Q. Was that 12 feet cut off from the 50 feet by partition and doors?

A. Yes, you see it was a building 30x50, and then that was sided up just like a barn, and just left two big doors, and then a shed built on that, and it left in there another room; all that there was between there was two big double doors. There was nothing between the 12-foot room and the old building. The 12-foot room is as long as the old room east and west. The shed points down to the eaves of the old building and carries the water off to the eastward. There was no new roof on the old building put on at the time this addition was built; it had a shingle roof. The foundation of the new building is cement. The floor stands on top of the cement. I saw them putting in some filling in the old building, —dirt taken from the northerly end of the lot, except some sand they hauled from the river. There used to be an old barn on the north of the lot, and what they call a rivulet comes down there; it always fills in there with water; it was always lower down there. It is about 30 feet from the north side of the old building to the north end of the lot.

Defendant rests.

Without dispute the building was built and used for garage and repair-shop purposes. The following excerpts from the authorities is a sufficient indication of the general rules concerning the definition of trade fixtures. "The question as to what particular articles erected by a tenant on the demised premises in relation to his trade come within the protection of the law as being trade fixtures, and hence removable by the tenant at the expiration of his term, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

gives rise to a great variety of considerations as to the nature of the article, its use, the degree of annexation, etc. Such annexations may consist of articles of machinery, utensils, etc., of a perfect chattel nature before annexation was made, and capable of detachment and use elsewhere in connection with other realty; or the articles annexed may consist of buildings, etc., of a more or less substantial and permanent nature, more or less capable of removal and reconstruction, and which having been constructed upon the land, have hitherto had no existence as integral chattels, except in connection with the land whereon they stand." Ewell, Fixtures, 2d ed. p. 139.

"Since the strict application of the rule that things annexed to the land, although at the time of annexation belonging to a person other than the owner of the land, become a part of the land, would operate to give to the landlord all articles annexed by the tenant for the better enjoyment of the premises, and so tend to prevent the making of improvements by him and the most beneficial utilization of the premises, the rule has been subjected to considerable relaxations in the tenant's favor, and certain classes of articles, although of such character and so affixed that, as between persons in other relations, they would be treated as permanent annexations, are ordinarily removable by him.

"There are occasional statements to be found to the effect that all annexations made by the tenant for the better enjoyment of the premises are removable by him, but these are not in accord with the weight of authority, which is substantially that the tenant's rights of removal are restricted to: (1) Trade fixtures; (2) domestic and ornamental fixtures; and by some decisions (3) agricultural fixtures. These various classes of fixtures and the tenant's rights in reference thereto will be considered in the above order.

"The exceptional right of the tenant to remove fixtures annexed for the purpose of trade was, in a quite early case, stated to exist 'in favor of trade and to encourage industry,' and that seems the logical ground on which to base it. Occasionally it is said to be based on the presumption of an intention on the part of the tenant subsequently to remove the article, but there appears no more reason for such a presumption when the annexation is for purposes of trade than when it is for any other purpose.

"As before remarked, it is a reasonable presumption that in every case of an annexation by a tenant having an estate of limited duration, he intends, if possible to remove the article annexed upon the termination of his interest; but such an intention should not, it seems, affect the rights of the remainderman or reversioner. Occasionally, moreover, the court seems to have regarded the question whether a particular article is a trade fixture, for the purposes of the rule, as dependent upon whether the tenant intended it to be a trade fixture. But whether an article is a trade fixture is, it is conceived, in no way a question whether it was intended so to be, there usually, indeed, being no intention in this regard; but it is rather a question whether, so far as appears from the nature of the article and the mode in which the premises were utilized, it was annexed for the purpose of aiding in the conduct of a trade.

"The determination of the question whether a particular article or structure comes within the rule, as being evidently annexed by the tenant to aid in the carrying on of his trade or business, seems to involve but little difficulty. There have, however, been numerous adjudications upon the subject, and engines and boilers, industrial machinery, and apparatus of various kinds, appliances annexed by the proprietor of a place of public entertainment or amusement, buildings, or parts of a building, and even plants grown by a nurseryman, have all been regarded as trade fixtures in particular cases and as therefore removable. Generally, it seems, an article so annexed as to be part of the realty is a trade fixture if the purpose of the annexation was to aid in the conduct of a calling exercised for the purpose of pecuniary profit, provided this calling is not exclusively agricultural in its nature; and the fact that the article has also the qualities of a domestic or agricultural fixture is immaterial in this respect." 2 Tiffany, Land. & T. pp. 1570-1574.

Beyond question the building under consideration in this case was built by the defendant and used by him strictly for trade purposes within the meaning of the law on that subject. Regardless, therefore, of the particular provision in the defendant's contract with his lessor, he had a right to remove his building as between him and his lessor as a "trade fixture," provided, of course, that he could do so without substantial injury to the premises.

Taking such right as it then was immediately preceding the death of the lessor, the question is then projected whether his right of removal of his own property from the leased premises terminated instantly by the death of his lessor, or whether he was entitled to a reasonable time to remove his property from the premises. There are cases which hold to the strict rule of forfeiture against the tenant in such a case. Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538, 5 So. 387; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975. We have never followed such a rule of forfeiture in this state; neither have we had occasion to pass upon the exact question now before us. The principle or theory upon which such rule is said to be based is that the fixtures erected by a tenant become a part of the realty as soon as erected, and that there is no right of property therein to the tenant, his right being in the nature of a privilege or license to sever the same from the realty and repossess himself thereof, and that a failure to exercise such right or privilege during the term of the tenancy is in legal effect a complete abandonment or "dereliction" to the landlord. This theory of the nature of the right of the tenant to fixtures erected by him has been repudiated in many jurisdictions, including our own, as will be hereinafter noted. The previous holdings of this court in that respect have been that the tenant has a right of property in the fixtures so erected by him, although he may lose his right of property on the theory of abandonment by the failure to make timely removal thereof. While such right remains, the property is deemed as the personal property of the tenant as between him and the landlord.

We think the weight of authority and reason is that the right of removal is not necessarily lost by the mere expiration of the term. An active duty devolves upon the tenant to exercise his right promptly, in view of all the circumstances of the case, and ordinarily he is required to exercise it before an actual surrender of the possession of the premises. But, as long as he continues in possession with the acquiescence of the owner, his right of removal continues accordingly. Garland v. Hickman, 56 W. Va. 75, 67 L.R.A. 694, 49 S. E. 14; *Shellar v. The following from Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 2, pp. 1585 et seq., is a sufficient résumé of the authorities on this question:

"A question has frequently arisen as to the time at which the right to remove trade, ornamental, or agricultural fixtures must be exercised; and it is difficult to extract a uniform rule from the decisions in this regard. In some decisions it is stated that the removal must be made during the term, in some that the right expires with the tenancy, and in some that it may be exercised a 'reasonable time' after the expiration of the term. It has occasionally been stated that the tenant's right of removal continues 'during his original term, and during such further period of possession by him as he holds the premises under a right still to consider himself as tenant,' or during what may, for this purpose, 'be considered as an excrescence on the term,' or 'during his rightful continuance in possession.' What is the exact meaning of some of these statements it is difficult to say, but a number of cases recognize the right of the tenant to remove the fixtures even after the term, provided he does so before he relinquishes possession of the land; it being said in some that he may make the removal before such relinquishment of possession, and in others that he must do so. The decisions or dicta to the effect that a tenant holding over has the right of removal, and that he loses the right by giving up possession of the premises, are usually in terms based on the theory that by yielding possession he indicates an intention to abandon the fixtures, and that no presumption of such an intention arises so long as he continues his possession. But, as has been well remarked, if his right as to fixtures on the premises are to be determined by the presumption of his intention to abandon vel non, the same rule should apply to chattels on the land not so annexed as to become fixtures, and he would lose all right to them by relinquishing possession of the land, which he certainly does not do. This theory of a presumption of abandonment, however, seems the only possible one on which, in any jurisdiction in which removable fixtures are regarded as personalty, to support the view that the right of removal is lost by the tenant's relinquishment of possession of the land. On the other hand, regarding the fixtures as constituting a part of the land, with a mere right of removal in the tenant, it is perhaps difficult to see why a tenant should be enabled, by wrongfully holding over, to extend the period for the removal of the fixtures, thus profiting by his own wrong. Such a case, it might seem, would be governed by a rule different from that which governs when he holds over rightfully; that is, by permission. In the latter case, it has been decided, the right of removal continues.

"(b) Tenancy of uncertain duration. If the tenancy is of uncertain duration, such as a tenancy at will, or if it is subject to termination on a certain contingency, the tenant has a 'reasonable time' after its termination within which to remove the fixtures, provided at least the termination is not the result of his own voluntary act, and provided further, it seems, he has not relinquished possession. It has been questioned whether this principle would apply to a tenancy at will, when by statute the tenant is entitled to a reasonable notice to terminate, and there are cases somewhat adverse to its application in favor of a tenant under a lease made by a life tenant, when the leasehold is terminated by the death of the lessor."

We quote from Ewell on Fixtures, p. 293, the following:

"As has been already stated in a prior chapter, the general rule that the right of removal of fixtures must be exercised before the expiration of the tenancy is necessarily subject to exception in those cases where the tenancy is of uncertain duration and liable to be determined by the happening of some contingent or uncertain event on which it depends, as in the case of a tenancy at will. And in analogy to the case of tenancy at will, it seems that, to say the least, the right of personal representatives of a deceased tenant for life or in tail to remove the fixtures to which they are entitled is not terminated until after the expiration of a reasonable time after the death of the person whom they represent. Whether the right of removal shall be considered to extend further than this, the authorities do not declare."

In the light of the foregoing we are disposed to follow the more equitable rule which allows the lessee of a tenant for life a reasonable time after the death of his lessor to surrender his possession and remove his property. This is not only equitable as between all the parties, but the contrary rules tends greatly to the unnecessary depreciation of the rental value of a life estate by the constant menace of forfeiture.

2. Was the defendant guilty of undue delay in the removal of his property in this case? This is largely a question of fact under the evidence in this record. No objection was ever made to his continued possession. On the contrary, in August negotiations were entered into between the defendant and the plaintiff's guardian, looking to a continuance of the tenancy. It is the testimony of the plaintiff's guardian that they did agree orally to a one-year lease at $75 rental. As will be seen later, a part of the plaintiff's case is based upon this alleged new lease. The defendant denies that they ever reached an agreement for a new lease, but admits that negotiations were pending between them. Manifestly an immediate removal of the building pending the negotiations for a continuance of the tenancy would of itself tend to render such negotiations futile. The negotiations of themselves manifestly contemplated the maintenance of the status quo while they were pending. Whether, therefore, an agreement was actually reached, as contended by appellant, or whether the negotiations were simply pending, in either case the delay of removal was in harmony therewith and was therefore necessarily reasonable. On this branch of the case, therefore, we must find that the defendant acted with reasonable promptness in the proposed removal of his building.

3. The next contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant accepted from him a new oral lease of the premises in August, 1911, and that he made no reservation therein of his right to the building, and that he thereby abandoned the same to the plaintiff as a part of the real estate. If the defendant abandoned his building to the plaintiff, he did so by force of legal construction, and not by actual word or intent. There are cases which hold with grim severity that by the acceptance of a new lease by a tenant from his landlord, which omits a reservation to him of his previous property in fixtures, he thereby, as a matter of law, surrenders such property to his landlord and loses all rights therein except those of a tenant under the new lease. Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301. The cases supporting this view will be found collected in the opinion of the Maryland court in the cited case.

The rule here announced, however, was expressly changed by legislation in Maryland since the decision referred to. In this state we have heretofore, by our previous decisions, repudiated such rule, although it was then sustained perhaps by the numerical weight of authority. McCarthy v. Trumacher, 108 Iowa, 284, 78 N. W. 1104; Daly v. Simonson, 126 Iowa, 719, 102 N. W. 780. This question is therefore quite settled for this jurisdiction. To the same effect see Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362; Radey v. McCurdy, 209 Pa. 306, 67 L.R.A. 359, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1009, 58 Atl. 558; Wittenmeyer v. Board of Education, 10 Ohio C. C. 119, 6 Ohio C. D. 258; Wright v. Macdonnell, 88 Tex. 140, 30 S. W. 907; Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514.

The question is discussed in Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant as follows (vol. 2, pp. 1593-1597):

"Acceptance of new lease by tenant. The weight of authority is to the effect that by the acceptance from the landlord of a new lease, containing no mention of fixtures annexed during the tenancy under the former lease, the tenant loses his right to remove such fixtures; the theory being that, the fixtures being a part of the land, the tenant, by an acceptance of the new lease, takes such an interest in the fixtures only as he does in the land (that is, a merely temporary interest). Occasionally a decision to this effect lays some stress upon the fact that the new lease contains a covenant by the lessee to yield up the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as at the time of the lease; but it does not seem that this can be material, since, even in its absence, a tenant has no right to remove improvements covered by the lease to him.

"This doctrine has been held to apply as against one to whom the right to remove the fixtures has been transferred by the tenant who annexed them, upon the taking of a new lease by such transferee; and it has also been decided that such a transferee loses his right of removal if his transferor, while still in possession of the premises, takes a new lease. The rule has even been applied as against a sublessee who, after making annexations, took a new lease from the original lessor.

"Since this doctrine is based upon the theory that the new lease includes the fixtures, as constituting a part of the realty, it necessarily follows that it has no application to articles not so annexed, or not of such character as to constitute fixtures. Furthermore, it would seem to be inapplicable in any jurisdiction where removable fixtures are regarded as personal property, since, if personal property, they would not ordinarily be covered by a second lease, which is in terms of the land only.

"There seems to be some inconsistency between this rule, as asserted, that a renewal lease puts an end to the right of removal, and the decisions before referred to that a tenant holding over by permission does not lose his right of removal, since such permission is in effect a new lease, though only for a brief or indefinite space of time. The cases, however, undertake to distinguish in this regard between a holding under an extension of the original lease and under a new lease, without, it may be said, asserting any satisfactory ground of distinction. In one case the question of the applicability of the rule is regarded as dependent on whether the right of continued possession is given orally or in writing, while in others it is regarded as dependent on whether the continued possession is on the same terms as before; it being in such case regarded as under a mere extension of the old lease, while it is under a new lease if the terms are different.

"In two or three jurisdictions the doctrine that the acceptance of a new lease, not referring to the fixtures, involves a loss of the right of removal, has been repudiated. As before suggested, in so far as in either of these jurisdictions removable fixtures may be regarded as personalty, this view seems the only possible one, and the judicial statements to the effect that the right of removal is not lost by the new lease seem in fact to be based on the theory that the fixtures are the personal effects of the tenant, without, however, any apparent recognition of the fact that the doctrine criticized involves the view that the tenant does not own the fixtures; but has a mere right of removal. In one case it was decided that the doctrine did not apply in view of evidence that the language of the new lease was not intended to cover the fixtures, supported by a presumption from the relation of the parties that this was not intended. It seems that, when the description in such lease is general in terms, evidence would always be admissible to show that it was not intended by the parties that the fixtures should be covered thereby."

The following from Daly v. Simonson, supra, will be a sufficient discussion at this point: "True this last lease did not contain any reservations or exceptions, but it did not cover anything aside from the land and its proper fixtures. It surely did not deprive defendant of his property. Of course a tenant must ordinarily remove fixtures and improvements within a reasonable time after the expiration of his lease. Mickle v. Douglas, 75 Iowa, 78, 39 N. W. 198, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 137. There are some cases which seem to hold that if a tenant takes a renewal lease, which contains no reservations, he by that act surrenders his right to removal of the fixtures placed by him upon the land during the term created by the prior lease. But we have not followed that rule. McCarthy v. Trumacher, 108 Iowa, 284, 78 N. W. 1104; Union Terminal Co. v. Wilmar & S. F. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 392, 90 N. W. 92. When the improvements were erected in this case, they by express agreement between the landlord and tenant were personal property; and by taking the lease from plaintiff, defendant did not surrender his claim thereto. See McCarthy Case, supra, and the following: Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 152, 23 Am. Rep. 362; Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514; Fischer v. Johnson, 106 Iowa, 182, 76 N. W. 658; Wright v. Macdonnell, 88 Tex. 140, 30 S. W. 907. So that, even if the lease from plaintiff and Butler to defendant be not reformed, we do not think defendant lost his title to the personal property."

In the case before us there is no claim of any special provision in the alleged new lease which of itself negatived the right of removal of the building. Reliance is placed solely upon the fact that an alleged new oral lease was made. Taking the plaintiff's own testimony for it, it does not appear that any terms were agreed upon, except the rate of rent and the period of the lease.

We may as well say, further, that in our opinion the evidence would not warrant a finding that a new oral lease was consummated by agreement between the parties. It appears from plaintiff's own evidence that they contemplated a written lease and that they never got together to make it. What terms were to be included in such written lease, apart from the period thereof and the rate of rent, does not appear. The conduct of the parties and all the circumstances corroborate the defendant in the claim that their negotiations never reached the final word. Of course this conclusion does not forbid the recovery of rent by plaintiff for the period of defendant's occupancy. It is our conclusion that the defendant was within his rights in the attempted removal of his building.

We hardly need to say that in so removing it he was bound to do so without substantial injury to the premises, and that he was bound to leave the property in as good condition as when he found it. This he offered to do, and his offer was full and complete. We are quite satisfied from the evidence that it was not impracticable for him to so put the property.

It follows that the decree below must be reversed and the writ of injunction dismissed. The defendant will be awarded a reasonable time after the final disposition of this case to remove his building and to put the property of the plaintiff in proper condition.

Reversed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

(In Banc.)

STATE OF MISSOURI EX REL. JOHN T. BARKER

v.

ASSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA
et al.

(— Mo. —, 158 S. W. 640.)

Conspiracy — right of insurance companies to withdraw from state.

1. Foreign insurance companies doing business in a state cannot conspire or agree together to withdraw from the state in a body and cancel their policies in force therein, upon change, to their detriment, of the laws under which they are doing business.

Note. — Right of foreign corporation to discontinue business within the state.

Research has failed to disclose the existence of any other decision as to the right of a foreign corporation to discontinue its business within a state, although, as stated in the decision above reported, it seems that such a corporation, acting as an individual, would clearly be within its rights in doing so. Nor would the right to do so be affected by the circumstance that the corporation is engaged in the business of insurance, since although the business of insurance is affected by a public interest (see note to State ex rel. McCarter v. Firemen's Ina. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1194) to the extent of being subject to public supervision and control, it is not, nor from the nature of its business can it be, in the position of a public service corporation and bound to insure whoever may tender a premium. At the same time, in view of the generally recognized right of a state to impose such conditions, restrictions, and regulations upon the admission of a foreign corporation to do business as may seem proper, it would appear to be competent for the legislature to require as a condition of such admission that it may not, under penalty (to be enforced, perhaps, by forfeiture of securities deposited), discontinue business within the state without the consent of some state official.

But where a number of corporations combine to discontinue to do business within a state, the situation presented is that of a boycott on a large scale; and the lawfulness of the combination is to be determined by reference to the principles governing boycotts generally. That it may be unlawful for several to combine to do what any one of them acting alone might lawfully do is a doctrine which, though sometimes controverted, is supported by the weight of authority. With reference to this point it is said in 7 Labatt, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 2662 b: "While in a criminal prosecution for conspiracy at common law the combination is considered to be the gist of the offense, so that it is not necessary to prove the doing 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Statute — title — sufficiency — repealing anti-trust law.

2. The anti-trust laws relating to insurance companies cannot be repealed by a statute, under a title "An Act to Regulate Insurance and the Rates of Premiums thereof, and to Provide Penalties for Violation of Its Provisions."

Same — repealing anti-trust laws — effect of provision.

3. Anti-trust laws relating to insurance companies are not repealed by a statute permitting one or more of said companies, singly or jointly, to employ for the making of general basis schedules and rates the services of experts.

Courts — original jurisdiction — temporary restraining orders.

4. The supreme court may, in aid of its original jurisdiction in quo warranto to of any act in furtherance of the conspiracy, the contrary is the case in civil actions, where the rule is that conspiracy of itself furnishes no cause of action. This rule has two meanings: First, that there must be damage as well as conspiracy; second, that the fact of combination does not of itself confer a right of action for loss sustained by another in consequence thereof. But though the fact of conspiracy will not render actionable an act which an individual may do without incurring liability, it does not follow that a combination to do such an act is not an actionable conspiracy. The fallacy lies in assuming the converse of the original proposition to be equally true. It has sometimes, however, been assumed to be a necessary sequel of the rule that an unlawful act, and not the fact of conspiracy, is the gist of the civil action, that the act for which an action for conspiracy will lie must be something unlawful in itself. Again, it is said that many may combine to do what any one of them may lawfully do. Now, while these statements are true in so far as they express the idea that the fact of combination does not of itself render a conspiracy actionable, they are half truths, whose specious resemblance to the whole truth constitutes the source of the error which has misled some courts into taking the position that if the act complained of is not unlawful where done by an individual, it is not unlawful where done by a combination. But the great preponderance of opinion is to the effect that the unlawful means which will render a combination to do an act by such means a conspiracy are not necessarily such as would be wrongful if employed by a single individual. Various reasons have been assigned for so holding, . . . all of which approximate the truth, even though they may not fully express it. One of these is the increased power of the combination to inflict injury beyond the power of an individual, any injury inflicted by whom, though wrongful, is not actionable under the principle, de minimis non curat lex. Another reason (or perhaps only another form of the foregoing reason) is that the union of individual punish a foreign insurance company for attempting a usurpation and abuse of power, issue a temporary restraining order to prevent such conduct pending the hearing.

INFORMATION in the nature of a quo warranto for the purpose of punishing respondents for an alleged violation of the anti-trust laws. Temporary injunction granted.

Statement by Woodson, P. J.:

This is an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, instituted in this court against the respondents, foreign fire insurance companies, duly authorized and licensed to do business in this state, to find and otherwise punish them for violating the laws of the state regarding pools, trusts, conspiracies, and discriminations.

The information charges that:

"The Amazonia Fire Insurance Company and others . . . are fire insurance corporations organized under the laws of other states or foreign countries, and are doing a fire insurance business in the state of Missouri, and at all the dates hereinafter mentioned were duly organized to do such business in the state of Missouri, having heretofore complied with the laws of the state of Missouri authorizing foreign fire insurance corporations to do business in this state; and at all times hereinafter mentioned respondents were engaged in the business of writing fire insurance contracts, policies, and agreements insuring property from loss by fire or other causes, and conducting generally a fire insurance business throughout the state of Missouri; and that for many years respondents and each of them have been doing business in the state of Missouri with the consent of the state as foreign corporations, and engaged in insuring property for the citizens and residents of Missouri against loss by fire and otherwise. That on the — day of April, 1913, each and all of respondents unlawfully, illegally, and willfully misused and abused their said franchises, rights, and privileges as foreign fire insurance companies authorized to do business under the laws of the state of Missouri in this, to wit: That on said date each of said respondents did create, enter into, become a member of, and participate in a certain pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, or understanding with each other and with other fire insurance corporaforces by agreement gives the act, by force of numbers, a coercive effect. In other words, the simultaneity of the action has the effect to create a nuisance. A supplemental reason which has been given in connection with others of the foregoing is that the fact of combination creates a presumption that the object is to do harm, rather than to exercise the rights of its members. The difficulty to be gotten over is, how an act not actionable when done by an individual can become actionable where done by persons acting in combination. This may be surmounted in various ways, all of which are perhaps equally valid, but which have appealed with different degrees of cogency to different minds. One of these is to regard the combination not as one to do the act, but as to effect the result of the combined acts. Another is to regard the plot itself as an act the intent of the parties to which is open to inquiry, although their intent in doing the act as individuals would not be open to inquiry. Here, again, we come upon the idea that there are certain acts which are so consistent with the exercise of a right by the actor as to raise a presumption, so strong as to be conclusive, that they were done in pursuance of an intention to exercise that right. They are styled acts done in the exercise of an absolute right. They are certain other acts which are not so consistent with the exercise of a right by the actor, and which are said to be done in the exercise of a common or qualified right, in respect of which the intention of the actor is open to inquiry. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

One of these, according to this view, is the right to combine with others. But any attempt to work out the tort involved in the infliction of injury upon another by acts done in combination which was not actionable when done by an individual, upon the theory of conspiracy, can never be wholly satisfactory. For one reason, it necessitates a resort in some cases (i. e., where a workman's employment is interfered with for the purpose of forcing him to join a union, or in boycott cases generally) to the somewhat forced presumption that the object of the combination is primarily to injure the person affected, and only remotely to benefit its members. Hence the conflict of judicial opinion. Again, by making combination an essential element of the tort, it operates to exempt an individual from liability for the same acts, done with the same intent, and producing the same injury, for which he, if acting in combination with others, might be held liable. The true view appears to be that the tort involved is a nuisance, the existence of which is dependent on the degree of annoyance inflicted upon those to whom the plaintiff looks for labor, employment, or patronage, and the actionable quality of which depends upon the point at which the right to conduct one's business without interference is to be regarded as ceasing to be merely a permissive right, and becomes also a protected right. Under this view, the fact of combination is material only as bearing upon the degree of annoyance to which one's employer or workman or customers are sub-tions and associations of persons (whose names are unknown) against public policy and in restraint of trade, in this, to wit: That on said date each and all respondents unlawfully, illegally, and wilfully entered into an agreement to suspend operation and withdraw from sale all fire insurance in the state of Missouri on the 30th day of April, 1913, and unlawfully agreed to refuse to accept, write, issue, or sell any insurance on any properties located in said state of Missouri, and unlawfully agreed to withdraw from said state of Missouri by concerted movement simultaneously on said 30th day of April, 1913, and thus leave the citizens of the state of Missouri without adequate fire insurance protection, and unlawfully agreed to cancel all fire insurance policies heretofore written in the state of Missouri, which said action on the part of said respondents, if carried out, as they now propose, will cause a calamity in the financial world in said state of Missouri, and leave the citizens of said state without any adequate fire insurance.

"Your informant further informs the court that the said unlawful agreement, combination, confederation, and conspiracy will affect the trade, traffic, and commerce in this state, and that the same will be hindered, injured, and retarded, and the people of the jected; and the act done in combination derives its character from the consequences which follows it under the circumstances in which it is done."

Such a combination, though unlawful in the sense of giving a right of action to anyone injured thereby, may or may not be a criminal conspiracy, according to whether it falls counter to the provisions of some statute, or whether it has a necessary tendency to oppress the public. See 7 Labatt, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 2663.

It will be perceived in STATE EX REL. BARKER v. ASSURANCE CO., that it was alleged in the information, and consequently admitted by the demurrer, that the general nature and object of the combination was "to act in a concerted manner, simultaneously, and with a view to crippling and destroying the financial credit of the state of Missouri and the people therein, and to deny to the state of Missouri and the people therein the right to protect their property by insurance against loss or damage by fire; and such conspiracy, confederation, and agreement is against public policy, in restraint of trade, and is intended at one blow to crush the entire business and commerce of the commonwealth of the state of Missouri." But had the object of the combination been solely to further the interests of its members by discontinuing to do business within the state for the purpose of forcing a modification of the obnoxious regulations, it would not have been an unlawful one, though it might incidentally have worked harm to others. See 7 Labatt, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) state will, after said 30th day of April, 1913, be denied the right to purchase fire insurance and to protect themselves and their property against loss by fire.

"Your informant further informs the court that the general nature and object of the said combination, conspiracy, and confederation, so made as aforesaid, is to act in a concerted manner, simultaneously, and with a view to crippling and destroying the financial credit of the state of Missouri and the people therein, and to deny to the state of Missouri and the people therein the right to protect their property by insurance against loss or damage by fire; and such conspiracy, confederation, and agreement is against public policy, in restraint of trade, and is intended at one blow to crush the entire business and commerce of the commonwealth of the state of Missouri.

"Your informant further informs the court that respondents and each of them are associated together in a common organization or interest called the 'Western Insurance Bureau,' which bureau is organized for the purpose of controlling the insurance business of the United States and particularly in Missouri, and for the further purpose of controlling, managing, regulating, and conducting the entire insurance business in the state of Missouri, and that respondents and each of them are members of such insurance organization and association, and, by the scheme of said association and respondents and each of them, such association is authorized and empowered to and does approve rules and regulations for the government of the entire association, and all of the members thereof, and of each and all of the respondents herein, and when said rules and regulations are so fixed, as they now are, each member and each respondent herein is called upon and required and compelled by the rules of said association and by the rules of the respondents herein to obey, and that said association and that each of respondents do obey such rules, and that when said respondents created, entered into, and became a member of and participated in such illegal agreement and combination and understanding with each other and with such association to suspend business and withdraw all fire insurance from sale in the state of Missouri, and to withdraw by such concerted action from such state, each of said respondents are required and commanded, by the rules and understanding between the said association and respondents and each of them, to comply therewith, and to suspend operation in said state of Missouri, and to withdraw therefrom, and to withdraw from sale all fire insurance in said state; and such understanding, agreement, confederation, and combination is an abuse of the corporate privileges of each of said respondents and in violation of the laws of the state of Missouri, against public policy, and is in restraint of trade.

Nor would it have been criminal, except as it may have been made so by statute.

In connection with the decision above reported, attention may be called to a case which resembles it in the circumstance that the purpose of the insurance companies in taking concerted action was to force the repeal of an obnoxious regulation. This case is Harris v. Com. 113 Va. 746, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 73 S. E. 561, where it was held that concerted action by fire insurance companies doing business in a certain city, in raising the insurance rates to compel the municipal authorities to repeal the imposition of a franchise tax upon the business, is not a criminal conspiracy because of the motive of the act.

"Your informant further informs the court that there has been promulgated by said association and by each of respondents herein, and approved by such association and by each of respondents herein, rules for the control of the members thereof by which it is provided that no member of such association of insurance companies, including each of the respondents herein, shall write or sell insurance in the state of Missouri after April 30, 1913, and each of said respondents, as members of such insurance association and individually, has illegally agreed to suspend operation and withdraw from sale all fire insurance in said state of Missouri on said April 30, 1913, and to withdraw in a concerted movement from said state of Missouri, and that by the rules of such association each and all of the respondents herein are compelled and required to withdraw from said state of Missouri, and to suspend operation therein, and to withdraw from sale all fire insurance in said state, so that said association of insurance companies and the respondents herein have placed in the power of such insurance association to authorize and compel each in-insurance company named herein to immediately withdraw from said state of Missouri, and to suspend operation therein, and to withdraw from sale all fire insurance in said state, thus leaving the people of the state of Missouri without any protection against loss by fire, and to prevent citizens of the state of Missouri from securing any fire insurance, and thus injure and destroy the commercial value of the state of Missouri, and to deprive the citizens of said state of Missouri of the right which they have heretofore enjoyed of having their property insured by said respondents or either of them against loss by fire, and that each of said respondents entered into such illegal agreement with the express and avowed purpose of injuring and destroying the credit and commercial value of the state of Missouri.

"Your informant further informs the court that the object and purpose of such association which met as aforesaid on April —, 1913, was and is to stifle competition in the insurance business in the state of Missouri by withdrawing its membership and refusing to write insurance and thus lessen competition in the insurance business in said state of Missouri, and to deny to the citizens of said state of Missouri the right to purchase fire insurance, and each and all members of such association and the respondents herein are banded together for a common cause to injure and destroy the value of property in the state of Missouri, and are acting in a rebellious and retaliatory manner, and are now threatening to immediately suspend operation and to withdraw from the state of Missouri in a concerted movement on the 30th day of April, 1913; and that respondents and each of them are now actively and earnestly engaged in carrying out said purpose by the use of every means known to them, and are now preparing to and are suspending business and withdrawing fire insurance from sale in the state of Missouri, and are refusing, by reason of such concerted movement and for the purposes aforesaid, to insure property against loss by fire in the state of Missouri.

"Your informant further informs the court that these respondents and each of them, in order to carry out the scheme of such association to create a monopoly in the insurance business in the state of Missouri and lessen competition, have combined and conspired and confederated with each other and with other members of said association (whose names are unknown) and with the officers and agents and members of other associations in similar insurance business, and organized for a similar purpose to harass and embarrass the citizens of the state of Missouri, and to injure and destroy the business of the citizens of the state of Missouri, and to destroy the commercial credit of the state of Missouri and thus create a financial panic in said state of Missouri and a calamity which will affect each and every citizen of the state of Missouri of the right to purchase insurance on their buildings and other property.

"Your informant further informs the court that, in furtherance of such illegal conspiracy and agreement on the part of respondents, these respondents and each of them and the association aforesaid have issued circulars containing declarations that they will suspend operation in the state of Missouri, and withdraw therefrom, and refuse to write or sell insurance therein, and that they will cause all members of said association, including each of respondents, to cease from writing or selling insurance in the state of Missouri, and to cause them to suspend operation therein, thus leaving the people of the state without any fire protection; and that respondents, in pursuance of such illegal understanding, agreement, and conspiracy, are now threatening to withdraw from the state of Missouri by a concerted movement on April 30, 1913, and are threatening to refuse to write or sell insurance on property in the state of Missouri after such date.

"Your informant further informs the court that the respondents herein constitute practically three fourths of the fire insurance companies doing business in the state of Missouri and perhaps more, and that by reason of such illegal acts and conduct on the part of the respondents and each of them, coupled with their recent threats to withdraw from the state of Missouri, the people of this state will be left without any fire protection, and the business of the state and of the citizens therein will be seriously impaired, the commercial loan value of buildings destroyed, and the citizens will be denied the right to protect themselves against loss by fire, and that each of said agreements and each of them is in restraint of trade, against public policy, and in violation of the law.

"Your informant further informs the court that by reason of the premises said respondents and each of them have since the — day of April, 1913, and up to the present time, grossly offended against the laws of this state and wilfully and flagrantly abused and misused their rights, authority, and franchises, and have wilfully and unlawfully assumed and unlawfully and wilfully usurped authorities and privileges not granted to said corporations by the laws of the state of Missouri by entering into and becoming a member of said trust, combination, confederation, agreement, and understanding as aforesaid; and, in pursuance of the aforesaid agreement, combination, trust, confederation, and understanding so made and maintained as aforesaid, respondents are now, in the state of Missouri, unlawfully and wilfully carrying out the provisions of said combination and confederation, and threatening to leave the state of Missouri and to suspend business therein, and to withdraw fire insurance from sale in said state on said 30th day of April, 1913, thus leaving the citizens of this state without any protection against loss by fire, and are now unlawfully and wilfully attempting to carry out such unlawful agreement, combination, and understanding, and that the acts and agreements of the respondents, insurance corporations, as herein set forth, constituted a wilful and malicious perversion of the franchises granted to said insurance corporations by the state of Missouri, and is illegal and wilful usurpation of privileges and authorities not granted said respondents by the state of Missouri, to the great and permanent injury of the entire public.

"Wherefore your informant, prosecuting in this behalf for the state of Missouri, asks that each of these respondents be adjudged guilty of creating, entering into, and becoming a member of and participating in a certain pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, or understanding with each other and other fire insurance corporations, and that such agreement, understanding, and conspiracy, so entered into, be declared illegal and void, and respondents and each of them be forbidden to again enter into such illegal agreements, combinations, and confederations, and that their acts in becoming members of such combination, confederation, and understanding be declared void, and that respondents and each of them be fined in such sums as the court thinks will punish them and cause others to refrain from doing similar acts, and that the court will restrain respondents and each of them from canceling, in pursuance of this illegal agreement, all policies or agreements of insurance heretofore issued, or direct respondents and each of them to show cause why they should not be thus restrained, and for such other and further orders and relief as to the court shall seem meet, just, and proper."

Upon the filing of this information in this court by an order duly made on April 28, 1913, the respondents and each of them were required to show cause why they and each of them should not be adjudged guilty, as charged in the information, of a conspiracy in violation of their charter powers and licenses for their acts as aforesaid; and, in addition to such order to show cause, the respondents and each of them were restrained and enjoined, individually and as parties to such illegal conspiracy, agreement, and understanding, from canceling any and all policies in force in this state, in pursuance of and by reason of such illegal agreement. The respondents and each of them were given until the 8th day of May, 1913, on which to respond to said order to show cause, and also in which to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be issued against the respondents and each of them to prohibit them and each of them from canceling the insurance now in force on property in this state, under and in pursuance of such illegal agreement. All of the respondents were duly served with process, and all appeared by counsel. That on the 8th day of May, 1913, the defendants the Stuyvesant Insurance Company and the Pacific Fire Insurance Company filed their answers by their respective attorneys, and all of the other defendants appeared and filed their general demurrer to the bills and complaints of the state. The Massachusetts Fire & Marine Insurance Company appeared for this purpose by their attorneys, Jones, Hocker, Hawes, & Angert. The St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company appeared by their attorney, Clyde Taylor. The Buffalo-German Insurance Company appeared by its attorney, Bruce Barnett. All of the other respondents appeared by their attorneys, Judson & Green, F. W. Lehman, Thos. Bates et al., and filed their general demurrers herein.

The grounds of the demurrer are:

First. That the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them or any of them.

Second. That the state is not entitled to the relief prayed for, or any other relief in this cause.

Third. That there is no law prohibiting the defendants or either of them from entering into the agreement of the nature set out in the information.

The terms and conditions under which the business of fire insurance may be conducted will be so changed by § 10313a, Rev. Stat. 1909, when it becomes effective, and made so onerous and dangerous, that to compel the respondent companies to continue such business in the state under the changed conditions is to violate their rights under the 14th Article of Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that they will be deprived of their liberty and property without due process of law, and will be denied the equal protection of the law.

Woodson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I. At this stage of the case there are only two legal propositions presented for determination, and they are presented by the demurrer. The first is, Does the petition state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? and the second, Has this court the authority to issue a restraining order or injunction in aid of a cause of action over which this court has jurisdiction to hear and determine? We will dispose of these questions in the order stated.

Attending the first: Counsel for respondents clearly and tersely state their position regarding this proposition in the following question propounded, viz.: "Must foreign insurance companies, doing business in this state, continue to do such business, even though they are unwilling to accept the terms and conditions prescribed by the statute upon which the business may be done, and especially where, as here, those terms and conditions were radically changed by the state after the companies came into its jurisdiction and the companies have never assented to the change?" As an abstract legal proposition, no court, in my opinion, would hesitate a moment to answer that question in the negative; but that question does not incorporate the entire case presented by the information filed by the attorney general. In other words, his charges are broader than the question in this: He charges that the "respondents did create, enter into, become a member of, and participate in, a certain pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, or understanding with each other and with other fire insurance companies and associations of persons (whose names are unknown) against public policy and in restraint of trade in this, to wit: That on said date each and all respondents unlawfully, illegally, and wilfully entered into an agreement to suspend operation and withdraw from sale all fire insurance in the state of Missouri on the 30th day of April, 1913, and unlawfully agreed to refuse to accept, write, issue, or sell any insurance on any properties located in said state of Missouri, and unlawfully agreed to withdraw from said state of Missouri by concerted movement simultaneously on said 30th day of April, 1913, and thus leave the citizens of the state of Missouri without adequate fire insurance protection, and unlawfully agreed to cancel all fire insurance policies heretofore written in the state of Missouri, which said action on the part of said respondents, if carried out, as they now propose, "would cause great damages," etc., to the state and the citizens thereof. By this language it is seen that the attorney general does not seek to prevent any one or all of the respondents acting for itself or themselves individually, upon its or their own volition, from leaving the state, or to prevent such company or companies, if so acting, from canceling any or all of their policies insuring property in this state; but he does seek to prevent respondents from leaving the state in a body or as a body to cancel all of their policies in this state in pursuance to the unlawful, illegal, and wilful conspiracy he alleged they have entered into for the purpose of damaging the state and the citizens thereof.

There is a broad distinction between the two propositions. Under the former each and every one of the respondents may individually, of its own motion, leave the state and cancel each and every policy it has in force therein, if it sees proper to so do, provided, of course, the policy contains a provision permitting its cancellation. But not true under the latter proposition, because respondents have no more legal right to unlawfully agree to do a lawful thing than they have to agree to do an unlawful thing. State ex rel. Hadley v. Standard Oil Co. 218 Mo. loc. cit. 367, 116 S. W. 902, and cases cited. If any one or more of the respondents feels itself or themselves aggrieved because of the enactment of the statutes of 1913, known and called the "Orr Acts," then there is no valid reason, legally or morally, why it or they should not be permitted to leave the state, but in doing so they have no legal or moral right to enter into an unlawful conspiracy with themselves or with other companies, and by agreement in pursuance thereof induce or agree with all the others to leave in a body or severally, for that matter, if it is, as stated, done in pursuance to such unlawful conspiracy. This principle of law is so well settled in England and America, under both the common law and the statutes governing the same, it seems to me that it would be useless to cite authorities in support thereof.

Since writing the above, it has occurred to my mind that the writer had occasion to consider the principle underlying this case in the case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle, 215 Mo. 421, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 607, 128 Am. St. Rep. 492, 114 S. W. 997. That case involved the questions of unlawful conspiracies to injure others, and the authority of the court to resort to injunctive relief in aid thereof. Counsel for respondent in that case cited the case of Hunt v. Simonds, 19 Mo. 588, which seems to hold to the contrary, but we refused to follow the doctrine announced in that case, and followed the better considered cases, which are as old as the common law, which hold that two or more persons have no legal right to unlawfully conspire to injure another, even though each separately had the legal right to do what the combination had agreed to do.

We are therefore of the opinion that the respondent had no legal right, by agreement, to withdraw from the state, in a body, in pursuance to said unlawful agreement, or to cancel their policies upon property in this state in pursuance to said agreement.

II. If we correctly understand the position of counsel for respondents, they do not as a general proposition seem to controvert the proposition stated and conclusions reached in paragraph 1 of the opinion, but insist that, at the time of the making and entering into the agreement or conspiracy complained of, there was no law in this state which prevented them from so doing. This insistence, in our opinion, is untenable.

Prior to 1911 the business of fire insurance was by express terms included within the anti-trust laws of the state. See chap. 98, Rev. Stat. 1909. This chapter placed under the ban "any pool, trust, agreement, . . . to regulate, control or fix . . . the price or premium to be paid for insuring property against loss or damage by fire, lightning, or storm, or to maintain said price when so regulated or fixed." This statute was sustained as valid and applying to insurance companies in State ex rel. Crow v. Aetna Ins. Co. 150 Mo. 113, 51 S. W. 413. This chapter, it is insisted, in so far as it related to insurance companies, was repealed in 1911 by what was known as the "Oliver law." Laws of Missouri 1911, pp. 267-271. We must therefore consider the following matters as a basis for this proceeding as to whether or not the anti-trust laws are in force in this state, as regards insurance companies, so as to prohibit them from entering into the agreement complained of in the information filed by the attorney general in this case.

Counsel for respondents contend that the Oliver law (Laws 1911, pp. 267-271, §§ 1 to 12, inclusive) repealed all prior laws of the state applicable to that subject, which are contained in art. 1, chap. 98, Rev. Stat. 1909, entitled "Pools, Trusts, Conspiracies, and Discriminations."

The Oliver act, which was approved March 18, 1911, does not purport in terms to repeal any pre-existing laws, but upon the contrary § 11 by necessary implication repels any such conclusion to be drawn therefrom; for it in express terms provides that "all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed," and consequently all laws and parts of laws not in conflict therewith are not repealed thereby, but are left in full force and effect. That is the common sense of the language used and the clear design the legislature had in mind when it enacted it. The Oliver act, however, was in express terms repealed by an act of the legislature approved March 29, 1913 (Laws of 1913, p. 382). And by an act of the legislature approved March 29, 1913 (Laws 1913, pp. 549-555, inclusive), repealed art. 1 of chap. 98, Rev. Stat. 1909, composed of §§ 10298-10313, both inclusive, entitled "Pools, Trusts, Conspiracies, and Discriminations," and re-enacted in lieu thereof, to be known as art. 1, chap. 98, Rev. Stat. 1909, entitled "Pools, Trusts, Conspiracies, and Discriminations." The only difference between the article repealed and the one enacted is that the latter added to the former a new section numbered 10313a. This new section prescribes what shall be prima facie of guilt in prosecutions of insurance companies for violating the provisions of said article, but what the object or purpose of the framer of the bill was, or the intention of the legislature in enacting it, is not clear; for if the Oliver act repealed said article 1, as counsel for respondent contend, then there was no useful purpose served by the legislature repealing it again on March 29, 1913, and, if not repealed thereby, then I can see no wise purpose in repealing it in one breath and re-enacting it in the next.

But, whatever may have been the purpose of the legislature in so acting, it has but little or no bearing upon the question in hand; namely, Were there any anti-trust laws in force in this state at the date of the formation of the conspiracy complained of in the information? By reading the Oliver act, it will be seen that neither the title thereto nor the body of the bill, mentions or refers to pools, trusts, conspiracies, or discriminations, nor to the chapter or article of the statutes containing said laws. It is therefore perfectly clear to my mind that the legislature had no such purpose in view.

But, suppose it be conceded that the legislature did intend thereby to repeal the anti-trust laws of the state in so far as they relate to fire insurance companies, then the act would be unconstitutional, null, and void, because there is nothing contained in the title of the bill calling that subject to the attention of the legislators, as commended by § 28 of art. 4 of the Constitution, which, in so far as is here material, reads as follows: "No bill . . . shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." The title of the act reads: "An Act to Regulate Insurance against Loss or Damage by Fire, Lightning, Hail, Windstorm, and Sprinkler Leakage, and the Rates of Premium thereof, and to Provide Penalties for the Violation of Its Provisions, with an Emergency Clause." Clearly there is nothing in this title that points to the anti-trust laws of the state like a signboard points to a city, as was stated by Judge Sherwood in the case of St. Louis v. Weitzel, 130 Mo. 600, loc. cit. 616, 31 S. W. 1045, 1049, in the following language: "The evident object of the provision of the organic law relative to the title of an act was to have the title like a guideboard, indicate the general contents of the bill, and contain but one general subject which might be expressed in a few or a greater number of words. If those words only constitute one general subject, if they do not mislead as to what the bill contains, if they are not designed as a cover to vicious and incongruous legislation, then the title can stand on its own merits, is an honest title, and does not impinge on constitutional prohibitions."

But, independent of that, there is nothing contained in the body of the Oliver act which can form even a plausible basis for the contention that it repeals the anti-trust laws of the state, in so far as they refer to fire insurance companies, without it is the following language contained in § 4 thereof, which reads as follows: "Provided, further, . . . any one or more of such companies, singly or jointly, may employ for the making of such general basis schedules and rates, and the filing of the same, the services of such experts as it, or they, may deem advisable for such purpose." Should it be conceded that it was the design of the legislature, by this provision of that section, to repeal the anti-trust laws in so far as authorizing the companies in making and fixing rates are concerned, yet there is nothing contained in this record which shows that respondents, or any of them, have availed themselves of that clause by complying with its provisions in reference to filing with the insurance commissioner general and special schedules of rates for each city, town, or village in the state, etc. But waiving that point, and conceding that they have fully complied with all of said act, yet it cannot be seriously contended that said clause of said § 4 of the Oliver act repeals anything contained in the anti-trust laws, except that clause of § 10301, Rev. Stat. 1909, which forbids all agreements among insurance companies to fix the "price or premium to be paid for insuring property against loss or damage by fire, lightning, or storm," etc., yet that act does not authorize them to combine or conspire for the purpose of charging a fixed rate irrespective of the ruling of the insurance commissioner as to the reasonableness of that rate, nor does it authorize them to conspire for the purpose of withdrawing from the state, or to limit the number of companies which shall do business herein, nor for the purpose of preventing the writing of all insurance available or limiting the amount of insurance that may be written in the state, nor for the purpose of canceling any or all insurance now in force herein. This is too plain for argument.

Moreover, when we consider the growth and great evils of the trusts and combines, and the legislation enacted in almost if not all of the states and territories of the Union and by the Congress of the United States to suppress and destroy them, it is almost inconceivable to believe that it was the design of the legislature of this state, at a single stroke, to repeal all laws regarding this, one of the oldest and greatest trusts that exists in the country. If I remember correctly, this is one of the first trusts this court declared was illegal, and in consequence thereof imposed heavy fines against the various companies which were members thereof. I am therefore firmly of the opinion that not only the anti-trust laws of the state, common law or statutory, are in full force and effect, but also that the information filed charges a good cause of action against the respondents.

III. This brings us to the consideration of the question, Has this court the jurisdiction to issue a restraining order or temporary injunction which is in aid of or ancillary to the quo warranto proceeding pending herein? When this question was first suggested, I was of the opinion that we had no such authority, but after a thorough investigation of the question I have changed my mind and am now of the opinion that this court has that power.

Mr. High, in his estimable work on Injunctions, 4th ed. pp. 7, 8, and 11, §§ 4, 5, and 7, in treating of temporary injunctions, among other things says:

"§ 4. The sole object of an interlocutory injunction is to preserve the subject in controversy in its then condition and, without determining any question of right, merely to prevent the further perpetration of wrong or the doing of any act whereby the right in controversy may be materially injured or endangered. It cannot be used for the purpose of taking property out of the possession of one party and putting it into the possession of another, nor does it go to the extent of ordering defendant to undo what he has already done; since it might thereby be productive of as much injury to defendant as that of which the party aggrieved complains. The jurisdiction, therefore, being exercised to prevent the further continuance of injurious acts, rather than to undo what has already been done, on an interlocutory application for an injunction courts of equity will only act prospectively, and will interpose only such restraint as may suffice to stop the mischief complained of and preserve matters in statu quo. And, where the granting of an interlocutory injunction involves the decision of a novel question of law of grave importance and serious difficulty, the injunction should be denied. And the court should not, upon an interlocutory application, enter a final decree granting a perpetual injunction."

"§ 5. It is to be constantly borne in mind that, in granting temporary relief by interlocutory injunction, courts of equity in no manner anticipate the ultimate determination of the questions of right involved. They merely recognize that a sufficient case has been made out to warrant the preservation of the property or rights in issue in statu quo until a hearing upon the merits, without expressing and indeed without having the means of forming a final opinion as to such rights. And, in order to sustain an injunction for the protection of property pendente lite, it is not necessary to decide in favor of plaintiff upon the merits, nor is it necessary that he should present such a case as will certainly entitle him to a decree upon the final hearing; since he may be entitled to an interlocutory injunction, although his right to the relief prayed may ultimately fail. Nor is the decision of the court in granting or refusing a preliminary injunction conclusive upon either the court or parties on the subsequent disposition of the cause by final decree."

"§ 7. Except in cases of special injunctions to stay waste or prevent other irreparable injury, the bill should generally show some primary equity in aid of which the injunction is asked, and the relief is granted as ancillary to or in support of the primary equity whose enforcement is thus sought. And it is incumbent upon the party seeking relief by interlocutory injunction to show some clear legal or equitable rights and a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury to those rights."

The information in this case charges the respondents with a violation of the anti-trust laws of the state, and that thereby they have usurped authority and powers not granted to them by their licenses to do business in this state, for which the attorney general asks that they be fined and otherwise punished; and in addition thereto the information charges that respondents in pursuance to said usurpation and abuse of power are threatening to and will commit an irreparable injury to the state and the citizens thereof, if not restrained or enjoined from so doing during the pendency of the suit.

A similar question came before the supreme court of Ohio in the case of State ex rel. Ellis v. Cuyahoga County, 70 Ohio St. 341, 71 N. E. 717. In that case, as in this, it was contended by the respondents that under the Constitution of that state the supreme court had no jurisdiction to issue a temporary injunction in aid of the quo warranto proceeding therein pending. The Constitution of Ohio in regard to issuing original writs is practically the same as ours, and neither in express terms authorize the supreme court to issue an injunction; but that court held that it had the implied or inherent authority to issue an injunction in aid of a quo warranto proceeding pending therein, over which it unquestionably had jurisdiction to try and determine. In discussing that question the court said: "It is urged that we are without authority to make the order which the motion contemplates. The present action is a resort to our original jurisdiction. That we have not original jurisdiction of suits for injunctions is entirely clear. If the language of § 5573, Revised Statutes, should be thought appropriate to confer it, the effect to be given to that section would nevertheless be indicated by § 2 of art. 4 of the Constitution, which ordains that 'it (the supreme court) shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, and procedendo, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be provided by law.' Applying to this grant the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, the conclusion is irresistible that the general assembly cannot add to the enumerated subjects of our original jurisdiction. Marbury v. Madison,

1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 80; Kent v. Mahaffy, 2 Ohio St. 498. But our original jurisdiction in quo warranto is not doubted, and we have to inquire whether the desired order may be made in its exercise. In the consideration of that question the case of Yeoman v. Lasley, 36 Ohio St. 416, is suggestive. The proceeding in this court was for the reversal of a judgment which the district court had rendered in a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgagor's equity of redemption. An injunction was not sought in the original suit, nor was a right to that relief presented to the court below or considered by it. The question for ultimate determination by this court was whether the district court had erred in the decision of the case which had been presented to it. But this court, upon an application originally made here, allowed an injunction in favor of one of the parties to the proceeding in error and against his adversary for 'the protection of the rights of the parties in the suit or matter under review on error.' It is true that it is said in the opinion that in allowing the injunction the court was exercising appellate, and not original, jurisdiction. But, as it was not a part of the jurisdiction invoked by the suit and exercised or refused by the district court, it could be regarded as appellate jurisdiction only because the order to be made was necessary to the proper and effective exercise of the appellate jurisdiction to reverse the judgment which the district court had rendered in the suit to foreclose. It has not been suggested, and it obviously could not be maintained, that our authority for the exercise of the original jurisdiction which the Constitution confers upon us is less complete than for the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction which we derive from the statutes. The pertinent inference from the case cited is that a court has authority to make any judicial order which, from the nature of the case, may be necessary to the effective exercise of its jurisdiction, whether original or appellate. Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversy between the parties to a suit. Authority to determine is exercised in the form of judgments, decrees, and orders, and it implies power to make all such orders as may be appropriate to the case presented and necessary to give practical effect to the final judgment, as well as to preserve the subject of the action, pending the final determination of the case. In Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. 292, it is appropriately said that 'all bodies, except the legislature, are under law, and therefore for all transgressions of the law are subject to the judicial power established by the Constitution.' This is a public action, and its subject is the administration of the laws which provide for the conduct of popular elections. The more limited subject of inquiry started by this motion is the administration of those laws pending the case in quo warranto. Since the principal action involves its incidents, the court of common pleas, which alone has original jurisdiction of suits for injunctions, cannot with propriety exercise that jurisdiction with respect to the subject of the action which is pending here; and it is entirely clear from the decisions already adverted to, as well as from the obvious force of the reasons involved, that those having the apparent right should be protected in the exercise of these public functions. The power to grant an ancillary injunction for that purpose is inherent in the court which has jurisdiction of the principal subject. The case is novel only in the application of familiar principles of obvious necessity."

That ruling, in my opinion, is unquestionably correct; for it would be useless for a court to try a cause if it had no authority or means by which it could enforce or protect the rights and interests of the parties involved therein after they had been adjudicated.

It seems to me to be unanswerable to say that, where a court is given express authority to try a cause, it must also by implication have the power to do all the things that are incident to that trial or are necessary to be done in order to carry into full force and effect the judgment or decree the law authorizes the court to render therein. Shull v. Boyd, — Mo. —, 158 S. W. 313, not yet officially reported.

It is not doubted but what this court has jurisdiction to try and determine a quo warranto proceeding, which this is, and if it is necessary, as it appears to be by the information filed in this case, to preserve the status quo of the parties to the suit and the rights involved therein to issue a temporary injunction during the pendency of the proceedings, in order that full force and effect may be given to the judgment which may be rendered herein, then I think the court has the implied, if not the inherent, power to issue a temporary injunction in aid of the quo warranto proceeding.

I am therefore of the opinion that the demurrer should be overruled, and that a temporary injunction should issue.

All concur as to paragraphs 1 and 2 (Bond, J., in result), except Walker, J., who dissents from the opinion in toto. Lamm, Ch. J., and Graves and Bond, JJ., concur in the third paragraph; Bond, J., in result. Brown, Walker, and Faris, JJ., dissent as to the third paragraph.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

MICHAEL BAUM, Appt.,
v.
SOMERVILLE WATER COMPANY.

(— N. J. —, 87 Atl. 140.)

Water — deficient supply — liability for fire.

A public water company is not liable to an individual for loss by fire resulting from an insufficient supply of water at insufficient pressure at fire hydrants to extinguish a fire, unless there be a contract between the parties for a sufficient supply at sufficient pressure.

(June 18, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the failure of defendant to maintain sufficient pressure to extinguish a fire which had started on plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James L. Griggs, with Messrs. Condict, Condict, & Boardman, for appellant:

The duty of the water company toward the public, considered as individuals, is to use reasonable care to furnish a reasonable supply of water at the fire hydrants, under reasonable pressure for fire purposes, and this duty is independent of any contract between the municipality and the water company, and a failure on the part of the company to perform this duty, resulting in special injury to an individual, is actionable.

When a water company possessed of the right of eminent domain, and of franchise to lay its pipes in the streets of the municipality, undertakes the public service of Headnote by WALKER, C.

Note. — BAUM v. SOMERVILLE WATER CO. differs from most of the cases involving the liability of a water company to an individual property owner for failure to furnish sufficient pressure of water for fire purposes, in that the attempt was to predicate the liability on the general duty assumed by the water company as a public utility, and not upon a definite contract with the municipality or with the individual property owner, to furnish water for fire purposes.

The right of a property owner to maintain an action against a water company for failure to supply water for fire purposes, as required by its contract with the municipality, is treated in the notes to Howsmon v. Trenton Water Co. 23 L.R.A. 146, and Hone v. Presque Isle Water Co. 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1021. See also in this connection 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It is the duty of a public service corporation enjoying special franchises, and having entered upon the performance of a public calling, to exercise those franchises, and practise its public calling, with reasonable care and in a reasonable manner.

One who undertakes any act and enters into the performance of it, contract or no contract, consideration or no consideration, is bound to use reasonable care in the doing of that which he undertakes.

Any person who undertakes the performance of an act which, if not done with care and skill, will be highly dangerous to the persons or lives of others, is charged with a public duty to exercise such care and skill.

A water company is under no liability in damages to an individual, upon the theory of public duty.

Dudley v. Camden & P. Ferry Co. 42 N. J. L. 25, 36 Am. Rep. 501.

Walker, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the afternoon of July 8, 1909, plaintiff's stove factory and warehouse at Somerville were destroyed by fire. Within the door of the warehouse plaintiff had a coil of fire hose equipped with nozzle and coupling. Directly in front of the door was a fire hydrant owned by the defendant company; also a similar hydrant on the plaintiff's grounds, with hose attached. Rising from the roof of the iron works was a standpipe which was equipped with a fire hose. At the time of the fire the hose from the hydrants and standpipe was used and directed toward the fire, but the streams were inadequate, and none of them reached the fire. The department sent the hose company and the engine company, but they were unable to put out the fire for lack of sufficient water at sufficient pressure. The defendant company was incorporated for the purpose of supplying the towns of Somerville and Raritan with water. It had assumed, plaintiff contends, the duty of using reasonable care that there should be a constant supply of water at the fire hydrants under reasonable pressure for fire purposes, and the action was brought to recover his loss resulting, as he alleges, from failure on the part of the defendant to supply sufficient water at sufficient pressure to extinguish the fire.

The questions involved in this appeal arise out of the admission and rejection of evidence and the charge to the jury; and, as stated by plaintiff's counsel, the serious question involved arose out of the very nature and theory of the action; for, although the court may have erred in the admission and exclusion of evidence and in the charge to the jury, yet, if the cause of action does not rest upon sound principles, such errors are harmless. We think that the question as to whether or not there is in law any liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is of the very essence of the action, and is dispositive of the case.

There is disclosed no contractual relation between the plaintiff and defendant, and therein this cause differs from Middlesex Water Co. v. Knappmann Whiting Co. 64 N. J. L. 240, 49 L.R.A. 572, 81 Am. St. Rep. 467, 45 Atl. 692, where a company incorporated to supply water entered into a contract to furnish water to the owner of a factory with pressure sufficient for fire purposes, which factory was destroyed by fire by reason of the failure of the company to perform its agreement, and it was held that the company was liable for the damages sustained. The case at bar is more like the recent one in this court of Hall v. Passaic Water Co. 83 N. J. L. 771, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 750, 85 Atl. 349. In that case a water company was sought to be held liable for damages resulting to a mill through fire, under a contract alleged to have been made between the owner of the factory and the superintendent of the water company for a supply of water of a certain pressure at the various openings of standpipes and water pipes in the factory. The testimony failed to establish the making of the contract sued on, and the court held that the defendant company was not liable.

The gravamen of plaintiff's case here, as stated by himself, is that, had there been a reasonable supply of water at the standpipe and hydrants in and about his factory at the time of the fire, it would have been extinguished without loss. His position is that a duty was owed to the public to supply sufficient water of sufficient pressure to extinguish fires. To support this position, he cites, among other cases, State, Olmsted, Prosecutor, v. Morris Aqueduct, 46 N. J. L. 495, in which the proprietors of the Morris aqueduct sought to condemn lands and divert streams of water to such extent as was necessary to carry out the purposes of the corporation, and the language of the supreme court to the effect that it is well known that, when a company undertakes to supply a town with water, the original methods to obtain water to extinguish fires are abandoned by the people, and that, under such circumstances, it would be gross negligence in the company to permit the supply of water to be intermitted or diminished to any considerable extent, and thus endanger the property within the town, was employed in combating the plaintiff's contention that the defendant could not exercise the power of eminent domain further than to supply Morristown with water, when in fact the company had extended its pipes, and was supplying persons living outside of Morristown. Also Long Branch Commission v. Tintern Manor Water Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 71, 62 Atl. 474, a case of contention between the municipality and the water company concerning rates to be charged by the company to the municipality and private consumers for the use of water, where the matters submitted for adjudication were, what compensation ought the defendant to have for supplying water to the inhabitants of the territory governed by the commission, how should that compensation be distributed between the municipality and the private consumers, and how between the private consumers themselves. Although there was language used by the learned vice chancellor who wrote the opinion, to the effect that a company which seeks and obtains a franchise to supply a certain territory with water for public and domestic uses is under obligation to furnish a supply which shall be equal to all emergencies which may be reasonably anticipated, including unusual droughts and unusual conflagrations, and to bear constantly in mind the prospective increase in population and a constant increase in demand for water, this observation was made with reference to the necessity of the company increasing its supply of water because of an increased consumption of it incident to increased population in the territory, and is no authority for the proposition that a water company is responsible to an individual property owner for damages suffered by him through fire, in the absence of contractual relation between the two with reference to a supply of water for fire extinguishing purposes.

It will be observed that the language used by the judges in State, Olmsted, Prosecutor, v. Morris Aqueduct and Long Branch Commission v. Tintern Manor Water Co. was not spoken with reference to the liability of those companies with reference to an inadequate supply of water, or lack of supply at a certain pressure, but with reference to their duty generally of acquiring the sources of supply and providing for an adequate supply,—duties of a public character, the performance of which, by the public in appropriate proceedings, could doubtless be compelled.

The case in hand, then, narrows itself to the question of duty or no duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff at the time of the fire. As we have already seen, if there had been a contract between the parties as in Middlesex Water Co. v. Knappmann Whiting Co., there would doubtless have been liability on the part of the defendant company, and that even though an inadequate supply of water at the fire was the result of some accidental cause at the time unknown to the water company, upon the principle that where damages under such circumstances result, the one of two persons who must bear the loss shall be he who has agreed to sustain it. But, in the absence of a contract, no liability exists on the part of the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff. The common law does not impose such a liability, and we have not been pointed to any statute which creates it. In the absence of contract it does not exist.

This case was submitted to the jury under instructions which contained no error prejudicial to the plaintiff. The jury found for the defendant, and the judgment, based upon that finding, must be sustained.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
EX REL. ROBERT SIMPSON COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

OTTO KEMPNER et al., Appts.

Search warrant — determination of right to property.

Where by statute a search warrant may be issued when property has been stolen or embezzled, when it is used as a means of committing a felony, and when it is in possession of any person with the intent to use it as a means of committing an offense, the court cannot determine the right, as between the alleged owner and the one from whose possession it was taken, to property seized under a search warrant, upon the allegation that it was stolen by a stranger who is not prosecuted for the offense.

Note. — Trial of right to property in proceedings instituted by search warrant.

There is very little direct authority upon this question.

As a general proposition, it would seem that a court cannot decide the right to property in proceedings instituted by search warrant in any case except for the purpose of disposing of the property in the custody of the law when taken in aid of a public prosecution, upon the ground that any other construction would render the statute unconstitutional as authorizing an unreasonable search and seizure.

The decision rendered by the appellate division in the reported case, to the effect that the pledgee of property taken on a search warrant was entitled to a writ of prohibition against the magistrate who was about to determine the ownership of the property, under § 687 of the Code, which provides that, "if property stolen or embezzled come into the custody of a magistrate, it must, unless its temporary retention be deemed necessary in furtherance of justice, be delivered to the owner on satisfactory proof of his title, and on his paying the necessary expenses incurred in its preservation, to be certified by the magistrate," was upon the ground that the statute was unconstitutional, as denying due process of law for failure to provide for notice to be given to the pledgee as to the time or place at which the right to the possession of the articles in question shall be heard and determined. 154 App. Div. 674, 139 N. Y. Supp. 440.

The court of appeals apparently assumes that § 687 of the Code has no application in a case like the present, where the property was not taken in aid of a criminal APPPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for Kings County denying an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the determination of the title to certain personal property in a proceeding under a search warrant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John M. Perry, with Mr. James C. Cropsey, for appellants:

"The writ" of prohibition "does not issue as a matter of right, but only in the sound discretion of the court in cases of supreme necessity, where the grievance cannot be remedied by ordinary proceedings at law or in equity or by appeal."

prosecution, upon the ground that search warrant proceedings can be used only in the furtherance of criminal prosecutions.

The facts in Modern Loan Co. v. Police Ct. 12 Cal. App. 582, 108 Pac. 56, are very similar to the case of PEOPLE EX REL. ROBERT SIMPSON CO. v. KEMPNER, it appearing that search warrant proceedings were instituted apparently for the sole purpose of gaining summary possession of property alleged to have been stolen and in the possession of a third person, without any effort to apprehend the thief, and it was held that §§ 1408 and 1409 of the California Penal Code, which authorize the disposition and award of personal property seized under search warrants, were unconstitutional, as denying due process of law for failure to provide for the giving of notice to interested parties, or to afford them an opportunity to be heard on such proceedings, and that therefore judgment making permanent a writ of prohibition to prevent the magistrate from proceeding to determine the ownership of property taken on a search warrant was properly entered. The court said, however, concluding its opinion: "We think that it was never intended under the circumstances of this case, that the right of possession of property should be adjudicated by a magistrate, especially when the law has provided the means for settling such question by the ordinary action of claim and delivery."

In State v. Williams, 61 Iowa, 517, 16 N. W. 586, it was held that the court had no right, against the objection of the defendant, who had been acquitted of the offense of larceny of money taken from him by a search warrant, to impanel a jury and determine the ownership of the money. It was said the acquittal of the defendant justified the presumption that the money had not been stolen, and that the defendant was entitled to go out of the court, and be placed in the situation he was in before the money was taken, leaving any claimant of the money to pursue his remedy by an action in his own name.

In Houghton v. Bachman, 47 Barb. 388, it was said that the order of the magistrate, in disposing of property alleged to have been stolen, when taken into the custody of law to aid in the prosecution, upon proof of ownership as provided by statute, was not intended to have any effect to settle the question of title, that the accused from whom the property has been taken is not thereby deprived of his property, but is still at liberty to take any legal steps he may choose to recover the property or its possession from the person to whom it was delivered, and that the order of the magistrate would be no estoppel upon the question of title, and the court further said: "Its simple and only operation is to dispose of the possession of property already in the custody of the law, leaving the title open to vindication by any party claiming to have it." In this case it appears that the search warrant was not actually served for the reason that the officer discovered the property without a search while making the arrest, and took possession thereof by virtue of the warrant of arrest, which he had a right to do, but the disposition of the property was the same under the statute as when taken by a search warrant.

Under a statute providing for the taking of testimony by the magistrate where the grounds upon which a search warrant was issued are controverted, and for the restoration of the property to the person from whom it was taken, where it appears there is no probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds upon which the warrant was issued, and for the delivery of the property to the owner in case the property was stolen or embezzled upon his making satisfactory proof of his ownership or of his right to possession thereto,—an adjudication by the magistrate as to the owner is binding and conclusive until reversed, where the rival claimants appear and submit the issue of ownership upon testimony adduced, although there was no prosecution for larceny or embezzlement, as the statute does not require the filing of an information accusing some person of the larceny as a condition precedent to the issuing a search warrant. Haworth v. Newell, 102 Iowa, 541, 71 N. W. 404; Mont-

The fact that the respondent was deprived of its possession of the rings did not in any way affect its lien, if it had a lien.

The proceeding before the magistrate, which it is sought in this action to prohibit, in no way affects title.

In *Haworth v. The process is also useful in many cases in discovering and restoring to its proper owner stolen or embezzled property. But such proceedings are not designed for the final adjudication of disputed questions of title to property of that character. The trial authorized is by the magistrate without a jury. The proceedings are in the name of the state, and it is not necessary that there be any other party to them, although it is no doubt true that claimants of the property may so far identify themselves with the proceedings, and present such issues, as to be bound by the adjudication."

And in Montgomery v. Alden, supra, it was said: "We may assume that ordinarily a finding in a search warrant proceeding is 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator is a domestic corporation engaged in business as a licensed pawnbroker. On and prior to January 26, 1912, it was in possession of two diamond rings which it held as security for a loan of $15 made to the person who delivered the rings to it. A woman claims that she is the owner of said rings, and that they were stolen from her by her maid and pawned by said maid to the relator. No one has been convicted of the alleged theft. On January 27th an information was filed with a magistrate charging said maid with the crime of grand larceny in stealing said rings, and a warrant was issued for her arrest, but it was not executed because she was then in custody serving a sentence after pleading guilty to a charge of committing another crime. On January 26th said woman, claiming to be the owner of the rings, submitted to a magistrate an affidavit upon which he issued a search warrant, in the form provided by the Code of Criminal Procedure, directing that search be made for said rings. The warrant was served January 27th, and 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the rings were found and taken by the officer serving the warrant from the relator, and he held them for production before said magistrate upon the return of the warrant. A voluntary and informal notice was given to the relator by the officer serving the warrant, of the time when the return to said warrant would be made to the magistrate. At the time mentioned the relator appeared by counsel and asserted its right to the possession of said rings, and its constitutional authority to have its property rights in said rings and the possession thereof determined in a civil action. The magistrate threatened to hear and determine the validity of the relator's alleged lien on the property taken pursuant to the search warrant, and, in the event of its being determined upon such hearing that the relator's alleged lien is invalid, that the said property would be delivered to whoever was found to be the owner and entitled to the possession thereof. An adjournment was then taken. Application was thereupon made for an absolute writ of prohibition, which was denied by the special term, and granted upon appeal to the appellate division.

A search warrant is an order in writing, in the name of the people, signed by a magistrate, directed to a peace officer, commanding him to search for personal property and bring it before the magistrate. Code of Crim. Proc. § 791. It may be issued upon one of three grounds: (1) When the property was stolen or embezzled; (2) when it was used as the means of committing a felony; (3) when it is in the possession of any person with the intent to use it as the means of committing a public offense. Code Crim. Proc. § 792. In each of the cases last mentioned it is provided from whom the property may be taken under the warrant.

A search warrant cannot be issued for any purpose, except as stated. Its legitimate use is, and always has been, to aid in the detection and punishment of crime. As such it has been in common use since the days of Lord Coke. It was mentioned by him in the Institutes (Bk. 4, pp. 176, 177). Referring to search warrants, he says: "For justices of the peace to make warrants upon surmises, for breaking the houses of any subjects to search for felons or stolen goods, is against Magna Charta." Sir Matthew Hale in his History of the Pleas of the Crown (vol. 2, p. 149) does not fully agree with Lord Coke, but explains the business of a search warrant, and the purposes for which it is used, and says: "I thought fit to 'insert this business in this place: (1) Because it is a business preparatory to the discovery of felons, and preparing evidence against them, and to the helping of persons robbed to their goods. (2) Because it is found by experience of great use and necessity, especially in these times where felonies and robberies are so frequent. And therefore this means of discovering them is now grown common and usual, much more than in ancient times; and if it should be disused or discountenanced, it would be of public inconvenience; and therefore I can by no means subscribe to that opinion of my Lord Coke's, 4 Inst. cap. 31, p. 178, as it is there generally set down "that justices of peace have no power upon a bare surmise to break open any man's house to search for a felon or stolen goods either in the day or night." Referring to the goods found, Sir Matthew Hale says (p. 151): "As touching the goods brought before him, if it appears they were not stolen, they are to be restored to the possessor; if it appears they were stolen, they are not to be delivered to the proprietor, but deposited in the hand of the sheriff or constable, to the end the party robbed may proceed by indicting and convicting the offender to have restitution." See also Burns's, J. P. pp. 176, 179; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 5th Am. ed. from 2d London ed. p. 67.

There were formerly three means of restitution of goods to the party from whom they were stolen: (1) By appeal of robbery or larceny. If the party were convicted thereupon, restitution of the goods contained in the appeal was to be made to the appellant, for it is one of the ends of that suit. (2) By the statute 21 Hen. VIII. chap. 11. And (3) by the course of the common law. But after the felon is convicted, it can be no color of crime to take his goods again when he (the owner) finds them, because he hath pursued the law upon him, and may have his writ of restitution if he pleases. 4 Burns's, J. P. pp. 111, 115; Hale, P. C. pp. 538, 546. After goods were taken into the possession of the court, restitution to the owner was, at least to an extent, dependent upon his prosecuting the thief. The prospect of restitution was thus made an incentive to the performance of public duty in bringing the criminal to justice. Until the person charged with the theft was convicted or acquitted, the courts would not sustain an action even by a third person for the possession of the goods.

It thus appears with reasonable certainty that in England and the American colonies the search warrant was a process used preparatory to the discovery of felons, in preparing evidence against them, and to help persons robbed to recover their goods, and not to try the title of or right to the possession of goods and chattels. There did not exist at the time of the adoption of our state Constitution in 1777, any right by the common or statute law of England and Great Britain to try the title to goods and chattels before a magistrate upon the return of a search warrant. Such right did not form a part of the law of the colony of New York on the 19th day of April in the year of our Lord 1775.

It appears in Bell v. Clapp, 10 Johns. 263, 6 Am. Dec. 339, that search warrants in accordance with the English practice were (1813) issued and enforced by the courts in this state. That practice doubtless continued, as we have not found a statute in this state providing generally for search warrants prior to the Revised Statutes of 1829 (pt. 4, title 7, chap. 2, art. 3, §§ 25 to 28, inclusive). See also §§ 30-34, inclusive.

A century ago it was deemed necessary, for the purpose of preserving the civil remedy of a person injured or aggrieved by a felony, to provide by statute that "in no case whatever shall the right of action of the party injured be deemed taken or adjudged to be merged in the felony or in any manner affected thereby." Rev. Laws 1813, p. 499, § 20; Rev. Stat., pt. 3, title 1, chap. 4, § 2; Code Proc. 1857, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 1899. The basis for a search warrant under the Revised Statutes is a complaint upon oath that "personal property has been stolen or embezzled, and that the complainant suspects that such property is concealed in any particular house or place." The Revised Statutes mentioned remained in full force until repealed by the Code of Criminal Procedure, which was adopted by chapter 442 of the Laws of 1881, and §§ 791-810 and 685-689, inclusive, of that Code, were then enacted. The grounds upon which a search warrant was authorized by the Revised Statutes were somewhat enlarged by the Code. The basis for the search warrant prescribed by the Code is, however, the same in general character as stated in the Revised Statutes and as established by the old English practice. A search warrant under the Revised Statutes and under the Code, like the search warrant under the old practice, is in the nature of a criminal process, and we repeat that its purpose is to aid in the detection and punishment of crime. It has no relation whatever to civil process or civil trials.

Section 807 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is new, and provides: "If the grounds on which the warrant was issued be controverted, the magistrate must proceed to take testimony in relation thereto." This section, although new in form, is in accordance with the practice as it has always existed. The grounds on which a search warrant may be issued are stated in § 792; and it is provided in § 793 that "a search warrant cannot be issued but upon probable cause supported by affidavit naming or describing the person, and particularly describing the property and the place to be searched." Any person interested may controvert there being probable cause for issuing the warrant. The magistrate may take further testimony relating thereto, and, if he determine such controversy in favor of the person from whose possession the property was taken, he should by order return such property to him. Section 809.

There is nothing in any of the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure that authorizes a trial of the title to or possession of the property taken under the warrant.

In Robinson v. Richardson, 13 Gray, 454, 456, the court, in 1859, say: "Search warrants were never recognized by the common law as processes which might be availed of by individuals in the course of civil proceedings, or for the maintenance of any mere private right; but their use was confined to cases of public prosecutions, instituted and pursued for the suppression of crime or the detection and punishment of criminals. Even in those cases, if we may rely on the authority of Lord Coke, their legality was formerly doubted; and Lord Camden said that they crept into the law by imperceptible practice. But their legality has long been considered to be established on the ground of public necessity, because without them felons and other malefactors would escape detection. Entick v. Carrington, 19 How. St. Tr. 1067; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 64. . . . All searches, therefore, which are instituted and pursued upon the complaint or suggestion of one party into the house or possessions of another, in order to secure a personal advantage, and not with any design to afford aid in the administration of justice in reference to acts or offenses in violation of penal laws, must be held to be unreasonable, and consequently under our constitution unwarrantable, illegal, and void."

The case of Simpson v. St. John, 93 N. Y. 363, did not hold to the contrary. It was in that case held, as it was held in colonial days, that where goods are in the custody of a criminal court, pending the prosecution of the person alleged to have stolen them, their retention is within the police power, although a third person asserts his title and right to the immediate possession of such goods. The court in the Simpson Case sustained the defendant, the property clerk of the magistrate before whom the criminal proceeding was pending, in his refusal to deliver the goods to the sheriff on his demand, pursuant to papers in his possession as sheriff, in an action by a third person to recover possession of the goods.

a search warrant comes into the possession of a magistrate or court from the person or possession of one charged with crime, and such person is thereafter convicted of having stolen the property that is so in the possession of the magistrate or court from the person claiming to be the owner thereof, and there are no third persons claiming such property, it has doubtless been the practice, so long as there is any record of it, to order the property delivered to the person who, as appears by the testimony taken upon the trial, is the owner thereof. Such an order is analogous to the obsolete writ of restitution. When, however, the property has been taken by a search warrant from the possession of a third person, and there is a controversy between the person from whom it is claimed that the property was stolen and the person from whom the possession of the property was taken by the search warrant, as to which is entitled to the possession thereof, a question is presented that cannot be determined upon a criminal process. It is a matter wholly between the contending parties, and of no direct concern to the state. It must be determined in a civil action, in which the parties are by Constitution entitled to notice and a hearing, and, if demanded, to a trial of the issue by jury. Modern Loan Co. v. Police Ct. 12 Cal. App. 582, 108 Pac. 56.

The order should be affirmed, without costs.

(June 17, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Schenectady County, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James O. Carr, for appellant:

The statement which Carlsen says Green-er made to him occurred after the accident was over, and was not a part of the res gestæ.

Mr. Edgar T. Brackett, with Messrs. Fryer & Lewis, for respondent:

The ladder which bent and precipitated the plaintiff's intestate to the floor was a permanent structure, and while in ordinary use, it gave way. Under such circumstances, negligence is necessarily imputed to the master, and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages of the defendant for being the cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, an employee. In substance, the alleged negligence was that the defendant had provided for the use of its workmen a defective and insecure ladder, in connection with an overhead crane erected in its works, from which the deceased fell, or was thrown, to the floor of the building. The facts disclosed by the evidence were such as to warrant the jurors in finding that the deceased, who was employed as a "rigger," upon the day in question was standing on top of the carriage of the crane, when he was called to by the crane repairman, from the floor, to come down and to assist in hoisting up a piece of machinery; that, in attempting to comply with the order and to descend from his position, he stepped upon an iron ladder, extending from a crane cage, which depended from the cross girders on which the crane carriage moved, for the purpose of reaching the lateral girders and of thus using another ladder to get to the floor; that this mode of ascending, or descending, from floor to crane, was not prohibited, nor unusual; that the crane ladder, which was bolted to the floor and to the top of the crane carriage, and extended some 3 or 4 feet above it, unattached, was inadequate to the strain of the weight of the deceased, when subjected to it on this occasion; that it had bent under him, throwing him to the floor; and that, as the result of injuries then received, he had subsequently died.

Without otherwise referring to the evidence, we think that the judgment appealed from might stand, were it not for a serious error committed by the trial court in the reception in evidence of a declaration of the deceased, made to a fellow workman after his fall, and which may have influenced the decision by the jurors of the question of fact. Whatever we may consider to have been the sufficiency of the other evidence, we could, and should, not assume that a declaration, made under such circumstances, may not have had its effect upon the jurors' minds. A witness, also employed as a "rigger," and who was standing a few feet away from where the deceased had fallen, went over to him, and, as he lay there, "asked him what had happened." Over the objection of the defendant, he was then allowed to state what the deceased said, and an exception was taken to the ruling. The witness testified: "When I asked him what had happened, he said: 'My feet is broke; the ladder bent over.'" The admission in evidence of the declarations of an injured person constitutes an exception to the general rule that excludes hearsay evidence, and is only justified when the declarations are spontaneous utterances, or exclamations. There is no confusion in the decisions of this court upon this question. Waldele v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 274, 47 Am. Rep. 41; Martin v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 626, 9 N. E. 505; People v. Del Vermo, 192 N. Y. 470, 85 N. E. 680. In Waldele v. New York C. & H. R. Co. the question was carefully considered, and the authorities were reviewed. There, the testimony of a witness as to what the injured person had declared, a few minutes after the accident, as to how it happened, was admitted, and, for the error in the admission, the plaintiff's judgment was reversed. The vice of the evidence was held to be in the declaration being narrative of the past transaction, and thus depending for its truth upon the reliability of the statements of the deceased and the veracity of the witness. The decision was followed in Martin v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. In People v. Del Vermo, the witness was walking with the deceased and the defendant, when the former fell upon the sidewalk. The witness asked him "What is the matter?" and the deceased answered, "Del Vermo stabbed me with a knife." The admission of the witness's evidence as to this declaration was held proper "as a part of the res gestæ in the broadest sense of the term." Judge Willard Bartlett again considered the question with much care, in the light of our and of other decisions, and held that the testimony was properly received. The declaration so accompanied the occurrence of the assault as to come within the exception to the general rule.

The distinction to be made is in the character of the declaration, whether it be so spontaneous, or natural, an utterance as to exclude the idea of fabrication, or whether it be in the nature of a narrative of what had occurred. In the present case, the declaration of the deceased was not spontaneous; it was called forth by the inquiry as to "what had happened," and was distinctly narrative. As it was observed in the dissenting opinion below, "it was, in effect, a statement that the falling was not accidental, nor due to the negligence of plaintiff's intestate, but that it was due to an occurrence upon which might be predicated negligence upon the part of the defendant."

For the error pointed out, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial had; costs to abide the event.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted for violating subdivision 3 of § 290 of the highway law, being chapter 374, Laws of 1910, which enacts: "3. Punishment . . . for going away without stopping after accident and making himself known. . . . Any person operating a motor vehicle, who, knowing that injury has been caused to a person or property, due to the culpability of the said operator, or to accident, leaves the place of said injury or accident, without stopping and giving his name, residence, including street and street number, and operator's license number to the injured party, or to a police officer, or in case no police officer is in the vicinity of the place of said injury or accident, then reporting the same to the nearest police station, or judicial officer, shall be guilty of a felony punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." The demurrer was sustained by the courts below (in the appellate division by a divided court) on the ground that the statute was unconstitutional as in violation of § 6, article 1, of the Constitution of the state, which provides that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself;" and this is the only question presented by this appeal.

Similar statutes have been passed in other states, and it has been literally reproduced in the laws of the state of Missouri. The theory on which the learned trial judge proceeded was that the statute in effect required the person operating the motor to furnish evidence tending to prove him guilty of a crime; for if the injury to a person was the result of the culpable negligence of the operator, the latter was guilty either of an assault or of a homicide, depending on whether the injuries inflicted were fatal or not. The indictment contained two counts, the first charging the injury to persons named therein to be due to the defendant's culpability; the second, that it was due to accident.

A demurrer must lie, if at all, to the whole of an indictment. The second count negatives any criminality on the part of the defendant, thus charging a case in which the defendant would not be liable for any criminal prosecution. However, in my opinion, the statute does not provide for two offenses, or provide for an offense being committed in two different ways. The object of the provision, "Knowing that injury has been caused to a person or property, due to the culpability of said operator, or to an accident," is to make the statute more clearly applicable to all cases, however caused, than would be apparent if these words were omitted. The question, then, is whether a statute which requires a person to report the happening of an occurrence which may, though not necessarily must, involve a crime on his part, is a violation of the constitutional provision referred to.

The statute does not require the operator of the motor vehicle to state the circumstances of the occurrence tending to show his responsibility, but merely to stop and identify himself. Undoubtedly it does require him to make known a fact which will be a link in the chain of evidence to convict him of crime, if in fact he has been guilty of one. Whether the compulsory furnishing of such a link is a constitutional violation may be questioned. The learned judge who wrote for the minority of the appellate division has presented in his opinion a very strong argument in support of the proposition that the statute is a valid exercise of the police power apart from considerations of the peculiar character of a motor car. Since the decision of this case in the appellate division, the question has been presented to the supreme court of Missouri, which, in a very forceful opinion, adopted the view entertained by the judges who dissented in this case, in preference to that of the majority. Ex parte Kneedler, 243 Mo. 632, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 622, 147 S. W. 983, Ann. Cas. 1913 C, 923. In the opinion of the learned court of Missouri reference is made to statutory enactments, at least partially similar in principle to that before us, the validity of which has either been upheld by the courts or has never been questioned. As to motor vehicles, laws requiring the registry of the names of their owners and chauffeurs, and the display of the numbers of the vehicles in a conspicuous place thereon, for the very purpose of identifying the car and the person operating it, have been upheld. People v. Schneider, 139 Mich. 673, 69 L.R.A. 345, 103 N. W. 172, 5 Ann. Cas. 790. See Frankfort & P. Pass R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 58 Pa. 119, 98 Am. Dec. 242; St. Louis v. Williams, 235 Mo. 503, 139 S. W. 340. Physicians are required to report deaths and their causes, druggists the sale of poisons, and failure to comply with these requirements is made a misdemeanor. Penal law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 40), § 1743; public health law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 45), § 235. Labor law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 31), § 87, requires a person in charge of any factory to report to the commissioner of labor all deaths, accidents, or injuries, and the details thereof. Compliance with any of these statutory regulations may, in the case of the commission of a crime by the person who is required to make the certificate or registry, prove an important factor in leading to his detection; but this is not sufficient to render the legislation invalid. Whether, as claimed by the respondent's counsel, the statute before us goes so much further in the way of self-incrimination as to render the illustrations referred to inapplicable, it is not necessary to definitely determine.

There is one ground upon which, in my opinion, the validity of the statute can be safely placed. The legislature might prohibit altogether the use of motor vehicles upon the highways or streets of the state. It has been so held in State v. Mayo, 106 Me. 62, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 502, 75 Atl. 295, 20 Ann. Cas. 512, and Com. v. Kingsbury, 199 Mass. 542, 127 Am. St. Rep. 513, 85 N. E. 848. Doubtless the legislature could not prevent citizens from using the highways in the ordinary manner, nor would the mere fact that the machine used for the movement of persons or things along the highway was novel justify its exclusion. But the right to use the highway by any person must be exercised in a mode consistent with the equal rights of others to use the highway. That the motor vehicle, on account of its size and weight, of its great power, and of the great speed which it is capable of attaining, creates, unless managed by careful and competent operators, a most serious danger, both to other travelers on the highway and to the occupants of the vehicles themselves, is too clearly a matter of common knowledge to justify discussion. The fatalities caused by them are so numerous as to permit the legislature, if it deemed it wise, to wholly forbid their use. Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 47 L. ed. 323, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; People v. Persce, 204 N. Y. 397, 97 N. E. 877. If the legislature may declare it a crime to use a motor vehicle on the highway under any circumstances, I do not see why it may not equally declare it a crime to so use such a vehicle as to injure anyone in person or property. That, in effect, is a diminution, not an increase, of the criminality it had the power to attribute to the use of a motor vehicle. The provision now before us is but a still further diminution of the statutory inhibition the legislature would be authorized to enact. It does not declare it a crime to operate an automobile on the highway, or even that, in its operation, injury to persons or property shall be a crime, but only that failure by the operator, in case of such injury, to identify himself, shall be criminal. I cannot see why the greater power does not include the less. Of course, the whole of this argument rests on the proposition that in operating a motor vehicle the operator exercises a privilege which might be denied him, and not a right, and that in a case of a privilege the legislature may prescribe on what conditions it shall be exercised. This principle was recognized by us in the case of Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 94 N. E. 431, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 156, 1 N. C. C. A. 517. In that case we conceded that in a work of such a nature that the legislature might prohibit its exercise altogether, it might prescribe the terms on which it could be carried on. It is in this respect that the case before us differs vitally from that of People ex rel. Ferguson v. Reardon, 197 N. Y. 236, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 141, 134 Am. St. Rep. 871, 90 N. E. 829, where it was held unconstitutional to compel a broker to deliver his private papers to the comptroller for examination, so that the latter might discover whether the broker had committed a crime in failing to comply with the statute imposing a tax on stock sales. The sale of property (of course we do not refer to exceptional articles, liquors, poisons, and others) is a natural right, protected by our Constitution. People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343. I do not assert that all constitutional privileges may be waived as a condition to the exercise of privileges granted by the legislature. Certain ones cannot be waived, but others may. Vose v. Cockcroft, 44 N. Y. 415; New York v. Manhatten R. Co. 143 N. Y. 1, 37 N. E. 494; Dodge v. Cornelius, 168 N. Y. 242, 61 N. E. 244; Musco v. United Surety Co. 196 N. Y. 459, 134 Am. St. Rep. 851, 90 N. E. 171. I might hesitate even in a case like the present one in upholding a statute which required the operator of a vehicle to appear and be examined as a witness on the trial of a criminal prosecution against himself for his conduct in the occurrence. But this statute goes to no such extent. It is similar to the statute regulating the places where liquor is sold. The owners are required, during the hours and days when sales are made unlawful, to keep the places of sale open to the public view, so if the vendor violates the law, he may be detected. The validity of this regulation has never been questioned. So, also, a requirement that vendors shall report the sales of liquor, and exhibit their books, showing such sales, has been held not to violate the privilege against self-incrimination. State v. Smith, 74 Iowa, 580, 38 N. W. 492; State v. Cummins, 76 Iowa, 133, 40 N. W. 124; People v. Henwood, 123 Mich. 317, 92 N. W. 70.

The learned counsel for the respondent cites in support of his position the opinion of O'Brien, J., in Re Peck, 167 N. Y. 391, 53 L.R.A. 888, 60 N. E. 775. But that opinion, so far as it discusses the question here involved, received the approval of no other member of the court. See erratum in vol. 168 N. Y. It is not necessary to discuss at length the history and nature of the constitutional inhibition against being compelled to testify against oneself in a criminal case. That subject has received a most elaborate review in the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Moody in the Supreme Court of the United States in Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 53 L. ed. 97, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14. It is sufficient to say that to permit its voluntary waiver violates no fundamental guaranty of liberty or personal right. On the contrary, since 1869 in this state, and I think now throughout the whole country, a defendant in a criminal case is permitted to testify in his own behalf; but when he does so, he waives his constitutional privilege, and his examination is subject to the same rules as any other witness, and his guilt or bad character may be proved from his own mouth. Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 265; Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240; People v. Webster, 139 N. Y. 73-84, 34 N. E. 730; People v. De Garmo, 179 N. Y. 130-134, 71 N. E. 736; People v. Hinksman, 192 N. Y. 421-433, 85 N. E. 676. Moreover, as already said, the operator is not obliged to report the circumstances from which his culpability may be inferred, and if he be culpable it does not necessarily follow that he has been guilty of a crime. A long distance separates the negligence which renders one criminally liable from that which establishes civil liability. That a defendant can be compelled as a witness to testify to facts establishing his civil liability is unquestionable. This statute does not prescribe any new criminal liability for injury to persons by a motor vehicle. The operator commits a crime only when his conduct is such as would, in any other action on his part producing like results, make him a criminal. The primary object of the statute, in my judgment, is not to convict any person of crime, but to subject him to civil liability. I appreciate that when examined as a witness in a civil suit the defendant might claim his privilege. I also appreciate that the right to justify a disobedience of this statute by proof that the circumstances rendered him liable to criminal prosecution would be of little advantage to the defendant. He would acquit himself of one crime only by convicting himself of another. Nevertheless, when we bear in mind not only the great danger occasioned by the use of motor vehicles, but also the fact that the great speed at which they can be run enables the person causing injury to readily escape undetected, leaving parties injured in person or property unable to tell from whom they shall get redress, I think it involves no violation of public policy or of the principles of personal liberty to enact that, as a condition of operating such a machine, the operator must waive his constitutional privilege and tell who he is to the party who has been injured, or to the police authorities, if indeed, requiring him to give such information is an impairment of his constitutional privilege, which we do not decide.

The judgment of the Appellate Division and that of the Court of General Sessions should be reversed, and judgment rendered for the people, disallowing the demurrer, with permission to the defendant, at his election, to plead to the indictment.

Werner, Willard Bartlett, Hiscock, Chase, and Collin, JJ., concur.

Hogan, J., dissents:

The statute under consideration requires a person operating a motor vehicle, knowing that injury has been done to a person due to the culpability of the operator to stop and give his name and residence, including street, and street number, and operator's license number, to the injured party, or to a police officer, or, in the absence of a police officer, to make a report to the nearest police station or judicial officer. A failure to comply with the statute is made a felony.

The indictment demurred to alleges that the defendant, while operating a motor vehicle, did run into and strike a carriage in which two ladies were riding, which said running into and striking was due to the culpability of the defendant, and which resulted in the death of one of the ladies and serious injuries to the second lady. A second count of the indictment states the same facts except that the running into and striking was an accident.

If the charge alleged in the first count of the indictment were established, the defendant might be convicted of a homicide (Penal Law, § 1052), and he would also be subject to indictment and conviction for a felony for the failure to furnish evidence which might tend to connect or identify him with the homicide by the statute here considered. From the prevailing opinion I quote the following language: "Undoubtedly it [the statute] does require him [the operator] to make known a fact which will be a link in the chain of evidence to convict him of crime, if in fact he has been guilty of one." For that reason stated, it is my judgment that the statute under consideration is in conflict with § 6 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that "no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

writing, quotes the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Virginia (June, 1807) in Burr's Trial (1 Burr's Trial, 244, Fed. Cas. 14,692a), on the question whether a witness was privileged not to accuse himself, as follows: "If the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it should be, to answer the question or not. If in such a case he may say upon his oath that his answer would criminate himself, the court can demand no testimony of the fact. . . . According to their statement (counsel for the United States) a witness can never refuse to answer any question, unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible, but a probable, case, that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom he is safe, but draw it from thence and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description. What testimony may be possessed, or is obtainable, against any individual, the court can never know. It would seem, then, that the court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws." Judge Bartlett continued: "A clearer and more cogent statement of the rule it would be difficult to find." This language adopted by this court would seem to cover the case at bar. The principle therein laid down, it seems to me, has been upheld in other cases. People ex rel. Taylor v. Forbes, 143 N. Y. 219, 38 N. E. 303; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Intern. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 1 Am. St. Rep. 851, 14 N. E. 319; People ex rel. Ferguson v. Reardon, 197 N. Y. 236, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 141, 134 Am. St. Rep. 871, 90 N. E. 829.

While the defendant in the case at bar might waive a constitutional provision, and incriminate himself, the legislature is powerless to enact a law which will require him to waive such a provision involving his personal liberty as a condition precedent to operating a motor vehicle upon the highway. While the conduct of an operator of a vehicle, in the failure to stop and render aid to an injured party, is to be deplored, the remedy here sought to correct the evil is an infringement upon the rights of individuals protected by the Constitution. Such rights it is the duty of courts to preserve, though the legislation may seem desirable to meet certain cases. Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, 333, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 Ann. Cas. 263; Sherrill v. O'Brien, 188 N. Y. 185, 198, 117 Am. St. Rep. 841, 81 N. E. 124; Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 94 N. E. 431, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 156, 1 N. The judgment should be affirmed.

ROCHESTER TRUST & SAFE DEPOSIT

Note. — Revocation of codicil as affecting will.

As to the revocation of a will by a subsequent will, and the revival of the former by the destruction of the latter, see note to Cheever v. North, 37 L.R.A. 561; and for the subsequent cases as to the effect of the revocation of a later will to revive an earlier one, see notes to Bates v. Hackling, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 937, and Blackett v. Ziegler, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 291.

As stated in the note in 37 L.R.A. 561, a will and a codicil are quite unlike in their effect upon a prior will, for the reason that a later will is by its very nature a revocation of a former will, while a codicil is by its nature a confirmation of the former will except as to its express alteration thereof. And, accordingly, the effect upon a will of the revocation of a codicil thereto presents quite a different question from the effect of the revocation of a subsequent will.

As to the effect of the revocation of a codicil, while the authorities are comparatively few, the general rule would seem to be in accord with OSBURN v. ROCHESTER TRUST & S. D. Co., that such revocation does not necessarily carry with it a revocation of the will.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, sustaining exceptions directed to be heard before it in the first instance and ordering a new trial after judgment of a Trial Term for Monroe County setting aside the probate of the will of Sarah R. Davenport, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Albert H. Stearns, for appellant:

Whether Sarah R. Davenport, by the destruction of her codicil, destroyed her will, does not depend upon her intention.

Thus, in Re Cook, 5 Clark (Pa.) 1, where the will and codicil involved were written on both sides of a half sheet of paper, the will occupying the whole of one side and about half of the other side, and the codicil filling the remaining part of the half sheet, and the name of the testator and the concluding words of the codicil were torn off, the name and seal to the will remaining intact,—it was held, as a matter of law, in the absence of parol evidence to show an intention of the testator to the contrary, that such tearing and cancellation of the codicil did not destroy the validity and effect of the will, although, in the tearing, a part of the will written on the opposite side of the half sheet was also torn off.

And it has been held that the mere destruction and revocation of a codicil written on a separate piece of paper from the will does not amount to a revocation of the will, although the testator intended, at the time of such destruction, thereby to revoke the will. Malone v. Hobbs, 1 Rob. (Va.) 346, 39 Am. Dec. 263.

But in Re Brookman, 11 Misc. 675, 33 N. Y. Supp. 575, it was held that the testator intended to, and did, revoke the entire instrument, including the will as well as thope, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 14, 56 L. J. Prob. N. S. 55, 57 L. T. N. S. 280, 35 Week. Rep. 352, 50 J. P. 791.

Destruction of the codicil revokes the will.

The testator, upon executing the codicil, revoked a portion of the old will and changed other provisions as to her property, making a new complete testamentary disposition of her property by means of two papers mutually dependent upon each other, not two separate instruments.

The first testamentary disposition of the codicil, it appearing that a paper purporting to be the will of the decedent, who had frequently stated, during the last year of his life, that he had destroyed his will, and a codicil thereto beginning on the same sheet of paper upon which the will ended, with only a short blank space between, both instruments being securely tied together in one cover, were found among a bundle of canceled and worthless papers in the deceased's safe deposit box, with the signature of the deceased to such codicil erased by being crossed out in ink lines, and with the following memorandum in the handwriting of the deceased alongside the canceled signature: "May 20, '92, void, H. D. B." (deceased's initials); and it also appearing that the will, after providing for the testator's widow, divided the remainder of his estate as equally as possible among his three children; that the chief purpose of the codicil had been to readjust one child's share which had declined in value since the making of the will; and that shortly before canceling the signature and making the memorandum on the codicil, the deceased had had trouble with his brother, who was named as executor and trustee in the will, and, in settling their common business interests, had conveyed to him most of the real estate which he had devised to one of his children, against whom there was no reason for discrimination, the deceased's relations with all of his children having been entirely harmonious down to the day of his death.

Where, however, the revocation of a codicil is held not to operate as a revocation of the will, the correct rule would also seem to be, as held in OSBURN v. ROCHESTER TRUST & S. D. Co., that the provisions of the will which were revoked or modified by the codicil are not revived or restored to their original form by the revocation of the codicil, as testamentary provisions once legally revoked require, in most jurisdictions, the same formalities for reinstatement as the testamentary instrument originally required to make it valid as a will.

And, accordingly, in Debac's Goods, 77 L. T. N. S. 374, where it appeared that the testator had duly executed a will and afterward a codicil containing a clause revoking certain parts of the will, but the codicil could not be found at his death,—although the only contention seems to have been as to whether or not the codicil should be probated with and as a part of the will, or whether it had been revoked,—upon the court's holding that the codicil must be treated as having been destroyed by the deceased with the intention of revoking it, the will was admitted to probate only to the extent that it had not been revoked by the codicil.

But in jurisdictions where a mere intention to reinstate a revoked testamentary instrument which has remained intact, or an oral republication thereof, is sufficient, the revocation of a codicil without a revocation of the will would seem to operate to revive the revoked or modified portions of the will,—especially if there is parol evidence that such was the intention of the testator.

So, in Stewart's Estate, 149 Pa. 111, 24 Atl. 174, although it was held only that the orphans' court had committed no error in refusing to grant an issue to determine whether or not a codicil to a will had been destroyed by the testator or by another, it seems to be implied that the will was properly admitted to probate, and that, upon the presumption that the codicil was destroyed by the testator himself, a provision of the will with which the codicil was inconsistent was revived by such destruction, and was a valid part of the will as probated.

In James v. Shrimpton, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 431, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 85, 35 L. T. N. S. 428, 24 Week. Rep. 740, where a widower had executed a will largely in favor of his children and grandchildren, which was subsequently revoked by his remarriage, and thereafter he executed a codicil in which he made a provision for his wife and in all other respects revived, ratified, and confirmed the revoked will; but upon his death, after that of his second wife, the codicil could not be found, he apparently having destroyed it under the misconception that such destruction would leave the will in force, although the revival thereof depended upon the codicil,—it was held that such destruction did not leave the will inoperative, but the court decreed probate of both the will and the codicil as contained in the draft from which the original was prepared for execution, on the ground that, as the testator destroyed the codicil with no intention of revoking the will, the court should give no more effect to the act than it would do if the testator had destroyed the paper under a mistake as to the instrument he was destroying.

property, having been changed by the codicil, can be revived only by means of the formalities required by statute, and it is conceded that none of those formalities have been complied with in the case at bar.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents the question whether the destruction and revocation of a codicil to a will necessarily operates as a revocation of the will. It was held at the trial term that this was the result. The appellate division, however, unanimously held a contrary view.

The question is presented by very simple and entirely undisputed facts. The testatrix duly made and executed a will, and subsequently a codicil, which only modified the former by making an additional bequest of $1,000 before creating and providing for a residuary estate. Apparently, the will and codicil were physically detached and separate instruments. Subsequently the codicil was intentionally destroyed, and thereby revoked, but the will was fully preserved, and, after the death of the testatrix, found in an appropriate place for custody, and duly admitted to probate.

There can be, of course, no dispute concerning the proposition urged by the learned counsel for the appellant, that a will and existing codicil are to be regarded as a single and entire instrument for the purpose of determining testamentary intention and disposition. But the further proposition which he in effect urges, that a codicil so draws after it and incorporates into itself the will that the former cannot be revoked without also destroying the latter, is quite a different one, and in our judgment is sustained neither by reason nor by authority. A will and a codicil are such separate and independent instruments in point of execution that there can ordinarily be no practical objection to the revocation of the codicil alone lest it might furnish some opportunity for fraud or miscarriage of the testator's purpose. While it might often happen that the codicil would be so related to and dependent on the will that it would be impossible to destroy the latter without carrying down the former, the reverse would ordinarily not be true. There would seem to be no good reason why a testator should not be allowed to revoke a codicil, which might be, as in this case, an entirely separate and distinct instrument, without destroying his will, in itself a full and complete instrument.

That these views should prevail is practically determined by authority in this state. In Re Cunnion, 201 N. Y. 123, 94 N. E. 648, Ann. Cas. 1912 A, 834, it appeared that the testator had executed two wills. The later one could not be found after the testator's death, and no evidence was produced concerning its contents. The first will was admitted to probate, and in upholding this disposition it was held in an opinion written by Judge Chase that more than one will may exist at the same time, and that two wills may be construed together if such was the intention of the testator; that under the circumstances disclosed it was the presumption that the testator had destroyed the second will animo revocandi; that the later will is not necessarily a revocation of the prior will, unless by it the prior will is in terms revoked and canceled, or by the later will a disposition is made of all of the testator's property, or the same is so inconsistent with the former will that the two cannot stand together, or that the former will is revoked pro tanto. Thus, it was in effect held that a second will might exist with a former one, and to some extent revoke it; that the two wills, if in existence, were to be construed together, and that the revocation of the second one did not revoke the first one.

I fail to see how we can distinguish the present case from the one cited by any real, substantial principle. There is concededly already sufficient uncertainty concerning the construction and probate of wills so that we ought not to introduce some new distinction, unless it is substantial and commended by good reasons.

The codicil in the present case did not occupy any different relationship, nor exercise any greater effect upon the will, than did the second will upon the first one in the Cunnon Case. The codicil simply modified the original will to the extent of a small legacy, just as the second will might have done. It was called a codicil—that is, a “little will”—instead of a will. It so happens, although this is not by any means decisive, that the codicil in this case was just as much an independent instrument physically as was the second will in the Cunnon Case, and if the destruction of the second will, which, while existing, was related to and necessarily to be construed with the first will, did not operate as a revocation of the latter, there is no reason why the revocation of a codicil should have any such effect.

Beyond this main question there is one minor respect in which we think that the decision of the learned appellate division was erroneous, and that is with reference to the effect of the provision in the codicil for a legacy in addition to those mentioned in the will. When the codicil modified the will by providing for an additional legacy before creation of the residuary estate, it modified and revoked the will to that extent. This revocation was consummated at the moment when the codicil was executed and published, and thereafter the will was to that extent annulled. After this revocation had thus been consummated by the execution of the codicil, the will could not be restored to its original form and tenor simply by the revocation of the codicil. A revocation of the revocation could not thus be accomplished. The effect of this is that the testatrix died intestate as to $1,000.

It seems to be plain, and to be assumed, that the evidence in the action could not be changed on another trial. Therefore, instead of directing a new trial, the Appellate Division should have awarded final judgment in favor of defendant, sustaining the validity of the probate of the will except as to the sum of $1,000 mentioned in the codicil, and as to which sum it should have adjudged distribution as in case of intestacy. It having failed to do this, such judgment should be rendered by this court, without costs in any court to either party.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

STANDARD ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY OF DETROIT, MICHIGAN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BOONE D. HITE, Admr., etc., of J. B.
McCarthy, Deceased.

(— Okla. —, 132 Pac. 333.)

Insurance — accident — injury in caboose.

1. An insured, under an accident policy which provided that no benefits would be paid for injuries, resulting fatally or otherwise, received while the insured was on a locomotive, freight car, or caboose used for passenger service, was killed in a train collision while on a caboose attached to a through stock freight running as an extra between Chickasha and Kansas City. At the time of his death the insured was in charge of cattle being transported to market under a live-stock shipping contract. The only persons permitted to be aboard the caboose were railway employees and drovers in charge of live-stock shipments. Held, that the caboose on which the insured was riding at the time of his death was not “used for passenger service.”

Same — qualification.

2. The words “while on a caboose,” as above used, are subject to the qualifying and concluding provision, “used for passenger service,” and should be so construed.

Same — passenger service — absence of.

3. Under said policy it was not the kind of car or the fact that the plaintiff may have been a passenger that controls, but the fact that the caboose was not at the time engaged in passenger service within the common and ordinary meaning and acceptance of that term.

Same — effect of transporting passenger in.

4. Treating the insured, in his relation to the railway company, as a passenger on one of its trains, it does not follow, in an action on an insurance policy, that the caboose in which he was riding was at the time being used for passenger service.

Same — construction.

5. If a policy of insurance is susceptible of two constructions, that one is to be adopted which is more favorable to the assured.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 20th day of November, 1909, at Chickasha, Oklahoma, the plaintiff in error, for a valuable consideration, executed and delivered to J. B. McCarthy a contract of insurance good for four days from date of issue, whereby it agreed to pay to the executors, administrators, or assigns of said J. B. McCarthy $2,500, providing he (the said J. B. McCarthy) should receive bodily injuries during the term of said insurance, effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, which should, independently of all other causes, within ninety days result in his death. On the 21st day of November, 1909, the insured received bodily injuries which were effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, and from which injuries, independent of all other causes, he immediately and on the same day died; said accident being caused by a passenger train colliding with a caboose attached to the rear end of a freight train, the insured at the time being in said caboose. At the time, both of the issuance of the policy and of the accident mentioned, the insured was a drover in charge of cattle being shipped over the line of the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, from Anadarko, Oklahoma, to Kansas City, Missouri. The case was tried below before the court upon an agreed statement of facts, the policy or ticket of insurance, and the live-stock contract covering the shipment of cattle.

The pertinent paragraphs of the statement of facts are as follows:

"Sixth. That the said J. B. McCarthy and the said six other persons, who were on said caboose at the time of such injury, were riding on said caboose and upon said train exclusively by virtue of said live-stock contracts, and that they had no other or further right to be on said caboose or to ride on said train, except under and by virtue of the provisions of said live-stock contracts, but defendant does not admit that all the provisions and conditions in said live-stock contracts are or were binding on said J. B. McCarthy and the other persons riding on same.

"Seventh. It is further agreed that the said freight train and the caboose on which the said J. B. McCarthy and the said six other persons were riding as aforesaid was owned, operated, and controlled by the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, and that the road over which said freight train was being operated was owned and controlled by the said railway company; that said freight train was composed of about 15 cars of cattle, two of which said cars of cattle were owned by the said J. B. McCarthy, having been shipped by him on the 20th day of November, 1909, from Anadarko, Oklahoma, for Kansas City, Missouri, through Chickasha, Oklahoma, under and by virtue of said live-stock contract heretofore referred to, a copy of which is attached to the defendant's answer and marked Exhibit A; that said J. B. McCarthy and the said six other persons who were on said caboose as aforesaid had ridden under said live-stock contracts on said train and in the caboose thereof from Chickasha, Oklahoma, as far as El Reno, Oklahoma, a distance of about 33 miles, at the time of the accident heretofore referred to; and that said train and caboose had not reached its destination at Kansas City, Missouri, at the time of said accident, but that at said time the destination of said train being Kansas City, Missouri, about 300 miles from El Reno, Oklahoma.

"Eighth. That said train and said caboose was only used for the transportation of cattle and the transportation of the employees of said railway company, together with the regular train crew in charge of said train, and for the transportation of such other persons as had live stock on said train under and by virtue of live-stock contracts, in substance identical with the one on which the said J. B. McCarthy was riding at the time of said injury.

"Ninth. That, under the tariffs, rules, and regulations of the said Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, the said caboose upon which the said J. B. McCarthy was riding at the time of said injuries was not authorized or permitted to carry persons thereon, except persons in charge of live stock, riding on contracts identical in substance with the one on which the said J. B. McCarthy was riding at the time of said injury, and employees of said railway company, and the regular train crew in charge of said train.

"Tenth. That under the tariff, rules, and regulations of the said Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, and other railroads operating in the state of Oklahoma, in force at the time said injuries were received, the only caboose upon which persons, other than the regular train crews operating the train, to which said caboose was attached, and the employees of said railway companies and persons riding on live-stock contracts, such as the said J. B. McCarthy and the said six other persons were riding on at the time of said injury, were permitted to ride, was a caboose attached to the second section of a local freight train, and that on such caboose, attached to the second section of a local freight train, persons were generally permitted to ride on payment of the regular passenger fare, or upon regular passenger tickets issued by such railway companies."

The defendant insurance company denied liability by reason of a provision in paragraph E of the policy, which reads: "This ticket is issued by the company and accepted by the insured with the understanding and agreement that no benefits will be paid for injuries, resulting fatally or otherwise, received under or in consequence of any of the following conditions: (1) While on a locomotive, freight car, or caboose used for passenger service."

As stated by counsel for plaintiff in error, the sole question presented for our consideration is: Was the caboose in which J. B. McCarthy was riding at the time he met his death "used for passenger service?" It will be observed from the foregoing statement that the train to which the caboose was attached was a through freight train, being extra No. —, running from Chickasha to Kansas City; that the only freight being transported was live stock, consisting of about 15 cars of cattle; and that no person was riding thereon, except the train crew, the insured, and six other drovers, all riding by virtue of similar live-stock contracts, issued by the railway company, for the purpose of taking care of the live stock in their charge. Under the tariffs, rules, and regulations of the railway company, the caboose on which the insured was riding at the time the injuries resulting in his death were sustained was not authorized or permitted to carry persons thereon, except such as were in charge of live stock, riding on contracts identical in substance with the one on which the insured was riding, and the railway company's employees. Under the tenth paragraph of the stipulations it appears that, according to the tariffs, rules, and regulations of the railway company, the only caboose upon which persons, other than railway employees and persons riding upon live-stock contracts, such as the said J. B. McCarthy and the other drovers, were permitted to ride, was one attached to the second section of a local freight, and that on said caboose attached to said second section of said local freight persons in general were permitted to ride upon payment of fare. In our opinion the caboose on which the insured was riding at the time of his death was not then being used for passenger service within the meaning of the insurance contract.

A caboose attached to a through freight used exclusively for the transportation of live stock to market cannot, while en route, be said to be used for passenger service, where no one but the train employees and shippers in charge under live-stock contracts, together with railway employees, are permitted to be aboard. Had the policy provided that if death ensued from injuries sustained while on a caboose, without the qualifying clause "used for passenger service," it is clear that no liability would attach. It is not the kind of car, but the character of the service in which it was at the time engaged, that we are to consider. It is a matter of common knowledge that there is attached to all freight trains a regular or improvised caboose for the necessary use and convenience of a part of the train crew. So long as no one but the railway employees are permitted to ride in such a caboose, no question that the caboose was used for passenger service could arise. It is only when others than employees are rightfully aboard such car that the question is presented. Assuming, as we think the great weight of authority holds, that a person rightfully riding on a drover's pass is a passenger (Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1605), it does not necessarily follow that the train or car conveying him or on which he is a passenger is at the time used for passenger service. The fact, therefore, that the deceased was rightfully in the caboose, under the terms of a live-stock contract, for the purpose of looking after and caring for the cattle being transported to market, does not change the character of the service in which the caboose was at the time being used. The caboose was a necessary part of the train, and the primary, if indeed not the sole, business in which the particular train was at the time engaged, was freight service as distinguished from passenger service. Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 121 Cal. 458, 41 L.R.A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49, 53 Pac. 918. That live-stock attendants were in the caboose was a mere incident to the general use and purpose for which the caboose 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was being employed. Provision for their care and comfort was necessary as a part of the contract for shipment of the live stock in their charge. The train was in no sense a "mixed train," carrying both freight and passengers, as the term is generally understood. The equipment consisted of freight cars and caboose, such as is generally used in the freight service. It was a through stock freight, running as an extra, and did not, neither was it authorized or permitted under the tariffs, rules, and regulations governing the train's operations to, carry persons thereon, except those in charge of live stock, riding on contracts identical in substance with that of the insured, and employees of the railway company, and the regular crew in charge of the train. Only by virtue of a contract for live-stock shipment could other than railway employees acquire a right of carriage upon said caboose. The public in general, wishing transportation, had no right to be upon said car. Opportunity for the carriage of the public, in addition to the regular passenger trains, was afforded by the second section of the local freight. No passenger fare was paid by the insured; no passenger earnings accrued to the railway company from the operations of the train.

The case of Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Frierson, 51 C. C. A. 424, 114 Fed. 56, cited and relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error, is not in conflict with our conclusions. In the contract of insurance under consideration by the court in that case, it was provided that the policy insured the principal sum of $5,000, but provided for the payment of double that sum if the injuries from which death ensued were sustained while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power. Among other things it was said in the opinion of the court: "The Jessie at all times continued to be under the control and management of the navigation company. The Frierson party had no exclusive rights, for she was under no charter, and she had on board a passenger who had paid a separate fare, not being a member of the Frierson party, nor within the terms of the contract under which he was being carried. The Jessie was a passenger conveyance, whose motive power was steam. Frierson was not at the time a servant or in the employment of the owners or navigators of the Jessie. He was riding on the boat under a contract based upon a good consideration, by which the Columbia Navigation Company undertook to carry him up the Kuskokwim river. These facts constitute him a passenger." McCarthy, like Frierson, was a passenger; the latter was a passenger on a passenger conveyance, while the former was not a passenger on a caboose used for passenger service within the general meaning and acceptance of the term. There it was not provided that "the passenger conveyance" should at the time be employed "in passenger service," but simply that it should be "a passenger conveyance" whose motive power was steam. It will be noted that the court there affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, permitting the recovery of a double liability, and observed: "That the Jessie was not 'a public conveyance in the usual lines of travel as a common carrier of passengers' may be true. But, if the insurance company intended to limit the benefits of its contract to passengers who travel 'in conveyances operated in the usual lines of travel as common carriers,' it should have so stipulated." With equal force we might say that if it was the purpose of the insurance company to limit the right of recovery to those riding on a caboose, regardless of the service in which it was at the time engaged, it should have so provided. But even were we to consider that the meaning of the provision in the light of the facts before us was in doubt (which we do not), it would be our duty to give to the policy that construction which would give it effect rather than destroy it; the rule being that where the meaning of a policy of insurance is ambiguous, or if so drawn as to be fairly susceptible of different constructions, it will be construed strictly against the insurer, and that construction adopted which is most favorable to the insured. Taylor v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 25 Okla. 92, 138 Am. St. Rep. 906, 105 Pac. 354; Capital F. Ins. Co. v. Carroll, 26 Okla. 286, 109 Pac. 535; Southern Surety Co. v. Tyler & S. Co. 30 Okla. 116, 120 Pac. 936.

In this connection it was said by Mr. Justice Harlan, in Travellers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 666, 32 L. ed. 310, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1362: "Such being the contract, the court must give effect to its provisions according to the fair meaning of the words used, leaning, however,—where the words do not clearly indicate the intention of the parties,—to that interpretation which is most favorable to the insured."

A caboose attached to a through freight, running as an extra, made up exclusively of live stock being shipped to market, is not being used for passenger service within the common and ordinary meaning and acceptance of that term, and as these words are ordinary words, and the meaning of which is plain, they must be understood and applied accordingly. We therefore conclude, as did the learned trial judge, that the insured at the time of his death was not on a caboose used for passenger service within 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the meaning of paragraph E of the accident policy.

The judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

JAMES JOHNS, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF PENDLETON, Resp't.

(— Or. —, 133 Pac. 817.)

Municipal corporation — patented pavement — right to select.

1. The selection by a municipal corporation of a patented article for a street pavement is not prevented by a charter provision requiring the contract to be let to the lowest bidder, if the owner of the patent does not himself bid for the contract, but makes an offer to furnish the machinery for mixing the paving material, or the mixture itself for a stipulated price, on equal terms to all bidders.

Public improvements — uncertainty of notice — effect on assessment.

2. An assessment for a street improvement cannot be enforced if the description of the portion of the street to be improved is so uncertain that such portion cannot be ascertained from the notice.

Estoppel — invalid street improvement — laches.

3. Permitting the completion of a street improvement before taking steps to question its validity because of uncertainty in the notice does not estop the property owner from obtaining relief.

(July 1, 1913.)

Note. — Validity of contract for material patented or held in monopoly where a letting to the lowest bidder is required.

This note is supplemental to the note to Allen v. Milwaukee, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 680, which supplements a note upon the same subject in 18 L.R.A. 45.

The question whether a municipality or other public corporation which is required to let its contracts by competitive bidding, in its invitation for bids may require materials to be furnished which are the subject of a monopoly or patent, depends largely upon the further question whether or not the effect will be to prevent what the statute requires—competitive bidding. It is clear that a municipality or other public corporation cannot make a requirement of this kind for the purpose of shutting off competition and favoring some particular article.

Thus, where the statute requires that there shall be competition in bids for im-

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Umatilla County in defendant's favor in a suit to quiet title to real estate against which a lien was claimed under an assessment for a street improvement. Reversed.

Statement by McBride, Ch. J.:

This is a suit to quiet title. It originated in a dispute as to the validity of an assessment made and a lien claimed by the defendant against two lots owned by plaintiff, in order to pay for work done by the Warren Construction Company in paving a portion of Jackson street with what is called "gravel bitulithic" pavement. The pavement is composed of a patented compound, manufactured by the use of special machinery, parts of which are also patented, and the use of the name "gravel bitulithic" is protected by copyright; the patents and right to use the name being the property of the Warren Brothers Company, a corporation distinct from the Warren Construction Company. The Warren Brothers Company, the owners of the patent, had placed on file in the office of the recorder in the city of Pendleton the following offer, called a license agreement," which is as follows:

To The Honorable Mayor and City Council, Pendleton, Oregon.

Gentlemen:

Inasmuch as it is deemed advisable by the proper authorities that bids be received provement contracts, and that all contracts shall go to the lowest bidder, the contract and bonds of the municipality, executed in pursuance thereof, are invalidated where the manufacturer of a paving brick procured the city to invite bids for paving its streets with a designated brand of brick, as to which he had a trademark, and to let the contract upon the bids thus procured, since the effect of the stipulation as to the brick is to prevent any real competitive bidding, and the brick stipulated for as to quality being very similar to scores of other makes. Kansas City Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. National Surety Co. 157 Fed. 620; to the same effect see Atkin v. Wyandotte Coal & Lime Co. 73 Kan. 768, 84 Pac. 1040, and National Surety Co. v. Kansas City Hydraulic Press Brick Co. 73 Kan. 196, 84 Pac. 1034.

In Johnson v. Atlantic City, 82 N. J. L. 204, 81 Atl. 1105, certiorari to review the awards of contracts for paving streets with a certain patented article, the awards were set aside, it appearing that the company to which the awards were made had a secret arrangement with the proprietors of the patented article, that gave, and was intended, to give, it a controlling advantage over all other competitors, provided the proposals were so framed that the advantages accruing from such arrangement were made available for the securing of the awards; and it being found that the proposals were so framed, and that certain officers of the city were interested in having them so framed, and in having the contract so awarded. From these facts the court drew the inference, and found the fact to be, that, owing to such machinations, the competitive bidding required by the city charter had not taken place.

It has been stated as a general proposition of law that a statute requiring competitive bidding for public improvements does not necessarily preclude a municipality from providing that bids for a public improvement shall include the use of a certain patented material or article. Rackliffe-Gibson Constr. Co. v. Walker, 170 Mo. App. 69, 156 S. W. 65; Custer v. Springfield, 167 Mo. App. 354, 151 S. W. 759, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And the rule has been asserted that while the charter provision requiring competition nullifies all acts of city authorities which, under one guise or another, seek to give advantage to favorites in public work, or to foster corruption and monopoly, yet there is an exception based upon the supposed necessity of the situation; that is, that where there is a patented article or one held in monopoly, which, in the eye of the authorities, is of such exceptional value and superiority that it would be a public injury to be deprived of it, it may be required to be used; but this permission to designate the article held in monopoly being an exception, and founded on a supposed necessity, if the article can be had from other parties than those designated, it is a violation of the law to close those sources by such designation. Thus, if there is but one kind of asphalt or one make of paving brick, either can be selected, although held in monopoly; but if there are many kinds and makes of substantially the same material and value, one cannot be selected to the exclusion of the bids on any of the others. Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co. v. McLord, 145 Mo. App. 141, 130 S. W. 371. To same effect is Custer v. Springfield, supra.

Among the later cases there has been a great deal of discussion and some want of harmony as to the right of a municipality, in calling for bids for paving, to require the use of a patented paving material, on the ground that such a requirement and invitation for bids precludes real competition. Some very able courts have denied the power of a municipality to contract for paving material of a certain patented kind where the invitation for bids is limited to this particular brand, and this although the owner of the patent files with the municipality an agreement to furnish the material to the successful bidder at a designated price. Siegel v. Chicago, 223 Ill. 428, 79 N. E. 280, 7 Ann. Cas. 104; followed in Chicago Title & T. Co. v. Chicago, 224 Ill. 124, 79 N. E. 561; Prindle v. Evanston, 224 Ill. 345, 79 N. E. 569; Allen v. Milwaukee, 123 Wis. 678, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 116 Am. St. Rep. 54, 106 N. W. 1099, 8 Ann. Cas. 392;

for the improvement of certain streets in the city of Pendleton, state of Oregon, with the gravel bitulithic pavement; and inasmuch as the construction of said pavement requires the use of certain patented processes and compounds; and inasmuch as competitive bidding in the letting of contracts for street improvements is deemed advisable, in order to provide for such competitive bidding, and at the same time secure the adoption of the gravel bitulithic pavement as the kind of pavement to be constructed in such streets as may hereafter be determined; the undersigned, Warren Brothers Company, as owner of all patents and processes covering the laying of said bitulithic pavement, hereby proposes and agrees, for the consideration hereinafter named, to furnish the city of Pendleton or to any bidder to whom a contract may be awarded to pave any street or streets in the city of Pendleton with the gravel bitulithic pavement, at any time within one year from this date, or at any time thereafter until this proposition is formally withdrawn, and who shall enter into a contract with such surety or sureties as may be required by said city of Pendleton, the following materials ready for use, coupled with a free license to use any or all the pat-

Cawker v. Milwaukee, 133 Wis. 35, 113 N. W. 417.

In Siegel v. Chicago, supra, it is said that a patented material which can be obtained from but one person, firm, or corporation, may not be lawfully prescribed by an ordinance providing for the construction of an improvement by special assessment, not, however, because the article is patented, but for the reason that if it is so prescribed, competition, so far as concerns furnishing that material, is entirely absent, and a written proposition by the owner of the patent is without significance where it simply amounts to an agreement to furnish the material to any contractor bidding on the work at a fixed price, since such an offer does not obviate the objection that, under the ordinance, there can be no competition in supplying the bitulithic wearing surface.

And in this connection see also Pollock v. Kansas City, 87 Kan. 205, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, 123 Pac. 985, applying the same doctrine to a statute requiring all petitions for public improvement to state the kind of material to be used, but not the brand of material or the name of the manufacturer thereof, and holding such statute violated by a paving petition stipulating for bitulithic pavement, where, by demurrer, it is conceded that these words have a well defined and well known meaning, confined to only one kind of paving material, absolutely controlled by one company, so that the matter of competition is entirely eliminated.

The majority of the late cases considering this question with reference to paving contracts, however, sustain the right to stipulate for a particular kind of paving material which is controlled by a patent where the owner of the patent files with the municipality an agreement to furnish the material to the successful bidder at a stipulated price, although by statute such contracts are required to be let upon competitive bidding. Saunders v. Iowa City, 134 Iowa. 132, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 392, 111 N. W. 529; McEwen v. Cœur d'Alene, 23 Idaho, 746, 132 Pac. 308; Ford v. Great Falls, 46 Mont. 292, 127 Pac. 1004; JOHNS v. PENDLETON, distinguishing Terwilliger Land Co. v. Portland, 62 Or. 101, 123 Pac. 57.

may advertise for and accept a construction, the materials entering into which, or the method and operation of assembling which, are covered by letters patent, and the purpose of the law which makes provision for competitive bidding for public contracts is not destroyed by advertising for or accepting a contract of this character. Holbrook v. Toledo, 28 Ohio C. C. 284.

And in New Jersey it is also held that a city has the right to contract for the use of such special or patented pavement as it may, in the exercise of an honest discretion, find to be the most suitable for the work contemplated. Bye v. Atlantic City, 73 N. J. L. 402, 64 Atl. 1056; Milner v. Trenton, 80 N. J. L. 253, 75 Atl. 939; but it does not appear from these cases that there was any requirement that such contracts should be let by competitive bidding.

In other jurisdictions the right of a municipality to stipulate in its invitation for bids that a patented paving material shall be used is sustained, where the owner of the patent has filed with the municipality an agreement to permit the use of its patent to the successful buyer for a small consideration. Tousey v. Indianapolis, 175 Ind. 295, 94 N. E. 225 (compensation for license fixed at 25 cents per square yard); Lacoate v. New Orleans, 119 La. 470, 40 So. 267 (compensation for license, 25 cents per square yard); Reed v. Rockliff-Gibson Constr. Co. 25 Okla. 633, 138 Am. St. Rep. 937, 107 Pac. 168 (license compensation, together with rendition of certain services fixed at 42 cents per square yard).

The holding of the foregoing cases sustaining the right to invite bids for a public contract, and stipulating that a patented material shall be used where the owner of the patent has agreed, for a comparatively small portion of the actual cost of the work, to permit the use of his patent, is not necessarily in conflict with the Wisconsin and Illinois cases which hold invalid, as not competitive, contracts for public improvement, based upon bids for a patented material where the owner of the patent exacts a large portion of the total cost of the improvement, since, as a matter of fact, the contracts involved in the Indiana, Louisiana, and Oklahoma cases were based upon bids which were competitive, or at least the agreement to grant a license for the use ents, trademarks, or tradenames now owned or which may hereafter be owned by Warren Brothers Company, necessary to lay said pavement: 1. The necessary roadway mixture for the wearing surface, having a thickness of 1½ inches (1½") after compression, prepared under the patented process of Warren Brothers Company, and delivered hot in the wagons of the city or contractor at the bitulithic mixing plant located in the city of Pendleton; said plant to be located within three (3) miles of the work to be performed. (2) The right to use any and all patents, trademarks, or tradenames now owned or which may hereafter be owned or controlled by Warren Brothers Company, which are necessary to be used in the laying of such pavement. 3. The bituminous flush coating cement necessary for coating the wearing surface, delivered on wagons of the city or contractor at the bitulithic mixing plant located as above. 4. An expert, who will give proper advice as to the building of such pavement, will be furnished to the city or contractor at the expense of Warren Brothers Company. 5. Two daily examinations of the mixture as delivered on the street will be made at the laboratory of Warren Brothers Company, to determine if uni-of the patent did not in an appreciable degree, if at all, affect competition in the bidding, for the amount exacted by the patentee was but a small portion of the entire cost. This cannot, however, be said of the Iowa, Idaho, and Montana cases, for in these cases, like the Wisconsin and Illinois cases, the owner of the patent, by his written agreement, filed with the municipality, exacted a large portion of the total cost of the improvement. In these three classes of cases there are the Wisconsin and Illinois cases which are irreconcilable with the Iowa, Idaho, and Montana cases, but which may be reconciled with the Indiana, Louisiana, and Oklahoma cases. On the other hand, the Oklahoma case cites, apparently with approval, the Iowa case, although, as pointed out as to the facts, the two cases are dissimilar, the Oklahoma case not presenting a case wherein competition was practically destroyed, while in the Iowa case there was no competition as to a large part of the cost of the improvement.

Thus, in the Iowa case (Saunders v. Iowa City) the amount exacted by the patentee was $1.45 per square yard, and the same amount in McEwen v. Cœur D'Alene, and in Ford v. Great Falls the amount was $1.50 per square yard. Upon this question of amount, JOHNS v. PENDLETON is a border line case, the amount being $.90 per square yard.

The doctrine of the Idaho, Iowa, and Montana cases, that a contract of this character by the owner of the patent is sufficient to except the cases from the operation of the statute requiring competitive bidding, is denied in the Wisconsin and other cases first referred to. Thus, in Allen v. Milwaukee, 128 Wis. 678, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 680, 116 Am. St. Rep. 54, 106 N. W. 1099, 8 Ann. Cas. 392, the court says that an offer by the owner of the patent to permit the use of the patent and furnish other considerations for the sum of $1.40 per square yard, to be paid by the successful bidder, discloses a studied attempt to evade the purpose of the statute, so as to confer upon the patentee the contract for a large part of work to be done without even the formality of any bidding therefor; and the query is made if such a division of the work of an improvement can be dictated by the patentee, where must he stop in absorbing into his noncompetitive contract other parts of that work? And it is said that if a patentee may absorb two thirds of the work and price, there is no logical stopping place short of complete nullification of the right of the lot owner to have competitive bidding.

And in Pollock v. Kansas City, 87 Kan. 205, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 465, 123 Pac. 985, the amount asked by the patentee was $1.35 per square yard, where the total price of the paving was $2, and the court said that the margin of possible competition was so small as to be negligible.

In view of the conflict of authority on the question, it may also be profitable to refer to other cases holding different specifications for bids to be in such form as not to preclude competition, and hence not violative of statutes requiring competitive bidding. Thus, in Warren Bros. Co. v. New York, 190 N. Y. 297, 83 N. E. 59, three different methods of paving were stipulated for. Method A, a pavement of asphalt of a designated thickness, with a base of Portland cement, concrete, and water; method B, a pavement of sheet asphalt with a bituminous concrete binder, and a Portland cement concrete base; method C, patent bitulithic pavement.

And where, by the method adopted for inviting bids and awarding the contracts, three different kinds of pavement are put in competition with each other, it is immaterial, as affecting a contract based thereon, that one of the kinds of material stipulated for is covered by a patent. Baltimore v. Flack, 104 Md. 107, 64 Atl. 702.

Competition is secured by calling for bids for brick for pavement and also for bitulithic pavement, since by this method the two kinds of pavement are brought into direct competition. Campbell v. South Bitulithic Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 799, 106 S. W. 1189.

And an ordinance does not violate a statutory requirement of this character where it requires the use of a paving brick of a designated kind, or other brick equally as good, to be approved by the board of local improvements. Oak Park v. Galt, 231 Ill. 365, 83 N. E. 209.

Nor does a requirement that a certain kind of cement, or better, be used. Muff v. Cameron, 134 Mo. App. 607, 114 S. W. 1125, 117 S. W. 116.

formity has been accomplished in the mixture and construction, and reports thereof will be made to the proper city authorities; said samples to be sent, prepaid, to the laboratory of Warren Brothers Company, Potter street, East Cambridge, Massachusetts, by the city or contractor. The price at which this service is offered to any and all contractors who make a bid on the gravel bitulithic pavement, in the city of Pendleton, state of Oregon, is ninety cents ($.90 per square yard of finished pavement, at which price it is also agreed to furnish the mixture for making all repairs, if any, which may be necessary for the wearing surface during the life of said patents f. o. b. Pendleton in barrels for reheating. The acceptance of bids by your city and the letting of a contract for the same is all that shall be necessary to bind Warren Brothers Company to this agreement.

Respectfully submitted,
Warren Brothers Company,
Walter B. Warren,
Vice President.

The above agreement made on the understanding that it applies only to contracts, work on which can be performed continuously, aggregating not less than 10,000 square yards.

It also appeared that it was the custom of the company to allow contractors to put in their own plants, or for the company to furnish such plants to contractors, who were allowed to manufacture the compound for themselves, paying a royalty of 25 cents per square yard to the Warren Brothers Company. In order to prevent duplication of such plants in small cities, such contractors were obligated to furnish other contractors in the same town not having such machinery the compound at the rate prescribed in the license agreement. The charter of the city of Pendleton contains the following provisions: "The council, whenever it may deem it expedient, is hereby authorized and empowered to order the whole or any part of the streets of the city to be improved, to determine the character, kind, and extent of such improvement, to levy and collect an assessment upon all lots and parcels of land specially benefited by such improvement, to defray the whole or any portion of the cost and expense thereof, and to determine what lands are specially benefited by such improvement, and the amount to which each parcel or tract of land is benefited. . . . Within ten days from the date of the first publication of the notice required to be published in the preceding section, the owners of 80 per cent or more in area of the property within such assessment district may make and file with the city recorder a written objection or remonstrance against such proposed improvement, and such objections or remonstrance shall be a bar to any further proceedings in the matter of such improvement for a period of six months, unless the owners of one half or more of the property affected as aforesaid shall subsequently petition therefor. . . . When the improvement of any street is ordered, the recorder, upon instruction from the common council, shall immediately invite proposals for making the same, in accordance with ordinance provided, which proposals shall be opened in the presence of a majority of the common council, and the contract awarded to the lowest responsible bidder for either the whole of said improvement or such part thereof as will not materially conflict with the completion of the remainder thereof. . . ." The Jackson street improvement required 7,848.80 square yards of paving material. The plaintiff and others remonstrated against the proposed improvement, but did not specify the selection of a patented article as one of the reasons for their remonstrance. Other facts appear in the opinion. There was a decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. J. P. Winter and Johnson & Skrable, for appellant:

The contract is absolutely void.

The invitation for bids called for patented and unpatented articles, but asked for a total bid. There could be no separate bidding on the unpatented work. A contract let pursuant to such a bid is void.

Re Eager, 46 N. Y. 105.

The charter is the sole source of the council's power. It had no power to make the contract in question.

A property owner's failure to object during the progress of the improvement will not estop him from questioning an assessment based on a contract which the council never had the power to make. Such a contract is void; it never was; it is subject to direct and collateral attack.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal contention here urged is that the selection of a patented paving compound manufactured by a single company and exclusively controlled by it, rendered it impossible for any but a single corporation to bid, and that it is therefore inimical to that provision of the city charter of Pendleton which requires all paving contracts to be let to the lowest responsible bidder. The industry of the respective counsel has apparently covered the entire field of judicial utterance upon this question, and has brought to our notice a mass of hopelessly contradictory decisions, all plausible and some profound, indicating by their contrariety the difficulty and nicety of the question involved. On the other hand, it is argued with much show of reason that the selection of a patented article controlled by its owners renders it impossible for any but such owners or favored licensees to bid, and that a call for bids under such circumstances is a mere farce, which tends to promote monopoly, stifle free competition, and impose unnecessary burdens upon the rate payer. The argument for plaintiff is forcibly put in the language of Sanderson, J., in the case of Nicolson Pav. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699: "To advertise for sealed proposals, where there can be but one bidder, to open them in open session, to examine and publicly declare them, and thereupon award the work to the lowest responsible bidder, where there is and can be but one, to notify the owners of the frontage, if they so elect, to come forward and perform work which, by the paramount law of the land, they are prohibited from performing under heavy responsibilities, would be to play as broad a farce as was ever enacted behind the footlights." Although, as hereinafter shown, the case there being considered contained many elements of hardship not incident to the case at bar, it shows the attitude of many of the courts in those cases where an exclusive monopoly of a patented article exists. On the contrary, it is argued that the law imposes upon the city council the duty to select in advance the kind of improvement required; that it is its duty to select the best; and that, if the best and most appropriate article for its purposes happens to be a patented article which can be supplied from only one source, the authorities should not be precluded from selecting nor the public from having the best and most appropriate article, and the one which it desires, by reason of the fact that only one person can supply it. This view of the case is forcibly and clearly set forth in the language of Mr. Chief Justice McSherry in Baltimore v. Flack, 104 Md. 107, 64 Atl. 702, in a case involving the same patent which is the bone of contention in the case at bar. We quote: "Cities in the construction of public improvements ought to have, as have individuals, in the construction of their own private edifices, the right to select for use the article or substance best fitted and adapted to the purpose; and to deprive the public of the right to select and use such superior articles is opposed to public policy, and positively disadvantageous to the community. 'The force of this argument must, of course, be admitted,' said the court in Fishburn v. Chicago, 171 Ill. 338, 39 L.R.A. 482, 63 Am. St. Rep. 236, 49 N. E. 532, and the answer to it, which is more specious than sound as given by that court, is as follows: 'It is readily seen it is not necessary to foster and create a monopoly, and prevent competition in the letting of public contracts, by providing in ordinances that a certain substance, or article, and no other, shall be used. If it be the judgment of the city council that the most suitable and best material to be used in any contemplated improvement is the product of some particular mine or quarry, or some substance or compound which is in the control of some particular firm or corporation, the ordinance might be so framed as to make such production, substance, or compound the standard of quality and fitness, and to require that material equal in all respects to it should be employed.' In other words, if the city requires a particular thing and that thing is covered by a patent, or can only be supplied by one dealer, the city must get, not the exact thing it needs, but something else as closely resembling it as can be procured. Thus, if the city is in want of certain repairs for its fire engines, and those repairs are made only by one manufacturer, or are protected by a patent, they cannot be purchased lest a monopoly would be fostered; but something, not the thing needed, though resembling the thing needed, would have to be substituted."

The two opinions quoted from fairly set forth the views of the courts in relation to the selection of patented articles where there is no opportunity for competitive bids; but in the case at bar it appears from the testimony that is not excluded that the patentee, the Warren Brothers Company, is not engaged in street work as a business. Its revenues are derived from sales of the manufactured product, from the sale and installation of machinery for such manufacture, and from royalties derived from the manufacture of the product by others. It does not appear from the testimony that there was anything to prevent any contractor who desired to do so from having a plant installed and from manufacturing the compound upon exactly the same terms that the Warren Construction Company required. Perhaps it would have been unprofitable to have done so, but by the same token it is frequently impractical for a contractor to bid upon a small contract in a town remote from his place of business. When bids are advertised for in any case, the contractor who bids the lowest usually is enabled to do so because he has facilities not possessed by less fortunate bidders. The man situated nearest the place to be improved, having the best equipment, having the best material, and having capital to purchase what the public demands, always has an advantage which enables him in a sense to monopolize contracts of this character.

The law required the city council to designate in advance and in the first instance the "character and kind" of improvement to be made, and it was its duty to choose that which, under all the circumstances, it thought the most suitable. There is nothing to indicate that it acted fraudulently, or that it did not choose the best; and, in the absence of any great number of litigants protesting here, we have the right to assume that a great majority of the ratepayers got what they wanted and are satisfied. It is not shown that anybody else sought to take advantage of the situation by proposing to the Warren Brothers Company to install a plant in Pendleton for the manufacture of gravel bitulithic pavement, nor that anybody ever applied to it to furnish the material to perform the contract in case they should see fit to bid upon it. This is not a case where the patentee of an article is himself a contractor for its use in a particular instance. The evidence discloses no more than that the pavement selected is covered by a patent the benefits of which are available to every contractor upon the same terms. If the use of patented articles, compounds, and machinery is to be excluded from all contracts let to the lowest bidder, then municipalities are relegated to the outworn agencies and materials of a past generation, and are unable to avail themselves of the discoveries and improvements of the present. The leading case cited by plaintiff is Fishburn v. Chicago, supra. It is not in point in the present controversy, and the distinction is clearly made in the opinion between those cases where the article or compound selected is one composed of materials which may be furnished by a number of persons, and is unpatented, and a compound protected by patent. In that case the ordinance provided that the "cementing material shall be paving cement prepared from refined Trinidad asphaltum obtained from Pitch lake, in the island of Trinidad." The plaintiffs offered proof tending to show that there were five paving companies in Chicago using Trinidad asphaltum equal for street-paving purposes to that obtained from Pitch lake, so that the real question was not whether the council could select the best material, but whether it could arbitrarily designate the product of a particular locality when products equal in quality and identical in composition could be obtained from other localities. Such a limitation was evidently fraudulent upon the face of it, and no court could have upheld it; but, while the court by way of dictum discusses the cases holding that cities may avail themselves of the benefit of scientific progress by soliciting bids for patented compounds, and expresses the opinion that such practice is not sanctioned by the best authority, it recognizes the fact that it is discussing a matter not in issue in the case before it. The court says: "In Mr. Dillon's view these cases are rather overcome by the current of authority; but, if they should be accepted as stating the correct rule, they have little application to the case in hand, for the reason the monopoly created under the ordinance under consideration is not in favor of a patented article." The liability of a judge to be absurd when he attempts to decide matters not before him is strikingly illustrated in this case referred to. After admitting the disadvantages of prohibiting a city from designating a patented pavement in its advertisement for bids, even if it is the most suitable, the court suggests, as a remedy, that "the ordinance might be so framed as to make such production, substance, or compound the standard of quality and fitness, and to require that material equal in all respects to it should be employed."

How, if the patented article is the best and most suitable, another article can be "equal in all respects to it," is not clear; but the hibernicism of the remark is evident. It is needless to marshal and discuss authorities on this question where they disagree so widely. In a general way it may be said that the following cases tend in many respects to support defendant's contention: Fishburn v. Chicago, supra; Siegel v. Chicago, 223 Ill. 428, 79 N. E. 280, 7 Ann. Cas. 104; Nicolson Pav. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699; Dean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205. These are by no means all of the cases, but they are representative of all. Cases tending to support plaintiff's contention and the views of this court as herein expressed are Baltimore v. Flack, 104 Md. 107, 64 Atl. 702; Hobart v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 185; Re Dugro, 50 N. Y. 513; Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567; Newark v. Bonnell, 57 N. J. L. 424, 51 Am. St. Rep. 609, 31 Atl. 408; Yarnold v. Lawrence, 15 Kan. 126. It is assumed that this court has committed itself to the doctrine contended for by plaintiff by its decision in Terwilliger Land Co. v. Portland, 62 Or. 101, 123 Pac. 57; but such is not the case. In that case bids were advertised for improving a street with "Hassam pavement," an unpatented compound. The Hassam Paving Company had copyrighted the trade-name, but anybody could use the same ingredients in the same proportions and produce exactly the same pavement without any infringement on the copyright of the Hassam Company; but, as the bids called for Hassam pavement, nobody could submit a bid for such pavement eo nomine without infringing upon the copyright. If in that case the call for bids had specified the character of the compound desired by requiring it to contain sand, gravel, and cement in the same proportions as contained in the Hassam compound, anyone could have bid. It was a plain case of preferring one contractor as against others possibly having equal facilities for furnishing the identical material. We note the following distinctions between that case and this: (1) The Hassam Paving Company was actually engaged as a street contractor in laying pavement composed of its copyrighted compound. The Warren Brothers Company is not so engaged. (2) The Hassam Paving Company refused to allow other contractors to bid under their tradename. The Warren Brothers encourage contractors to bid on contracts to be filled by the use of their compound, charging a royalty for its use. (3) The identical material used in the Hassam compound as called for in the bids could have been furnished under another name or by a description of the material. It does not appear that such is the case in the present instance. In the absence of proof to the contrary, we are bound to assume that the council of Pendleton acted in good faith and with good judgment, and that "gravel bitulithic" was the best pavement for use on Jackson street.

It is not shown in this case that any other pavement is equal to gravel bitulithic, that the cost of the pavement was excessive nor that anybody was prevented from bidding by reason of the fact that the compound was covered by patents. From all that appears the plaintiff has a good pavement, put down at a reasonable price, and has suffered no actual injury by reason of the selection of the pavement in question. He stands simply on the bare technical objection that the selection of a patented compound, as a matter of law, has a tendency to create a monopoly, and that therefore he cannot be compelled to pay for the improvement. It is very evident that the objection now raised is an afterthought, which either did not occur to him before the work was completed, or was suppressed. It is also evident that the plaintiff's real objection is not that the council of Pendleton has done something to foster a monopoly, but that it has improved the street at all. In its final analysis plaintiff's contention amounts to this: "The city council may determine the kind of improvement to be made, but must carefully exclude any patented improvement; or it must, at least, make its selection in the alternative." If it were shown that there were other pavements of a similar character and equally as good, the suggestion might have some force; but that fact does not appear in the testimony in this case. It is difficult to see how such a course could prevent favoritism from being shown in the selection of material or in the awarding of contracts. A dishonest council could just as easily select the material specified by a bidder whom it wished to favor after the bids were in as it could before they were called for. Suppose the council had called for bids for half a dozen different kinds of pavement, retaining the right to select that one which, in its judgment, was the best. It is plain that, if it were so disposed, it could have selected gravel bitulithic, and the plaintiff would have been without remedy. In this contention we are conceding, for the purposes of the argument, without so deciding, that such alternative notice would comply with the terms of the charter, which required the council to determine in advance of the notice for bids the kind and character of the improvement. There has been no device yet invented that is sufficient to make a dishonest official act honestly; the remedy is at the polls. In these days when the light of publicity is thrown upon every act of a councilman, when the jail doors yawn before the grafting official, and the recall hovers over him, there is not that temptation for him to ply his vocation that there has been heretofore. In this particular case there is no charge made of intentional fraud on the part of the council. They complied with the letter of the law, and, as we believe, with the spirit of it. Whether they exercised the very best judgment is not for us to say.

Another objection is that the notice of intention to improve does not describe definitely the portion of the street to be improved. The description in the ordinance and notice is as follows: "Commencing on the south line of Jackson street and the southerly projected west line of Main street, thence north to the northeast corner of lot 6, block 7, Switzler's addition to the city of Pendleton, Oregon, thence west to the northwest corner of said lot 6, thence north to the northeast corner of lot 9, in said block 7, thence westerly parallel with the north line of Jackson street to the northwest corner of lot 4, block 6, Livermore's addition, thence south to the northeast corner of lot 7, in said block 6, thence west to the northwest corner of said lot 7, thence south to the southwest corner of lot 12, block 16, in Raley's addition, Pendleton, Oregon; thence east to the southeast corner of said lot 12, thence south to the southwest corner of lot 3 in said block 16, thence easterly parallel to the north line of Jackson street to a point on the west line of the property deeded to the city of Pendleton for cemetery purposes, which point is south of a point on the section line, 19.50 chains east of the $\frac{1}{4}$ section corner between sections 3 and 10, township 2 north range 32 E. W. M. (variation 23 degrees E.), thence south to a point 9.50 chains south of the said section line, thence east 2.50 chains, thence north to the south line of lot 3, block 1, in said Raley's addition, thence east to a point 230 feet due south of the southwest corner of lot 7, block 6, in said Switzler's addition; thence east 100 feet parallel with said section line, thence south 64 feet, more or less, to the north line of land formerly owned by the Pendleton Manufacturing Company, thence northeast along the north boundary of said land formerly owned by the said Pendleton Manufacturing Company, to the said section line, thence along said section line west to place of beginning." There is a discrepancy in the description, arising from the fact that block C, Livermore's addition, is wrongly designated as "block 6." All the monuments called for in block 6 as they appear in the ordinance and notice exist in block 6, and the courses called for also correspond; but, as no distances are given, we cannot reverse the description beginning at the last call and retrace it so as to make the calls certain, especially since there is a block 6 in Livermore's addition. The description is uncertain, and cannot be ascertained from the notice itself. The notice does not refer to any map or plat of the assessment district on file, and the one actually on file is not complete in some particulars. The notice of intention to improve is jurisdictional, and the city gained no right to make the assessment against plaintiff's property. The whole proceeding was void. As held by this court in several cases, plaintiff is not estopped from enjoining the collection of the assessment by reason of having waited until the completion of the improvement. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1455; Ladd v. Spencer, 23 Or. 193, 31 Pac. 474.

The decree will be reversed, and one entered here in accordance with this opinion.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, Resp't.,

v.

RICH PUCKETT Appt.

(— S. C. —, 78 S. E. 737.)

Burglary — entering piazza attached to dwelling.

Entering in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony, a piazza which is attached to a dwelling house, and is inclosed with a low railing not for the protection of the dwelling, but to keep dogs and chickens off the piazza, is not burglary.

Note. — Burglary by going upon piazza.

STATE v. PUCKETT seems to stand alone in passing upon the question whether simply going upon a piazza, even with felonious intent, will render one liable to conviction for burglary. No other authority upon that question has been found. But on principle that case would appear to be correct in holding such an act not to constitute burglary.

Thus, it is said that, in order to constitute burglary, the entry must be made into the house, and not merely into some outside part of the house. 6 Cyc. 182.

Although it has been said that, in order to constitute a "room" within which one may commit burglary, the partition between it and the rest of the house need not extend to the ceiling or roof of the house,

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Laurens County convicting him of burglary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ferguson, Featherstone, & Knight, for appellant:

To constitute burglary, there must be a breaking of the "inclosing part of a dwelling house."

State v. Sampson, 12 S. C. 568, 32 Am. Rep. 513; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 11th ed. 1190, § 971; Clark, Crim. Law, 232, § 100.

Entering the piazza is not burglary.

Henry v. State, 39 Ala. 679.

Should a door or other aperture be partially or wholly open, and the thief enter, this is not a breaking.

2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 1191, § 971; State v. Dawkins, 32 S. C. 21, 10 S. E. 772; State v. Boon, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 244, 57 Am. Dec. 555; State v. Wilson, 1 N. J. L. 439, 1 Am. Dec. 216; Com. v. Strupney, 105 Mass. 588, 7 Am. Rep. 556; Green v. State, 68 Ala. 539.

Mr. R. A. Cooper for the State.

Watts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appellant was tried and convicted in the court of general sessions for Laurens county in January, 1913, on a charge of burglary. He was charged with breaking and entering the dwelling house of W. R. Richey in the nighttime, but that a partition 8 or 9 feet high from the floor is sufficient (People v. Young, 65 Cal. 225, 3 Pac. 813), yet it has also been said that, under a statute making it a criminal offense to break and enter "any house, room, apartment, or tenement," a house is any structure which has walls on all sides, and is covered by a roof (People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 242).

It has been held that, under a statute making it an indictable offense to break and enter any dwelling house, shop, or other building with intent to commit a felony therein, one cannot be properly convicted simply for entering the "yard" of a dwelling house with intent to steal. Com. v. Taggart, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 340.

So, evidence that one came to a picket fence in front of a house, in which there was a small gate, but did not pass the gate nor come nearer to the house than 12 or 13 feet, and then went away without committing any overt act toward carrying out a possible design to break in and steal, is not sufficient to sustain a conviction for an attempt to commit burglary. Reg. v. McCann, 28 U. C. Q. B. 514.

It has also been held that breaking an area gate is not the breaking of a dwelling, so as to constitute burglary, when the area is separated from the house by a door. Rex v. Davis, Russ. & R. C. C. 322. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with intent of committing a felony, on September 22, 1912. After conviction, a motion for a new trial was made by appellant, which was overruled, and after sentence appellant appeals and alleges ten specifications of error on the part of his Honor. The first five exceptions allege error on the part of his Honor in overruling the motion for a new trial, in that there was no testimony to sustain the verdict, as the evidence showed that the portion of the house entered was the piazza, unprotected and uninclosed, and was not such a place to be legally the subject of burglary, and there was no evidence that the defendant broke and entered a dwelling house as alleged in the indictment; and in holding that picket gates, in contemplation of law, put on the piazza outside of the house, constituted a protection or security to the habitation of the dwelling, when the evidence showed that the gates were not put there for any such purpose, but to keep out dogs and chickens; and in holding that under the indictment the appellant could be convicted of burglary in breaking out of said dwelling house, when there was no evidence of such breaking; and for the further reason there was no evidence of any breaking or entering in the house to steal, no breaking out, and no evidence at all of any theft or other felony committed by the appellant in consequence of such entry. The ninth and tenth exceptions raise the point there was no evidence to sustain

So, proof that one broke open a large outer gate and entered a yard from which there was no obstruction to entering a house, but that he was taken before so entering the house, though with instruments of house breaking upon him, is insufficient to sustain a conviction for burglary; the outer fence of the curtilage, not opening directly into any building, is no part of the dwelling house. Rex v. Bennett, Russ. & R. C. C. 289.

But in Com. v. Smith, 6 Phila. 305, it was held that one who arms himself with a deadly weapon and other implements of burglars, and goes to the premises of another and tries to force, and in so doing breaks, a gate which is attached to the wall of the house, and which opens upon an alley leading to the rear of the same, is properly convicted of an attempt to commit burglary.

Under the theory that a log cabin (State v. Jake, 60 N. C. (2 Winst. L.) 80 or a storehouse (State v. Outlaw, 72 N. C. 598; United States v. Johnson, 2 Cranch, C. C. 21, Fed. Cas. No. 15,485), or other room in which some person regularly or usually sleeps, is a "dwelling house," within which burglary may be committed, it might be a question whether it would not be burglary to enter a sleeping porch.

the verdict. The facts, as developed at the trial in brief, are: That the dwelling house of Mr. Richey is on West Main street, in the city of Laurens; that the house is surrounded on the front and on the east and west ends by a piazza, with balustrade 2½ feet high. From the top of balustrade to the overhead ceiling of the piazza is an open space of 6 or 7 feet. On the front there was an opening on the piazza of 12 feet through the balustrade. On the east and west ends there was an opening of 8 feet from the back yard on each end of the piazza. There was a picket gate to each end, opening of the same height as the balustrade, leaving the open space above to the ceiling. It was the custom to keep these gates closed to keep out chickens, dogs, etc. The evidence shows the defendant appellant was familiar with the premises. On the night in question it was damp and raining; during the night Puckett was found on the piazza of the house under suspicious circumstances. There is no question about that, and there was sufficient testimony to go to the jury as to whether the gates to the piazza were closed or not. He did not enter the dwelling house proper at all, and there is no evidence that he stole anything, or made any overt act to commit a felony. The sole question is whether the piazza was such a part of the dwelling house in this case, under the facts as proven, as to make it a subject of burglary, and, if so, did the appellant break and enter it in the nighttime with intent to steal, or did he enter it without breaking in the nighttime, with intent to steal, and then break out.

Common-law burglary is the breaking and entering the dwelling house of another in the nighttime, with intent to commit a felony. There must be a breaking and entering. It must be a dwelling house; it must be in the nighttime; and it must be with the intent to commit a felony. There must be a breaking of "the inclosing parts of a dwelling house." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 91; State v. Sampson, 12 S. C. 568, 32 Am. Rep. 513; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 11th ed. 1190, § 971; Clark, Crim. Law, § 100.

The evidence shows the appellant only on the piazza, and under the facts, as proven, it does not show that the piazza was such a part of the dwelling house as was contemplated by law, to make it an offense to enter in the nighttime against the security of the dwelling house. In the case of Henry v. State, 39 Ala. 679, the accused was charged with larceny under the statute imposing a penalty upon "any person who shall commit larceny in any dwelling house." Certain clothes had been stolen from the piazza in front of the dwelling house and attached to it. The court held: "Such a piazza is not a house, and cannot be a dwelling house. It may be attached to the house. . . . A larceny committed in the piazza cannot be said to have been committed in or inside of the house."

The entry of a piazza attached to the house outside of the house, the place where callers are accustomed to wait until someone in the house responds to a ring or knock, or to enter and sit on the piazza to get out of the rain or sun, or to rest, may be a trespass or bad taste, but it is quite different from opening the closed doors of a house and intruding in the sanctity of the dwelling.

A careful examination of all the evidence in the case convinces us that there was not sufficient testimony to convict the appellant of the offense charged, and his Honor was in error in not setting the verdict aside.

The appellant was not indicted for an attempt to commit a burglary, although 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 11th ed. 1041, says, "An attempt at burglary is indictable at common law;" but appellant was indicted for burglary, not an attempt to commit burglary.

Judgment reversed.

SAM BURNAMAN, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 159 S. W. 244.)

Evidence — to show bias of witness — acts in absence of accused.

1. Evidence that a witness for accused in a criminal case attempted to influence the testimony of other witnesses in favor of accused is properly admitted to show bias

Note. — Right to show that a witness attempted to influence other witnesses for or against accused.

This note is confined to criminal cases, but includes cases where the defendant himself was a witness. As indicated by the title, no discussion is here entered into with regard to the admissibility of evidence that third parties, not witnesses in the case, attempted to influence a witness.

While evidence introduced for the purpose of impeachment of a witness must not be collateral or irrelevant to the case, this rule does not generally exclude evidence as to a witness's mental attitude, state of feelings, capacity, animus, motive, or ill-will, or evidence which may tend to show bias, hostility, or interest. BURNAMAN v. STATE is in harmony with the general rule to the effect on the part of the witness, although no predicate is laid, and he acted in the absence and without the knowledge of accused.

Same — waiver of incompetent evidence — acquiescence in admission.

2. The admission of incompetent evidence is waived by stating, after objecting to it: "All right; go ahead," without moving to exclude it after the answer is given, although an exception is noted.

Appeal — evidence showing bias of witness — failure to limit.

3. The court's failure to limit evidence tending to show that a witness in a murder case attempted to influence a witness to testify a certain way by reciting to him the facts which he wished to be given in evidence, to the impeachment of such witness, is not error, since the jury could have used it for no other purpose.

that, in criminal cases, either party has a right to show that any witness has attempted to influence any other witness for or against the accused, since proof of such an attempt would go to show bias, hostility, or interest in the former witness, and might affect his credibility. And it is not necessary, under this rule, to show that defendant was present during such attempt on the part of one of his witnesses, or knew anything about it, since evidence of such attempt is not admitted for the purpose of impeaching the defendant or showing his guilt, but only for the purpose of weakening the effect of the testimony of the witness. The general rule stated above applies to all of the four possible situations which may arise, viz., right of the state to show that a witness for the defendant has attempted to influence a state's witness; right of the state to show that a witness for the defendant has attempted to influence another witness for defendant; right of defendant to show that a witness for the state has attempted to influence a witness for the defendant; and right of defendant to show that a witness for the state has attempted to influence another witness for the state. And the rule is the same when either witness in question is the defendant himself testifying in his own behalf.

Right of state to show that defendant's witness has attempted to influence a state's witness.

The rule is settled that in a criminal prosecution the state may show, for the purpose of impeaching a witness for defendant, that such witness has attempted to influence a witness for the state in favor of the defendant. This may be shown by the testimony of the state's witness. State v. Cook, 13 Idaho, 45, 88 Pac. 240 (attempt of defendant's witness to persuade him to leave the state, and not to testify against defendant); BURNAMAN v. STATE (defendant's witness telling prosecuting witness that they must get together and understand the matter alike, so that they could tell the same story on the trial)

Or by cross-examination of defendant himself, testifying in his own behalf. Carothers v. State, 75 Ark. 574, 88 S. W. 585 (attempt of defendant to silence testimony against himself by effort to get material witness for state out of county).

Or by cross-examination of witness for defendant. People v. Mack, 14 Cal. App. 12, 110 Pac. 967 (attempt of defendant's witness to induce prosecuting witness to drop case, and to absent herself from the county); Seaborn v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2203, 86 S. W. 223 (defendant's witness effecting the absence of state's witnesses who testified in behalf of the state before the examining court); State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. W. 1089 (defendant's witness offering prosecuting witness money to leave the city, and not to appear against defendant); Webb v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 58 S. W. 31 (defendant's witness simply asking prosecuting witness what he swore to in the grand jury room).

And if the witness for defendant denies on cross-examination that he made the alleged attempt, he may be contradicted by the testimony of the witness for the state whom he is alleged to have attempted to influence. Lewis v. State, 35 Ala. 380 (defendant's witness telling a witness for the prosecution that he must swear to a certain statement, and if he did not, said defendant's witness would whip him); People v. Mack, supra; Sims v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 637, 44 S. W. 522 (defendant's witness approaching state's witness and telling him that defendant was a particular friend of the former, and asking him to be as light on defendant as possible,—that he would never lose anything by it); Webb v. State, supra.

But in Gann v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 57 S. W. 668, it was held that a witness for the defendant should not be permitted to testify that he requested another witness Messrs. Blount & Strong and C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Prendergast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was indicted for the murder of his brother-in-law, Mike Manning. On a trial he was convicted of manslaughter, and his penalty fixed at five years in the penitentiary.

One of the state's most material witnesses was Bill Lee, who gave pertinent testimony against appellant. He and appellant's brother, Phillip Burnaman, were together near Phillip's house at the time appellant killed deceased. Immediately after the killing appellant went from the scene to said Lee and appellant's brother, Phillip, and made certain res gestæ statements to them. The state introduced Bill Lee when first opening and presenting its case. He at that time fully testified to said res gestæ statements. After introducing other testimony, the state rested. Appellant thereupon, among other witnesses, introduced his brother, Phillip Burnaman, who was a most material witness for appellant, and gave pertinent and strong testimony in his favor, disputing, in part at least, the testimony of said Bill Lee as to said res gestæ statement, and adding thereto material and strong testimony tending to establish appellant's most material defense, which was self-defense. The state, in crossing appellant's brother, Phillip, did not ask him if he had attempted to get said Lee to testify as he (Phillip) did as to said additional not to testify against defendant as to certain facts within his knowledge, upon the ground that the request was made without the authority of defendant and in his absence, and the judgment was reversed because of the wrongful admission of such testimony. The court enters into no argument in support of this position, but cites certain cases, which on examination are found not to sustain the decision. The cases cited are for the most part those where the attempt at influencing a witness sought to be proved was made by one not a witness in the case, and where the proof was offered to affect the defendant's character directly, or to show his guilt, and not for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, those cases thus resting upon a different principle. Moreover, the Gann Case has since been disregarded by the Texas courts. See Webb and Pace Cases, supra.

The case coming nearest to the point here involved, and cited in the Gann Case, is Marshall v. State, 5 Tex. App. 273, where it was held that, under a statute providing that the confession of a defendant shall not be used in evidence against him, if at the time it was made the defendant was in the custody of an officer, or if he was not first warned that it might be used against him, evidence of a state's witness that defendant told him while in the presence and custody of the deputy sheriff, to go and see another witness and tell him to leave the country, and that if he would leave, defendant would furnish him all the money he wanted, is not admissible as a confession of guilt which could be obviated only by getting the principal state's witness out of the country.

Right of state to show that defendant's witness has attempted to influence another witness for defendant.

It is also the settled rule that the state in a criminal prosecution may, for the purpose of impeaching a witness for defendant, show that such witness has attempted to influence another witness for defendant in the latter's favor. This may be shown by cross-examining defendant himself while testifying in his own behalf. State v. Deal, 52 Or. 568, 98 Pac. 165 (defendant attempting to persuade another witness to testify to facts favorable to defendant as of witness's own knowledge, when really they were not such); Grabowski v. State, 126 Wis. 447, 105 N. W. 805 (defendant building up his own case in taking two men as witnesses to a certain place and then bringing them to court to testify).

Or by cross-examining defendant's witness. People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 624, 49 Pac. 833 (as to attempt of defendant's witness to bribe another witness to give false testimony in interest of defendant); State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (as to conversations between defendant's witnesses concerning the crime, for the purpose of ascertaining how much concert of action there was between them, and how much the story of either or both had been developed, changed, or modified by such conversations); Lowry v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 562, 110 S. W. 911 (as to defendant's witness telling another that if she would help to destroy certain evidence and would swear for defendant, defendant would beat); Irvin v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 148 S. W. 589 (as to witness for defendant seeing other witnesses about the defense, and approaching them in an improper way); State v. Carr, 65 W. Va. 81, 63 S. E. 766 (as to defendant's witness conversing with another such witness about the case before trial, trying to influence her in favor of the defendant).

And if, on cross-examination, such witness for defendant denies the attempt, he may be contradicted by the testimony of the other witness. People v. Wong Chuey, supra; Barry v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 302, 39 S. W. 692 (defendant's witness interested in procuring another to testify for defendant or in fabricating testimony); Lowry v. State, supra.

Thus, evidence is admissible to the effect that a witness has gone to another witness and told her to stand up for defendant, and material res gestæ statement, or what appellant had said to them and exhibited to them immediately after said killing. In rebuttal, after appellant had closed his testimony, the state reintroduced said Lee, who testified, denying pointedly the testimony of appellant's brother, Phillip, as to said additional claimed res gestæ statement. (The court, in approving appellant's bill raising this question, allowed it in connection with the full statement of the evidence, as shown by the statement of facts.) The witness Phillip Burnaman, after having testified for appellant, was excused by the court from further attendance, with notice to both parties, and had gone to his home, some miles distant, and his further attendance was not had, and he was not again placed on the stand.

We here quote in full what then occurred and what said witness Lee testified:

State: Now, the other question we want to ask this witness in regard to the statement of that absent witness, we can't do it unless we have him here to ask the question.

Court: Well, if that is all, stand him aside.

State: We will ask the question.

not to tell anything against him. Pearson v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 607, 120 S. W. 1004.

And it is proper for the state to prove that certain witnesses met a brother of defendant in defendant's presence, and with his knowledge and at his instigation, one of the witnesses received a horse and saddle with which to leave the country, and avoid testifying, especially where it appears that defendant had already inquired if such witness could be bribed, and had made arrangements with regard to the payment of his debt. Clark v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 522.

And in Parker v. State, 11 Ga. App. 251, 75 S. E. 437, it was held to be proper to ask a witness for defendant whether he did not attempt to bribe or suborn another witness in the case, provided counsel expects to prove that to be the fact; but the court adds that, if the question is asked merely for the purpose of discrediting the witness, and without any bona fide intention of proving the facts referred to, counsel simply hoping to leave a trail of indefinable prejudice in the minds of the jury, his conduct would be most reprehensible.

But in Burks v. State, 72 Ark. 461, 82 S. W. 490, it was held erroneous to permit the prosecuting attorney to ask the father of the defendant what he gave another witness to testify in the case for the defendant; such a question does not ask whether the one witness has bribed another to testify, which the court says would have been permissible, but assumes that where there was bribery and simply asks how much had been paid for the testimony. It therefore appears to have been asked simply to prejudice the defendant and other witnesses in the eyes of the jury, and was highly improper.

Right of defendant to show that a state's witness has attempted to influence a witness for the defense.

It is likewise the right of the defendant, for the purpose of impeaching a state's witness, to show that such witness has attempted to influence a witness for the defense. This may be shown by cross-examination of such state's witness. Scott v. State, 113 Ala. 64, 21 So. 425 (showing that the witness for the prosecution "ran" another person away from the town, in order to keep him from testifying for defendant); State v. Koller, 129 Iowa, 111, 105 N. W. 391 (showing an attempt by the prosecuting witness to dissuade some of defendant's witnesses from attending and testifying in his behalf); Richardson v. State, 90 Md. 109, 44 Atl. 999, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 222 (showing that the state's witness offered to pay a certain sum to keep a witness for the defendant away until after the trial, or that he offered a bribe to another witness, to induce him to testify, after that other had informed him that he knew nothing but hearsay about the case); Sapp v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 77 S. W. 456 (showing that the state's witness induced another party to go off the bond of one of defendant's witnesses, the bond being for another offense, because the latter witness was one for defendant).

And if such state's witness denies the allegation, he may be contradicted by the testimony of the other. Richardson v. State and Sapp v. State, supra.

Right of defendant to show that a state's witness has attempted to influence another witness for the state.

And finally, the defendant, for the purpose of impeachment, has a right to show that a state's witness has attempted to influence another witness for the state. This may be shown by cross-examining the one alleged to have made the attempt. State v. Rutledge, 135 Iowa, 581, 113 N. W. 461 (one prosecuting witness endeavoring to intimidate others); State v. Hakon, 21 N. D. 133, 129 N. W. 234 (state's witness offering to bribe another to testify falsely); Green v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 3, 111 S. W. 933 (cross-examining prosecuting witness as to his admission to another state's witness of his own bad position in the case, and as to his effort to coach the other as to the evidence he should give).

And if such state's witness denies the allegation, defendant should be given opportunity to contradict him by the testimony of the other. Green v. State, supra. And, generally, when a witness has denied on cross-examination that he was active in getting testimony, he may be contradicted by other witnesses. Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 618.

Defendant: We object if there is no predicate laid.

State: It is a question I don't think a predicate has to be laid for; the court can pass on that proposition.

Q. I will ask you whether or not, since the morning of the homicide there, that means the killing, after you met Sam, since that time the brother of Sam, that is, Phillip, has approached you and told you that you and him must get together and understand this matter alike, so that you could tell it alike when you came to court?

A. Yes, sir.

Defendant: We object to that; that is certainly not impeaching testimony to begin with, and if there is any,— all right; go ahead; we don't care.

A. Phillip has talked to me twice about that. In the conversation with Phillip, he undertook to call my attention to the fact, and asked me if I didn't see cut places there; that was a day or so, a couple of days, after the killing took place; I went back up there to work, and he says, "Didn't Sam show us that cut place on his jumper?" and I says, "No, he didn't show it to me," and he says, "I saw it somewhere," and says, "It seems to me like it was when he come up here," and he says, "You want

Or the attempt of one state's witness to influence another may be shown by cross-examining the one upon whom the attempt is alleged to have been made. Salm v. State, 89 Ala. 56, 8 So. 66 (showing that another prosecuting witness induced the one testifying to swear out a warrant against the defendant charging him with a criminal offense); Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 122, 105 S. W. 804 (showing that another state's witness tried to get the one testifying to testify falsely).

And in the proceedings against the Five Popish Lords for high treason, and the subsequent trial of Lord Viscount Stafford, in 1680, reported in 7 Howell's State Trials, beginning at p. 1217, it appears at pp. 1400 et seq. that witnesses for the prosecution were allowed to testify as to attempts by another state's witness to bribe them to swear falsely against the defendants.

Also, the defendant may show that witnesses have formed a conspiracy against him, as evidencing the spirit which animates such witnesses, and aiding the jury in placing a proper estimate upon the value and importance of their testimony. State v. Breeden, 58 Mo. 507.

And a letter written by a detective who is also a witness for the state, to another witness for the state, telling her that it is time for her to get busy and to keep him posted, and asking if she knows anything of value, written after the alleged crime and before the trial, is relevant and admissible in evidence as tending to illustrate the interest which the witnesses have in the case. Goforth v. State, — Ala. —, 63 So. 8.

As said in Salm v. State, supra, proof that one witness attempts to influence another against the accused shows unfriendliness towards the latter, and is competent evidence, not necessarily as discrediting such witness, but as a circumstance to be weighed by the jury in determining whether bribery or ill feeling does not to some extent color the testimony thus given.

But it has been held that where two state's witnesses give substantially the same account of the affray when arrested about the same time in widely separated places, it is not reversible error for the court upon the trial to refuse to permit defendant to ask one of these witnesses if he did not have a private conversation with the other soon after the crime was committed; such a question was said not to be proper cross-examination, and not necessary to lay the foundation for impeachment. But the court adds that if such conversation occurred, it would be proper for the defendant to show it by his own witnesses. State v. Munchrath, 78 Iowa, 268, 43 N. W. 211.

And the defendant should not be allowed to prove that one state's witness hired out another state's witness to a third state's witness, where there is nothing to show that such hiring would tend to prejudice or bribe any one of them against the defendant, neither the state nor the defendant having had anything to do with the hiring. Green v. State, 168 Ala. 90, 53 So. 286.

And examination of one witness as to what he has told another witness he is going to testify to in the case does not tend to show that the testimony of the first was suggested to him by the second (but the converse), and such examination should not be allowed with that alleged object. Sylvester v. State, 46 Fla. 166, 35 So. 142.

Nor is it reversible error to exclude evidence that a witness for the prosecution was implicated in an attempt to procure false testimony from other witnesses, when such evidence is not offered to show his bias or to affect his credibility, but only on the broad ground that evidence of any such attempt is admissible as such, especially when the witness thus attacked has not testified as to any facts in dispute. Com. v. Min Sing, 202 Mass. 121, 88 N. E. 918.

And in an early English case, it was held that when a witness for the prosecution has been examined in chief, and has not been asked on cross-examination as to any declarations made by him or acts done by him to procure persons corruptly to give evidence in support of the prosecution, it is not competent for the defendant to prove by his witnesses such declarations or acts, without first calling back such witness examined in chief to be examined or cross-examined as to the declarations or acts alleged; and this rule was held to apply even though the discovery of his attempt to corrupt witnesses occurred after his examination in chief and cross-examination. Queen's Case, 2 Brod. & B. 311, 22 Revised Rep. 662, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 183.

to understand this has got to go to court," and I says, "Well, I know it. I have been summoned to go to court."

Q. And what was it he said to you when he was talking, that you answered while ago that you must get together on the matter?

Defendant: We object to that.

Court: What was it?

State: I asked him what was it the brother, Phillip, said about getting together.

Defendant: Go ahead and relate it again.

A. I started to preaching one evening, and Phillip saw me coming, and come and met me, and he stopped me and says, "You know this little thing is going to be in before the grand jury now right away, and we want to get together—"

Defendant: We object because this is the statement between two witnesses in the absence of the defendant.

Court: It only goes to the credibility of the witness.

Defendant: There is no predicate laid for it.

Court: I don't think it is a character of matter that requires a predicate.

Defendant: We except to the ruling of the court.

"And he says we want to get together and tell this matter so we can tell it alike," and I told him that I had done told it once just like I saw it,—that was the way I was trying to tell it, and I rode off and left him standing there in the road. After Sam came up there where me and Phillip were after the shooting, and on that same morning before the body was moved, I saw Sam Burnaman again; he was leading his horse as we were moving Mike; we met him coming leading his horse out of the pasture; we were in about 7 or 8 steps of him; I don't know whether his jumper was buttoned at that time or not; I didn't notice anything wrong with his clothes or torn places anyway, but I didn't notice him much because I was helping carry Mike. I never at either of those times noticed that his clothing were torn and his breast open, or anything of that kind.

By his second bill appellant claims that the court committed reversible error in failing and omitting to limit the effect of the said testimony of Bill Lee to impeachment purposes alone of his brother, Phillip. His contention is that it is error for the court to have permitted, over his objections, the state to prove that his brother, Phillip, undertook to persuade said Lee to change or manufacture his testimony, unless it be shown that he was connected with or authorized the same. The state contends that this testimony by Lee was admissible as original evidence, for the purpose of showing the bias and interest of Phillip in his brother's favor; that it shows or tends to show the motive of Phillip in testifying as he did in appellant's favor.

It has many times been decided by this court, and we think it is elementary, that the "motives which operate upon the mind of the witness when he testifies are never regarded as immaterial or collateral matters. A party may prove declarations of the witness which tend to show bias, interest, prejudice, or any other mental state or status, which, fairly construed, might tend to affect his credibility." Pope v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 613, and cases therein cited and principles therein held. The rule is that the hostility of a witness towards a party against whom he is called may be proved by any competent evidence. It may be shown by cross-examination of the witness, or other witnesses may be called who can swear to facts showing it. In People v. Brooks, 131 N. Y. 321, 30 N. E. 189, the rule is thus stated:

"The hostility of a witness towards a party against whom he is called may be proved by any competent evidence. It may be shown by cross-examination of the witness, or witnesses may be called who can swear to facts showing it. There can be no reason for holding that the witness must first be examined as to his hostility, and that then, and not till then, witnesses may be called to contradict him, because it is not a case where the party against whom the witness is called is seeking to discredit him by contradicting him. He is simply seeking to discredit him by showing his hostility and malice, and as that may be proved by any competent evidence, we see no reason for holding that he must first be examined as to his hostility." This rule was again reasserted in Brink v. Stratton, 176 N. Y. 150, 63 L.R.A. 182, 68 N. E. 148.

Mr. Underhill, in his excellent work on Criminal Evidence, § 248, says: "The bias of the witness and his interest in the event of the prosecution are not collateral, and may always be proved, to enable the jury to estimate his credibility. They may be proved by his own testimony upon cross-examination, or by independent evidence. . . . The bias of the witness may be shown either by independent testimony, or by questions put to him upon his examination." This court has expressly held this in several decisions. Cockrell v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 128, 131 S. W. 221; Porch v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 11, 99 S. W. 1122; Bonnard v. State, 25 Tex. App. 195, 8 Am. St. Rep. 431, 7 S. W. 862, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 462. So has our court of civil appeals at Galveston. Trinity County Lumber Co. v. Denham, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 553. To the same effect, see also People v. Mallon, 116 App. Div. 425, 101 N. Y. Supp. 814, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 520, 81 N. E. 1171; Morgan v. Wood, 24 Misc. 739, 53 N. Y. Supp. 791. In 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1127, it is said: "In some states evidence showing that a witness is interested in the result of litigation, or otherwise biased in favor of or against one of the parties, is admissible, without first examining the witness on the subject [citing the decisions of several states so holding]." In the same section, however, it is further stated: "The weight of authority is to the contrary, however, at least where the bias is sought to be shown by the declarations of the witness himself." Again in 40 Cyc. p. 2676, it is laid down: "A party seeking to show interest or bias of an adverse witness is not confined to cross-examination, but may introduce independent evidence for the purpose [citing many decisions, some the same as cited in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, above noted]." Again, in the following section the further rule is laid down, indicating that the foundation for this must first be laid by asking the witness himself. We think it is evident that the two rules are not in conflict. The latter proposition in both of these authorities indicates that the latter rule is where it is attempted, by independent testimony, to show such bias, interest, etc., by the witness having made statements contradicting his testimony on the trial. The distinction in the books is not always kept clear. So, in this case, if it had been attempted to impeach the witness Phillip Burnaman by showing by the witness Lee that he had made statements theretofore in contradiction of his testimony on the trial, and such had been attempted to be introduced, then, as a foundation therefor, it would have been necessary to have asked the witness Phillip Burnaman himself such questions before such contradictory statements could have been proven. If the appellant had not used as a witness his brother, Phillip, and his brother had not given such material testimony in behalf of appellant, the testimony of Lee on this point would not have been admissible at all. It is because his brother, Phillip, testified, that said Lee's evidence showing Phillip's interest and bias in appellant's favor became admissible.

Appellant cites many cases in his brief to the effect that it is error to permit the state, over his objections, to prove that his friends, relatives, or attorneys have undertaken to persuade a witness to give, change, or manufacture testimony in his 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

favor, unless it be shown that the appellant was connected therewith, or authorized the same. This also is a correct legal proposition, and the cases cited by appellant sustain his proposition; but, as stated above, that is not what was attempted in this case. The testimony of Bill Lee was introduced, not for the purpose of showing indirectly or directly that appellant authorized or requested his brother, Phillip, to get Lee to change his testimony, or show that Phillip's attempted tampering with the witness Lee was at his instance, or that he was connected therewith, but simply for the purpose of showing the bias and interest of Phillip in behalf of appellant. And we think the evidence of Bill Lee on this point could not have been reasonably or otherwise construed to be that Phillip's attempted tampering with Lee was at his instance, or in his behalf, with his knowledge or consent.

It is also elementary that it is improper for the court in his charge to limit the effect of proof which shows the motive or interest of either the appellant or any material witness for him. Such a charge would clearly be upon the weight of the testimony, and a comment thereon, which is prohibited. The appellant requested no charge in this case. He attempted to raise the question by motion for new trial alone.

Again, as shown above, when this testimony was first offered by the state, and the appellant first indicated that he was objecting thereto, it is shown that he said: "All right; go ahead; we don't care." And when the witness was asked to repeat it, appellant again said: "Go ahead, and relate it again," and the witness did so. No motion was then, or afterwards, made to exclude this testimony. So that under no phase, as we see it, did the court commit any reversible error in admitting this testimony under the circumstances.

Now let us see if the court should have limited the effect of said Lee's testimony on this point, and by not doing so committed reversible error. The rule is as stated by Mr. Branch in his Criminal Law of Texas, § 367: "Testimony does not have to be limited, where it can only be used by the jury for the purpose for which it was introduced. Leeper v. State, 29 Tex. App. 69, 14 S. W. 398; Franklin v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 348, 43 S. W. 85; Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 129, 105 S. W. 804; Rice v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 167, 112 S. W. 299; Wright v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 358, 120 S. W. 458; Wilson v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 1, 129 S. W. 614; Malcek v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 20, 24 S. W. 417; Brown v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep.

233, 53 S. W. 866; Harrold v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 570, 81 S. W. 728." And as again laid down by him in § 873, subd. 3, p. 555: "If impeaching testimony can only be used by the jury to impeach a witness, it is not necessary to charge on the subject at all. Brown v. State, 24 Tex. App. 170, 5 S. W. 685; Magee v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 512; Robinson v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 63 S. W. 870; Newman v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 70 S. W. 953; Watson v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 90, 105 S. W. 509; Waters v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 327, 114 S. W. 628; Thompson v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 120, 113 S. W. 536; Schwartz v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 451, 111 S. W. 399; Poyner v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 640, 51 S. W. 376; Givens v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 563, 34 S. W. 626; Blanco v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 57 S. W. 828."

Take this evidence as succinctly and pertinently stated by appellant's bill, which shows the state was permitted to prove by Lee that Phillip Burnaman approached him and said to him as follows: "Say, we must get together on this little thing. You know they are going to have us before the court?" I said: 'Yes; I reckon they will, but all I am trying to do is to tell the truth about it.' So Phillip Burnaman then said to me again: 'Well, we want to get together on this matter; now you know that he (Sam) came down to us after he killed Mike, and told us that he had to kill him, because Mike was coming on him with his knife; that they had had a fight down in the field, and Mike had cut his jumper, and he showed us the place where Mike cut him?' and I told him that I did not notice that, nor hear him say that, and he said, 'Now we must get together on this matter.'" This testimony could not have been used by the jury for any other purpose whatever than to show Phillip's interest in behalf of appellant and his bias in his favor, and thus affect his credit as a witness. It could not have been used by the jury in any way to establish appellant's guilt, or to disprove his defense. Hence the court did not err in failing to charge limiting it to the impeachment of Phillip Burnaman.

The court in his charge, in giving general definitions and laying down general propositions on self-defense, in a separate paragraph, charged: "If defendant in the course of the fatal altercation fired a number of shots, you are instructed that if the first shot was fired under circumstances amounting to self-defense, the defendant had the right in self-defense to continue to shoot as long as it reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger. And if such first shot was fired in self-defense, and defendant fired other shots into the head or body of deceased, thereby producing or hastening the death of deceased, when it no longer reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger, then such later shots would not be in self-defense (but the offense in such case would be of no higher grade than manslaughter)." Appellant objected to this paragraph of the charge, and especially to the last line or two thereof, inclosed in parentheses, as above shown, claiming that it was an undue limitation and restriction of his right of self-defense. The testimony shows that the shooting of the deceased by appellant was with a 22-target rifle; that, in order to fire each shot, a lever had to be worked to eject the shell as it was fired, and thereby or otherwise shift the next cartridge from the magazine into the barrel of the gun before it could be again fired; that the appellant shot the deceased thus, though rapidly, nine separate and distinct times, each of the nine shots taking effect in the body of deceased. The doctors testified that three of these separate and distinct shots were fired into the top of the head in such course as to show that they were evidently fired after the deceased had fallen and was lying prostrate on the ground; that at least five of the balls which were shot into the body of the deceased were necessarily fatal. It was further shown, by the physical facts on the ground, that the deceased never approached appellant nearer, as appellant himself testified, than "30 feet or something like that." And they were some fifteen or sixteen steps apart. Appellant claimed and testified in effect that he believed deceased was coming on him for the purpose of attacking him with a knife, and that the indications by the deceased's movements with his hand indicated that, if not with a knife, with some other deadly instrument. The testimony was overwhelming that deceased was wholly unarmed, except a small pocketknife, which was found in his pocket closed when searching for arms immediately after the killing; that there were no other arms of any character on or about the person of deceased when he was killed. Appellant himself in effect testified that he saw no knife or other weapon in appellant's hand at any time immediately prior to or at the killing. It was also overwhelmingly shown later, when the body of the deceased was removed to his home, and he was undressed in preparation for burial, that his person and pockets were again searched, and no other arms of any kind were found in his pocket or otherwise about his person, other than said small pocketknife belonging to deceased, which was closed and in his pocket. It was shown that deceased's wife, after his pants were removed in preparation for burial, took them, laid them on a barrel in another room in her residence, and at that time no other knife was in his pocket or otherwise about his pants. It is true that some witnesses on the trial testified that the next day they examined his pants, picking them up off of said barrel, and that then there was found a large knife belonging to one of the witnesses in the pants pocket of the deceased. Even if that knife was so found after that length of time in his pocket, it was closed and in his pocket.

Under the circumstances we think that the general proposition laid down in said last-above quoted charge was a correct proposition. Certainly it cannot be contended with any show of reason that appellant had the right to continue to shoot into the head or body of the deceased when it no longer reasonably appeared to appellant that he was in any danger from the claimed assault or attempted assault by deceased upon him. And clearly after several necessarily fatal shots had been fired into his body, and he was lying prostrate on the ground 30 feet from the appellant, he did not have any right, in self-defense or otherwise, to fire three or more other fatal shots into the top of the head or body of the deceased.

Besides this, in the latter portion of the court's charge, when he submitted appellant's claimed self-defense to the jury, he correctly and fully submitted it in every phase that the evidence raised, in appellant's favor. And even if the general definition and principle laid down in the charge quoted was incorrect, it would not have the effect, and could not have had the effect, of unduly limiting or restricting appellant's right of self-defense, and could not and did not in any way mislead the jury, or have a tendency to do so, against appellant.

The court, in submitting appellant's defense of self-defense, we think, clearly submitted it in accordance with the law and the evidence from both phases,—self-defense separate and distinct from threats, and then, in a separate paragraph, his defense based on threats by the deceased against him. The charges of the court on these subjects are lengthy. It is unnecessary to quote them. Upon a careful consideration of all of appellant's criticisms of the court's charge, we think none of his criticisms show any reversible error, and that appellant's rights on both of these theories were clearly, fully, and accurately submitted in accordance with the law and 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the evidence applicable thereto in this case. Appellant requested no special charge on the subject.

There are no other questions presented which are necessary to review.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Davidson, P. J., dissenting:

I cannot agree with the opinion of the majority affirming this judgment. The propositions announced and rules laid down in the prevailing opinion are so directly contrary and opposed to what has been the settled law in Texas so long that I feel impelled to enter this dissent. I deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion at length of these matters, inasmuch as Messrs. King & King have filed such an able, elaborate, and unanswerable brief I shall content myself with adopting that brief and argument as my dissenting opinion. In their argument every proposition presented and affirmed by my brethren has been so successfully met from a legal standpoint I could not improve upon it; therefore, I adopt it as my dissenting opinion. It is as follows:

"In the preparation of his opinion the writer draws certain inferences from the evidence, which we do not believe the record justifies. He adopts that portion of the defendant's evidence suitable for the holding, but ignores the remaining part of his testimony. The questions are not at all new to the criminal jurisprudence in this state; and while we would not invoke the rule of stare decisis, yet this court has so uniformly held with the contentions here made, therefore we cannot but insist that the opinion of affirmance is not the law in this state, and a rehearing should be granted.

"The court erred in its opinion of affirmance, in holding that the testimony of Lee, recited in bill of exception No. 1, that appellant's brother approached him and undertook to have him change or compromise his testimony, was not collateral to the main issue, and that same was admissible as original testimony, though it does not appear from the record or the bill that appellant was responsible therefor. The following authorities amply sustain this proposition: Hoy v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 340, 45 S. W. 916; Rice v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 280, 103 S. W. 1156; Garcia v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 74 S. W. 916; Clark v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 522; Pace v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 79 S. W. 532; Sims v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 644, 44 S. W. 522.

"The fact that appellant's brother, who had testified in support of his defense, had been excused by the court, and was at the time absent, does not serve to change the rule announced by the above authorities. It is shown in the statement of facts that appellant's brother was excused by the court in the presence of the prosecuting officers, and that they knew he was then leaving town, and, when the state proposed to introduce the witness Lee to give the testimony complained of in the bill, that they did not believe the testimony was admissible without a predicate made, while appellant's brother was upon the stand. On page 87 of the statement of facts, and at the bottom of the page, as the state began to introduce such testimony, we find that the defendant objected, first, because no predicate had been laid, and that the state replied: 'It is a question I don't think a predicate has to be laid for; the court can pass on that question,'—and again, on page 88 of the statement of facts, when the defendant earnestly insisted upon his objection for the reason that the occurrence happened in the absence of the defendant, the court said: 'It only goes to the credibility of the witness.'

"Defendant: 'There is no predicate laid for it.'

"Court: 'I don't think it is a character of matter that requires a predicate.'

"The state not only knew that no predicate had been laid when appellant's brother was testifying, but knew that the witness had been excused, and would not longer be in attendance upon the court, and stated, in effect, at the time the testimony was offered, that it was necessary to lay a predicate. The court took a different view from that entertained both by counsel for appellant or counsel for state, and admitted the testimony as original evidence, the theory upon which the opinion of affirmance holds that it was admissible.

"The opinion holds that it was admissible as original evidence, but then proceeds to assert that it was for the purpose of impeaching appellant's brother as a witness, and that it could have been considered for no other purpose by the jury.

"Mr. Wharton in his Criminal Evidence, 9th ed. § 484, explaining what a collateral issue is, quotes from a Pennsylvania case as follows: 'The test of whether or not a fact inquired of in cross-examination is collateral is this: Would the cross-examining party be entitled to prove it as a part of his case tending to establish his plea?' See also Hart v. State, 15 Tex. App. 202, 49 Am. Rep. 188; Johnson v. State, 22 Tex. App. 206, 2 S. W. 609.

"Impeaching testimony, whether of the general reputation of a witness, or proof of contradictory statements, or proof of his interest or bias, is always a collateral inquiry. It could not be used by the state for the purpose of supporting its contention. Whether a witness is or not, thus impeached, does not in the least affect the true facts. It is receivable only in support of the contention that the witness is, or is not, telling the facts as they existed, and therefore necessarily collateral to the main inquiry.

"It is conceded in the opinion of affirmance that it is never admissible to allow the state to prove, over objection, that friends, relatives, or attorneys of the party upon trial had undertaken to persuade a witness to give changed or manufactured testimony in his favor, unless it be shown that the appellant was connected therewith, or authorized the same; but the writer of the opinion holds the testimony was not offered for such purpose, but for the purpose of impeaching appellant's brother as a witness. We submit that it is not a question as to the purpose of the state in offering the testimony, but is a question as to the effect the testimony offered would have. It being shown that the witness who approached Lee was appellant's brother, the jury could not but conclude that appellant was responsible therefor. The following cases are ample authority in support of the proposition that such testimony was not admissible: Estep v. State, 9 Tex. App. 367; Barbee v. State, 23 Tex. App. 203, 4 S. W. 584; Rushing v. State, 25 Tex. App. 612, 8 S. W. 807; Luttrell v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 651, 51 S. W. 931, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 226; Garcia v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 74 S. W. 916; Rice v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 255, 103 S. W. 1156; Lounder v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 122, 79 S. W. 552; Day v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. Rep. 413, 138 S. W. 127; Day v. State, 62 Tex. Crim. Rep. 448, 138 S. W. 130; Grimes v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 141 S. W. 283; Brown v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 150 S. W. 437; Branch's Crim. Law, § 862.

"While the proposition here announced and supported by the authorities cited is stated in the opinion of affirmance to be sound, yet the court holds that it was admissible to show the bias of appellant's brother, and to, in this way, impeach him as a witness, even in the absence of predicate laid. In reply to this holding we assert that it has ever been the law, where proof of tampering with the witness would not be admissible as original evidence, that it is inadmissible for impeachment, and that error in admitting it is not cured by limiting the same in the charge to impeachment. Rice v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 281, 103 S. W. 1156; Garcia v. State, —

Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 74 S. W. 916; Swain v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 104, 86 S. W. 335; Hoy v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 340, 45 S. W. 916.

"In the case of Garcia v. State, supra, Judge Henderson, speaking for the court, uses this language: 'True, the witness had been introduced by appellant, and had testified to an alibi in his favor; but this did not authorize the introduction of illegitimate testimony against appellant on the pretext of impeaching this witness. Unless appellant sent his father to see prosecutor, in order to compromise the case, he would not be bound by anything that his father did in that connection.'

"In Hoy v. State, supra, Judge Davidson, speaking for the court, says: 'The very reason given by the court for the admission of the testimony should have excluded it. If it was not legitimate as original evidence, certainly it could not be used for the purpose of impeaching a witness. Irrelevant and inadmissible evidence does not become admissible or proper because sought to be used for the purpose of impeachment.'

"In the case of Rice v. State, supra, Judge Henderson, upon a motion for rehearing, discussing a similar question, says: 'Of course, it will not be contended that this testimony is original testimony inhering in or appertaining to the case; it transpired long after the case. If appellant was shown to be connected therewith, it would constitute original testimony against him as a circumstance suggesting consciousness of guilt in fabricating testimony, and tampering with witnesses comes under that category; but, as stated, the evidence was not offered as original testimony, but as impeaching evidence. Clearly it was introduced upon a collateral issue, and was confessedly offered to affect the credibility of the witness Ed Prather.' Further discussing the question, the court approvingly quotes from Wharton's Criminal Evidence [9th ed. § 484], as follows: 'Applying this test, was the evidence here offered pertinent to the case, or was it a contradiction upon a collateral issue, and not upon any issue involving defendant's guilt or innocence? Evidently it was upon a collateral issue, and both court and counsel so regarded it. The court attempted in its charge to limit this testimony to the impeachment of Ed Prather, but, as has heretofore been held by this court, when illegal testimony for impeachment purposes has been admitted, and this of itself is of a hurtful character, it is impossible for the court to limit it so as not to prove injurious to appellant.' He cited, as supporting the proposition so announced, Cogdell v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 178, 63 S. W. 645; Morton v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 533, 67 S. W. 115; Casey v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 174, 90 S. W. 1018.

"This confronts us with this situation: The opinion of affirmance is committed to the proposition that the testimony showing that appellant's brother attempted to have a witness compromise or change his testimony, in the absence of appellant and without his knowledge, is clearly not admissible, and this court, from all the authorities above cited, has uniformly held that illegal testimony is never admissible under the guise of impeaching a witness in the case, and further, under authorities cited, going so far as to hold the error thus committed cannot be cured by a charge of the court limiting the illegal testimony to purposes of impeachment.

"Again the testimony, if otherwise admissible, being collateral, was not admissible in the absence of a predicate laid while appellant's brother was upon the stand, and this court erred in its opinion of affirmance in holding the same admissible in the absence of such predicate. The writer of the opinion of affirmance holds that the testimony was admissible to show the interest and bias of appellant's brother as a witness. If admissible at all, it was for the purpose of affecting his standing as a witness. He loses sight, however, of the fact that this is but one way of attacking the credibility of a witness. As stated above, the credibility of a witness is always a collateral inquiry. Whether or not a witness is credible has nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of the party upon trial, and all evidence except that tending to establish guilt or innocence is, according to the rule announced herein above, as quoted by Mr. Wharton's Criminal Law, collateral evidence.

"In the language of the writer of the opinion, 'is is elementary' that all impeaching evidence must be supported by a predicate. The common-law rule upon the subject, announced as far back as the Queen's Case, 2 Brod. & B. 312, 22 Revised Rep. 662, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 183, is to the effect that when a witness has been examined on one side, it is not competent for the opposite party to introduce evidence to show his bias, feeling, or partiality towards the parties, unless the witness has been previously questioned himself as to that point. Even in the discussion of this principle in 40 Cyc. p. 2676, and in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1127, cited in the opinion, it is there stated that the great weight of authority is in support of the position here taken, and against the holding of the opinion.

"We now pass to the rule as it has been uniformly announced by the courts of this state, both in criminal and civil cases, and we here assert, that, in so far as we have been able to find, there can be no authorities of the Texas courts found in support of the holding made by the honorable judge in the opinion in this case. All of the authorities hold just to the contrary of the rule as announced in the opinion. Barry v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 302, 39 S. W. 692; Mitchell v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 170, 41 S. W. 816; Nite v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 348, 54 S. W. 763; Martinez v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 53 S. W. 635; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. La Prelle, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 55 S. W. 125. For a full and complete discussion of all the authorities, see note in 82 Am. St. Rep. 54.

"Discussing this question in the case of Barry v. State, supra, Judge Henderson, for the court, says: 'Nor do we believe it was proper for the state to elicit from Mrs. Jackson testimony to the effect that, on the morning after the homicide, she was at Mrs. Ford's, and that Mrs. Ford endeavored to make her remember that on a certain occasion the deceased, Healey, rubbed his hand on the stomach of Mrs. Barry, the wife of the defendant, and asked her (Mrs. Barry) when the "damn little bastard was going to be borned," and, on the witness replying that she "did not hear deceased use that language," that then Mrs. Barry said to her, "You will have to remember it," or, "You must remember it." Now, if Mrs. Ford had been placed on the stand, and she had been examined as to this matter, for the purpose of showing that she was interested in procuring testimony for defendant, or fabricating the same, and she had denied making this suggestion to Mrs. Jackson, then Mrs. Jackson might have been examined upon this point solely for the purpose of impeachment.' It was exactly an effort of this kind to have the witness Lee change his testimony, or remember things to which he had not testified, that he says appellant's brother undertook to have him do; that is, appellant's brother tried to make the witness remember having heard appellant make the statements when he approached the two immediately after the killing. We therefore take it that this case is as near in point with the facts in the case under discussion as could be found. Again, the same judge, in the case of Mitchell v. State, supra, used the following language: 'Now, it would have been perfectly competent, in order to show that the witness John Pierce was prejudiced against appellant, that he endeavored to have his employers discharge him, but the witness Pierce should have been first asked about this matter to afford him an opportunity of denying or explaining the same. His explanation might have been such as to have obviated the necessity of any contradictory evidence. If he had denied the same then, as showing prejudice on his part against appellant, it would have been competent to have contradicted him upon this collateral matter.'

"In the case of Martinez v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 53 S. W. 635, Judge Brooks, discussing this identical question, uses the following language: 'We think the court erred in permitting the witness Green to contradict the witness Arrera, because there was no predicate laid for said contradiction. Appellant's defense was an alibi. His sister and brother-in-law had testified to facts, if true, that would have entitled appellant to an acquittal. If the witness Florentio Arrera had been asked the question as to whether or not he stated to the witness Green, at the time indicated in the bill, that appellant was not at the house, said witness might have been able to give some explanation as to the reason for making said false statement that would not have wholly destroyed his testimony.' And further in said opinion he says: 'It is a well-known rule of evidence that, where a party proposes to contradict a witness, the predicate must first be laid by asking the witness if he did not make a certain statement at a certain time and place, and to a certain party.' He cites in support of the holding Jordan v. State, 10 Tex. 479; Walker v. State, 6 Tex. App. 576; Mason v. State, 7 Tex. App. 623.

"In the case of Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. La Prelle, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 55 S. W. 125, Chief Justice Fisher, for the court of civil appeals, uses the following language: 'The appellee, on the trial of the case, did not lay any predicate for the introduction of this evidence, by first inquiring of witness Dillon as to whether such a request for information had been made of him, for the names of the absent witnesses, and giving the time and place of such request.' He reversed and remanded the case upon this one question, and in the opinion cited the Queen's Case, hereinabove mentioned, and from which opinion the statement hereinabove made is taken.

"Again the court erred in its opinion of affirmance, in holding that it was not necessary to limit the testimony of the witness Lee, as complained of in bill No. 1, for the purpose of impeachment of appellant's brother as a witness, even if the testimony was admissible, as presented in appellant's bill of exceptions No. 2.

"It might be that a jury of lawyers would know how to draw a distinction between the purpose of admission of testimony and the effect of its admission, but how it can be held that the average layman could draw this distinction is beyond comprehension. It is not a question as to the purpose the state or the court had in admitting the testimony. This purpose should have been made known by a charge from the court to the jury limiting the evidence to the purpose for which it was admitted; if it was admissible, the jury had nothing to do with the purpose that may have been hidden in the mind of the prosecuting attorney or buried in the 'breast' of the court in offering certain testimony. They deal with the effect of testimony, and not with the purpose for which it was introduced, and it has always been held that, if the evidence could be used by the jury as an incriminating fact, or to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence upon the jury as to the main issue, injurious or prejudicial to appellant, then it is the duty of the trial court to limit or restrict the effect of such testimony in his charge, so that no unwarranted results could ensue. This is practically the language used by the court in the case of Winfrey v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 538, 56 S. W. 919. See also Maines v. State, 23 Tex. App. 576, 5 S. W. 123; Washington v. State, 23 Tex. App. 336, 5 S. W. 119; Davidson v. State, 22 Tex. App. 373, 3 S. W. 662; Burks v. State, 24 Tex. App. 326, 6 S. W. 300; Wilson v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 385, 35 S. W. 390, 38 S. W. 624, 39 S. W. 373; Benjamin v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 291, 122 S. W. 542; Harvey v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 5, 136 Am. St. Rep. 971, 121 S. W. 501. This is true, and has been held to be true by this court, even though the evidence is offered to impeach the credibility of the witness by showing his bias or interest in favor of the party upon trial. Coker v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 57, 31 S. W. 655; Pearson v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 612, 120 S. W. 1004.

"As stated above, the jury have to do with the effect of the testimony, and not the purpose for which it is introduced. How can they know the purpose of the testimony unless the court informs them in his charge? It is true that a contradictory statement can be used to impeach the testimony of the party who testifies differently from the statement made, but here we have a different proposition. To show that a man's brother approached a witness in his case, and undertook to have him change or compromise his testimony, would be very persuasive to the jury that the defendant and his family were fabricating a defense, and it would but be the natural course of human nature to so conclude, in the absence of a charge specifically telling the jury the purpose, and only purpose, for which they could consider the testimony.

"The rule is plainly announced by Judge Henderson in Wilson's Case, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 385, 39 S. W. 373, as follows: 'The general rule is that whenever extraneous matter is admitted in evidence for a specific purpose incidental to, but which is not admissible directly to prove, the main issue, and which might tend, if not explained, to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence upon the jury as to the main issue, injurious and prejudicial to the right of the party, then it becomes the imperative duty of the court in its charge to so limit and restrict it as that such unwarranted results cannot ensue; and the failure to do so will be radical and reversible error, even though the charge be not excepted to.'

"Again, in Taylor's Case, 22 Tex. App. 529, 58 Am. Rep. 656, 3 S. W. 753, 'It is permissible, where motive is the important question, to prove other transactions of a similar character, . . . but where, however, this is permissible, it is always important that the charge of the court should properly limit and restrict the jury, in their consideration of such testimony, exclusively to the purposes of its admission, unless they should give it unwarranted weight as evidence proving the main fact.'

"In the case of Bennett v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 243, 64 S. W. 255, discussing the necessity of limiting testimony, the following language is used: 'But, without an instruction on the subject, would the jury confine their consideration of said testimony to that purpose alone? Would they know the object of its introduction? It must be remembered that jurors are, for the most part, unacquainted with the rules of law, and therefore the necessity on the part of the court to instruct them with reference to their duties.'

"Now, whatever appellant's brother said to the witness Lee, it was subsequent to and no part of the transaction in which appellant shot and killed deceased, and, as said in the quotation last above, 'Would the jury confine their consideration of said testimony to that purpose alone? Would they know the object of its introduction?' In the present case, would not the jury conclude that the testimony was admitted for all purposes, and, if so, would it not be natural for them to conclude that appellant was responsible for his brother's acts?

"The court, in its opinion of affirmance, overlooked entirely the case of Coker v. State, supra, decided by the sage of the criminal law of this state, Judge Hurt. In that case the state was undertaking to locate the shoes worn by Coker at the time of the homicide; it being shown that the shoes would likely reveal the truth as to whether or not the defendant committed the offense. His mother was one of his strongest witnesses, and the state was undertaking to show, and did show circumstantially, that she had hidden his shoes. An objection was reserved to the testimony, and it was also objected that the court did not limit the testimony, and Judge Hurt, in disposing of the question, in reversing the case, used the following language: 'Again, if Mrs. Sallie Coker concealed the shoes, appellant was not responsible for her acts. She, however, being a witness for him, the state, for the purpose of proving that she was very much biased in his favor, if not wholly corrupt, and therefore wholly unworthy of belief, could show it. This evidence, however, was not limited to the only purpose for which it could have been introduced. The jury were not instructed to consider it only for the purpose of impeaching Mrs. Coker. In the absence of instructions clearly and emphatically limiting it to its proper use, the jury would, in all probability, reason thus: The mother knew her son to be guilty; she knew or believed that his shoes, if found, would convict him; hence her conduct. She concealed them from the officers.' That case is directly in point with that feature of the question now under discussion. There it was attempted to show that the mother of Coker, and who, by the way, was a witness in his behalf, had suppressed testimony, and Judge Hurt clearly holds that it was the duty of the trial court to specifically and emphatically limit the effect of the testimony to the purpose of impeaching Mrs. Coker as a witness. This completely answers the opinion of this court, wherein it is stated that the testimony was admissible because appellant's brother was a witness in the case.

"Again, in Pearson's Case, supra, this court, then composed of its present presiding judge and Associate Judges Brooks and Ramsey, through a majority of the court, held, in discussing the following question, propounded to Pearson's witness White while upon the stand, to wit: 'You are the man that went around to Mr. Pearson's daughter just after the killing, and told her not to tell anything on him, didn't you?'—that, while the same was admissible to show the interest and bias of the witness, it was nevertheless the duty of the court to limit such testimony to the purpose for which it was admitted. The presiding judge of this court wrote the opinion in the Pearson Case, and dissented, holding that the testimony was not admissible for any purpose, and cites the cases which appellant cites in his brief as sustaining his dissent. The other two judges disagreed with the presiding judge as to the admissibility of the testimony, but held that it was the duty of the court to limit the effect of the same, and therefore permitted the reversal of the case.

"Again, the court erred in holding the charge of the court instructing the jury, if defendant fired a number of shots, and the first shot was fired in self-defense, still if he continued to shoot, so as to hasten the death, when it no longer reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger, that such later shots would not be in self-defense; but the offense in such event would be of no higher grade than manslaughter. 'If the defendant in the course of a fatal altercation fired a number of shots, you are instructed that if the first shot was fired under circumstances amounting to self-defense, the defendant had the right in self-defense to continue to shoot as long as it reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger; and if such first shot was fired in self-defense, and defendant fired other shots into the head or body of deceased, thereby producing or hastening the death of the deceased, when it no longer reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger, then such later shot would not be in self-defense; but the offense in such event would be of no higher grade than manslaughter.' The charge is an undue limitation and restriction of defendant's right of self-defense, for the reason the testimony nowhere suggests the issue presented. All the testimony shows the shots were fired rapidly, and that it was a continuous transaction; hence the charge presented an issue justifying defendant's conviction for manslaughter not raised by the testimony. Under the charge the jury were justified in finding, as they did, for manslaughter, notwithstanding they might have believed that the first shot produced the death, and that it was fired in self-defense. It is no offense to fire an additional shot, if death resulted from the first shot. Besides the court does not present in his charge to the jury the converse of the proposition. It was a charge upon weight of evidence, and calculated to lead the jury to the conclusion that the court was of the opinion that appellant was at least guilty of manslaughter because he had fired some eight or nine shots. Clark v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 296, 120 S. W. 179; Smith v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 455, 123 S. W. 701; Duke v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 19, 133 S. W. 433; Jones v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 408, 71 S. W. 962; Swain v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 98, 86 S. W. 335; Best v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 554, 135 S. W. 581; Foster v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 148 S. W. 583.

"This charge authorized appellant's conviction for manslaughter if he fired a shot after Manning's death, even though the first shot was fired in self-defense. It is no offense to fire a shot into the body of one who has expired. If this was true, he would be guilty of manslaughter if he went now and fired into the body of deceased. That he fired after the death of deceased is receivable as evidence only for the purpose of arriving at the motive with which he fired the first shot. There being no question of an abandonment of the difficulty on the part of the deceased, and all the evidence showing that it was a continuous transaction, we submit, if the first shot was in self-defense, that all were in self-defense, and that it was error to permit his conviction for manslaughter under the terms of this charge.

"The judge writing the opinion infers that appellant fired shots after deceased was upon the ground, whereas, all of the testimony is to the contrary. The doctor used by the state testified that all of the shots were straight in, with the exception of two, and that they ranged slightly downward. He could not even approximate the degree of the range; and defendant, the only eyewitness, testified that all shots were fired before deceased fell. A minute description is given in the opinion as to how long it took to operate the gun, for the purpose, we presume, of destroying the idea that it was a continuous transaction. The evidence upon this point is that it was a four-arm rifle, one of those rifles that works with a slide, that you did not have to throw it back and forth like an ordinary Winchester, but that you could shoot it as fast as you could work the trigger. Appellant testified that it was a repeating Remington, four-arm rifle, and that he could shoot it as rapidly as he could work his hand, and that he did not shoot after Manning fell. Miss Maud Layton testified that she heard the shots, and it went just like firecrackers. This was all the testimony as to how the shots were fired, and we submit that it showed a continuous transaction, without ceasing or interruption, and if so, and the first shot was fired in self-defense, all were fired in self-defense. The testimony does not suggest the idea of an abandonment of the difficulty, or of a cessation of the shooting, and the same is in line with the opinion by Judge Harper in the case recently decided, wherein he held that the shots were a continuous transaction.

"Taking the case upon the whole, each of the questions discussed, appellant is entitled to a reversal."

Replication to dissenting opinion.

In complete reply to the brief and argument of Messrs. King & King, appellant's attorneys, made the dissenting opinion herein, the stenographer is hereby directed to give, immediately following this, the brief and argument of Hon. C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, and Messrs. Blount & Strong, in behalf of the state, citing and quoting the authorities as given by them.

Prendergast, Judge.
Harper, Judge.

The said brief and argument of Hon. C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, and Messrs. Blount & Strong for the state, is:

"(1) In view of the fact that the opinion affirming this case so thoroughly and completely disposes of every question raised by appellant, we really deem it unnecessary to file a reply to the motion for rehearing filed herein; but, in view of the fact that the opinion of affirmance is not concurred in by all members of the court, we desire to cite a few additional authorities.

"Attorneys for appellant in presenting the motion for rehearing seem to have a misconception of the purpose for which the testimony of the witness Bill Lee was introduced by the state. They seem to be laboring under the impression that this testimony was introduced by the state for the purpose of showing that the brother of defendant was undertaking to tamper with the witness Bill Lee, and to corruptly influence him to testify falsely in behalf of defendant, and all the authorities cited in the motion for rehearing are cases of this character, and, in our judgment, do not touch the real question presented. As stated by the court in its opinion affirming this case, such was not the purpose of the testimony, and there is nothing in the testimony that could possibly lead the jury to believe that such was the purpose,—the only purpose for which the testimony was offered, and for which it could be possibly used by the jury, was to show the interest and bias of the witness Phillip Burnaman in behalf of his brother, the defendant, and the trial court so stated to the jury when the testimony was admitted, using this language: 'It only goes to the credibility of the witness.' We are aware of the rule that the trial court can only charge the jury in writing, yet, in passing upon the proposition of whether or not the jury probably used this testimony for any other purpose to the detriment of the defendant, and especially in the absence of a requested special charge to limit this testimony, we believe the court is authorized to consider this, because under the authorities, in the absence of a special charge, it must, at least, reasonably appear that the jury, in all probability, did use the testimony improperly against the defendant. That this testimony was clearly admissible to show the interest and bias of the witness Phillip Burnaman, and that, too, without laying a predicate, we call the court's attention to the following additional authorities: Earle v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 142 S. W. 1181; Pope v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 611; Sexton v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 498, 88 S. W. 348; Warren v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 448, 114 S. W. 380; Lowry v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 562, 110 S. W. 911; Burnett v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 515, 112 S. W. 79; Clark v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 522; Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 129, 105 S. W. 804; Renn v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 167; Burnam v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 148 S. W. 757; Sims v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 45 S. W. 705; Tow v. State, 22 Tex. App. 175, 2 S. W. 582; Porch v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 7, 99 S. W. 1122.

"In the case of Tow v. State, above cited, Judge Willson, speaking for the court, says: 'After she (Mrs. Cowan) had testified on the trial, the defendant offered to prove that about two hours before the homicide she said that she made her son, James Cox (the deceased), clean up the shotgun and load it with twelve buckshot in each barrel, and told him if defendant came on her premises to kill him. This proposed evidence, upon objection made thereto by the state, was rejected. This ruling of the court was erroneous. If for no other purpose, the offered evidence was competent to disclose the unfriendly state of the witness's feeling towards the defendant, and the malignant character of such feeling. It is always competent to show the animus, the state of feeling of the witness toward the party against whom such witness testified, and in such examination great latitude is allowed.' See Tow v. State, 22 Tex. App. 175, 2 S. W. 582."

We call the court's attention to the fact that no predicate was laid before offering to prove these declarations of the witness Mrs. Cowan. The court holds such declarations admissible as independent and original testimony to show bias, interest, etc.

"In the case of Clark v. State, above cited, Judge Hurt, speaking for the court, says: 'It appears by bill of exceptions No. 6 that appellant introduced one Peter King, a negro, who testified to material facts for the defendant. Counsel for the state, on cross-examination, asked the witness "if he did not, during the trial of this case, go to Jonas Williams (a negro witness for the state), and offer to give him $10 for the purpose of paying a fine assessed against Williams's daughter, at Scurry, Texas, if he (Williams) would not testify against him (King) at this trial?" King replied that he did not do so. Afterwards Jonas Williams was placed on the stand, and testified that Peter King had offered him $10, etc. Appellant objected to this testimony, and the court overruled the objections, and defendant excepted. This evidence was clearly admissible. Its object was to show the interest and anxiety of Peter King in behalf of appellant. The jury had a right to know what his feeling and interests were, so as to pass upon the credit to be given to his evidence. It was that character of testimony that would not be used by the jury for any other purpose than as going to the credit of Peter King.' See Clark v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 522.

"In the case of Sexton v. State, above cited, this court, in an opinion delivered by Judge Davidson, held that it was permissible to elicit from a witness for defendant 'that she (the witness) had lived in adultery, with the defendant for five or six years,' and that she knew the 'defendant had a living wife and child while she was living with him in adultery' for the purpose of showing her motive and bias in the case then on trial for swindling of defendant, and the friendship and close relation to the defendant, and the opinion does not show that this testimony was limited to the purpose for which it was introduced.

"In the case of Burnett v. State, above cited, Judge Ramsey, speaking for the court, says: 'There can be, we think, no doubt that it is always permissible, in every case where it can be shown by competent evidence, to make proof of the hostile attitude of any witness in respect to any party or any cause before the court. Such evidence is clearly admissible for the purpose of affecting the credibility of witnesses and the weight of their testimony. 2 Enc. Ev. 406; Surrell v. State, 29 Tex. App. 321, 15 S. W. 816; Watts v. State, 18 Tex. App. 381. See 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 516, 112 S. W. 79.

"In the case of Porch v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 11, 99 S. W. 1122. Judge Brooks, speaking for the court, says: 'Of course, it is a well-known rule of law that declarations and acts of witnesses out of the presence of appellant cannot bind appellant; but this rule has its qualifications. Declarations of witnesses who testify for the state or defense, which show their bias, prejudice, or favoritism, may be introduced for the purpose of showing said bias, prejudice, or favoritism.' See Porch v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 335, 99 S. W. 102.

"In the case of Renn v. State, above cited, this court, speaking through Judge Harper, in a very able and well-considered opinion, upon the identical question here involved, after citing numerous authorities in support of his position, and that of the majority of the court, quotes with approval the following from American & English Enc. of Law, vol. 30, p. 1102: 'Disparaging evidence of matters otherwise collateral may be received when it tends to show the temper, disposition, or conduct of the witness in relation to the cause or parties; and not only is this evidence admissible on cross-examination of the witness, but other witnesses may be questioned by the opposite party in relation thereto'—citing authorities. This case is not only directly in point on the admissibility of this testimony, but also directly in point on the proposition that it was not necessary to lay a predicate before same was admissible.

"In the case of Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 129, 105 S. W. 808, the court, speaking through Judge Brooks, on the admissibility of this character of testimony, says: 'Bill of exceptions No. 43 shows that while the witness Dr. Shields, for the state, was on the stand, the following questions were propounded to him by the state: "State whether or not the witness John Daniels, a witness for the defendant, had told him, Shields, in the town of Winsboro, about six months ago, if he, Shields, would assist him, Daniels, in testifying that the malt corn hauled to Shield's mill by the witness Daniels belonged to the witness J. S. Warren, that they would send the old scoundrel, meaning him, Warren, to the penitentiary." Appellant objects to same because the same is irrelevant and immaterial, and was an attempt by the state to impeach the witness Daniels upon an immaterial issue, and had no connection whatever with this case, and throws no light whatever upon same. This testimony was pertinent, in that it showed animus on the part of the defense's witness Daniels against the state, and favoritism on his part to the appellant.'

"The court, in the same case, upon the question of limiting testimony of this character, says: 'Bill No. 45 complains that the court erred in its failure and refusal to limit the testimony of the witness Alex Brice, wherein he testified that the defendant's witness Will Lemmons had said to him, on the 8th or 9th of January, 1907, at Perryville, Texas, that the state in this case is up against a hard proposition, as the defendant's attorney and his Uncle John Nixon and he, Lemmons, were all working for the defendant in this case, and that this was a hard proposition for the state to go up against. This testimony could not possibly have been used for any other purpose. Therefore, it was not necessary to limit the same [citing numerous authorities].' 'When testimony could not be legitimately or rationally used for any other purpose, it is not error to refuse to limit same for that purpose.'

"In the recent case of Burnam v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 148 S. W. 759, this court, speaking through Judge Harper, in passing upon the admissibility of this character of testimony, says: 'In bill No. 6 it is complained that the state was permitted to ask Myrtle Lindsenby, a witness for defendant, if Jim Burnam, an uncle of defendant, had given her a pair of shoes. If it was a question of whether or not Jim Burnam had attempted to bribe the witness, the defendant not being connected with it, it would, perhaps, have been inadmissible, but the objections were that it was calculated to prejudice defendant with the jury, and to impeach the testimony of the witness. The relations existing between the parties, the state of their feelings, their bias and prejudice, have always been held to be admissible; and, if the testimony was adduced to show the relation existing between the Burnam family and the witness, it would be admissible for that purpose. Earle v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 142 S. W. 1181, and Pope v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 611.' It does not appear that any predicate was laid before this testimony was offered, but same was offered as original and independent testimony, to show the bias and interest of the material witness for the defendant. It does not appear, either, that this testimony was limited for the purpose for which it was introduced.

"Mr. Branch in his Criminal Law, in discussing the admissibility of this class of testimony (§ 461, p. 545), says: 'The motives which operate upon the mind of the witness when he testifies are never regarded as immaterial or collateral matters. A party may prove declarations of witnesses which tend to show bias, interest, prejudice, or any other material state or status which, fairly construed, might tend to affect his credibility [citing the following authorities in support of this proposition: Mason v. State, 7 Tex. App. 623; Sager v. State, 11 Tex. App. 111; Bonnard v. State, 25 Tex. App. 195, 8 Am. St. Rep. 431, 7 S. W. 862, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 462; Bennett v. State, 28 Tex. App. 540, 13 S. W. 1005; Green v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 7, 111 S. W. 933; Gelber v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 462, 120 S. W. 863; Reddick v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 47 S. W. 993].' These authorities conclusively settle the proposition that this testimony was clearly admissible for the purpose of showing the bias and interest of the witness Phillip Burnaman, who was a very material witness for appellant.

"(2) We feel that we should apologize to the court for further burdening the record in this case, and we would not do so but for the fact that counsel for appellant, after this case was submitted on motion for rehearing, requested time of the court in which to file an additional brief, and, as we understand, were granted by the court until the 11th of the present month (June) to do so. No additional argument was filed by that date; hence if one is filed, we will not have an opportunity, probably, to see it before this case is finally disposed of.

"We have carefully re-read the motion for rehearing filed in this case, and most of the authorities cited therein, and, after doing so, we are still convinced, as we were when this case was originally submitted, that there is not a serious question raised by the record in this case, and it strikes us that counsel for appellant are rather seeking to drive this court to a retraction of the original opinion of affirmance by constant insistence rather than by citation of authority in support of their contention.

"In our reply to the motion for rehearing, we devoted most of same to argument and citation of authorities that the testimony of the witness Lee as to what the witness Phillip Burnaman said to him was admissible for the purpose of showing the bias and interest of said witness. We did this for the reason that counsel for appellant seemed to rely principally upon the inadmissibility of this testimony for a reversal of this case. We believe the authorities cited by the court, and in this reply on this proposition, have even convinced counsel for appellant that this testimony was admissible for that purpose.

"In view of the fact that we are not apprised of just what the 'additional argument' of counsel will be, we desire to refer, in a brief way, to the assignment of error that this testimony should have been limited by the trial court.

"Mr. Branch, in his Criminal Law (§ 366), states the rule with reference to limiting testimony as follows: 'If impeaching testimony could be used by the jury for purposes other than impeachment, so as to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence with the jury as to the main issue, injurious and prejudicial to defendant, the charge must limit it so that no unwarranted results would ensue [citing numbers of authorities].'

"Judge Brooks, in the case of Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 122, 105 S. W. 804, lays down the rule as follows: 'When testimony in a trial for murder could not have been legitimately or rationally used for any other purpose than that for which it was used, there was no error in failing to limit the same to that purpose.' This rule is cited with approval in the case of Wright v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 358, 120 S. W. 458.

"Now the court will notice, in the rule laid down by Mr. Branch and approved by this court, that the testimony must be such, if not limited, that it could exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence with the jury as to the main issue, injurious and prejudicial to defendant. Under this rule the court must conclude from this record that the testimony of the witness Lee could legitimately and rationally be used by the jury to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence with the jury in finding appellant guilty of the offense with which he was charged. That is, that it was such testimony that the jury would probably use, if not limited, to establish the fact that appellant unlawfully killed deceased; and, in passing upon this proposition, this court must presume that the jury who tried this man was at least of average intelligence, and had some regard for the oath administered to them and the charge of the court delivered to them.

"The testimony of the witness Lee, in effect, was 'that Phillip Burnaman came to him on two different occasions, and told him that they ought to get together on what appellant said to them just after the killing, as they would soon have to go to court,' and then repeated what he (Phillip) understood appellant to say on that occasion, and the only reply made by the witness Lee was that he expected to tell the truth about the matter. This certainly does not show an attempt on the part of Phillip Burnaman to bribe the witness Lee, but it shows, not only a great interest on the part of Phillip in his brother, but a strong bias in his favor. This does not fall in the class of cases cited by appellant at all. All those cases are where the friends and relatives had undertaken to improperly or corruptly influence the witness. Can it be said that there was anything in the conversation between the witness Lee and Phillip Burnaman that tended in any way, or could have been used in any way by the jury, to establish the guilt of appellant for unlawfully killing deceased, which was the main issue to be established? Can it be said, from the mere fact that Phillip Burnaman was a brother of appellant, and had this conversation with the witness Lee, that an intelligent jury would presume that appellant was responsible for the conversation, and would therefore override the charge of the court and send this man to the penitentiary on presumption instead of evidence? Juries in Texas are ordinarily men of average intelligence, of at least sufficient intelligence to understand and regard their oaths; and, as said by Judge Brooks in the Wright Case, supra: 'It is utterly irrational to presume that a sworn jury would disregard their oaths and convict a man of murder on the theory that they thought he had committed burglary.' Outside of showing the interest of the witness Phillip Burnaman, what occurred between him and the witness Lee was favorable to appellant, for Phillip stated on that occasion just what he testified to in the case, which was favorable to defendant, and it therefore tended to corroborate Phillip's testimony, because it showed that he was making the same statement the day after the killing that he made on the trial. The witness Lee made no statement as to how he understood the matter; therefore the naked fact that Phillip had this character of conversation with Lee is the one thing that appellant claimed that the jury could use to his disadvantage, and in order for this case to be reversed, this court must determine that an intelligent jury, duly sworn, did permit this fact to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence in determining the guilt of appellant of manslaughter. To our minds, if the court will pardon the expression, it is absolutely absurd to impute to a jury any such want of common sense, and would, indeed, be going far into the field of imagination and speculation, and would write into the jurisprudence of this state a precedent, if followed, that would result in the improper reversal of many cases.

"The case of Clark v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 43 S. W. 522, is a case, in our judgment, disclosing facts which were much more calculated to injure the rights of appellant than the facts of the case at bar, and we desire to call the court's special attention to the opinion of Judge Hurt in this case, as follows: 'It appears by bill of exceptions No. 6 that appellant introduced one Peter King, a negro, who testified to material facts for the defendant. Counsel for the state, on cross-examination, asked the witness "if he did not, during the trial of this case, go to Jonas Williams (a negro witness for the state), and offer to give him $10 for the purpose of paying a fine against Williams's daughter, . . . if he (Williams) would not testify against (we construe this to mean contrary) him (King) at this trial." King replied that he did not do so. Afterwards Jonas Williams was placed on the stand, and testified that King had offered him $10, etc. Appellant objected to this testimony, and the court overruled the objections, and defendant excepted. This evidence was clearly admissible. Its object was to show the interest and anxiety of Peter King in behalf of appellant. The jury had a right to know what his feeling and interests were, so as to pass upon the credit to be given his evidence. It was that character of testimony that would not be used by the jury for any other purpose than as going to the credit of Peter King.' Certainly, if the testimony set out above in the Clark Case, which was offered to show the interest of a defendant's witness, should not have been limited by the court to the purpose for which it was offered, it will require no further argument that the testimony in the case at bar was not that character of testimony requiring, at the hands of the court, a charge limiting same.

"In our reply to the motion for rehearing heretofore filed, we referred to and quoted from the case of Sue v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 122, 105 S. W. 807, 808, and we desire here again to call the court's particular attention to this case, and the authorities cited therein by Judge Brooks, on the question of it not being necessary to limit testimony of this character. As heretofore stated, this court, to grant this motion for rehearing, must be convinced that the jury permitted this testimony to exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence as to the main issue, and that they could legitimately and rationally use it for that purpose, and in this connection we call the court's special attention to the fact that the record shows in this case that, at the time the trial court admitted this testimony, he stated, in the presence and hearing of the jury, the specific purpose for which it was admitted, and while we understand that charges in felony cases to a jury must be in writing, yet we submit, in passing upon the proposition as to whether or not the failure to limit this testimony did cause the jury to permit same to exercise an improper influence on them in the consideration of the case, that this court can and should take into consideration this statement of the trial court at the time he admitted the testimony, for the reason that it absolutely destroys the proposition asserted by appellant that the jury did use this testimony for some other purpose than that for which it was admitted.

"Judge Brooks, while on the bench, rendered an opinion in which he held that a verbal declaration of this kind could and should be taken into consideration in passing upon the proposition as to whether appellant was probably injured by the failure to limit testimony. The writer of this read this opinion within the last two weeks, but we have so far been unable to put our hands on it again, and therefore will be unable to cite it; but, without reference to this opinion by Judge Brooks, it seems to us to be a sound proposition of law that this court is fully authorized to take into consideration the entire record in the case in passing upon this matter.

"No special charge was requested by appellant limiting this testimony, and this court has repeatedly held, in the absence of a special charge, that it must be apparent that injury was done the defendant by failure of the court in its main charge to charge on any particular phase in the case.

"In addition to the authorities cited above, and those cited in our reply to the motion for rehearing heretofore filed, we call the court's attention to the following additional authorities: Blanco v. State. — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 57 S. W. 828; Waters v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 327, 114 S. W. 628; Wright v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 358, 359, 120 S. W. 458; Treadway v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 144 S. W. 655; Harrelson v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

"We submit that this court cannot reasonably arrive at the conclusion that the jury in this case could legitimately and rationally use this testimony in establishing the main issue, and that said testimony did exercise a strong, undue, or improper influence with the jury for said purpose, and therefore there was no error in failing to limit said testimony. Certainly none in the absence of a requested special charge.

"We submit that the appellant in this case, from the record before this court, has had a fair and impartial trial at the hands of an intelligent jury, that his punishment is indeed lenient for the crime committed, and that the motion for rehearing should, we earnestly insist, under the authorities, be overruled.

"(3) That the trial court properly charged on defendant's right to continue to shoot so long as it reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger, etc., we cite the following additional authorities: Clark v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 120 S. W. 179; Smith v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 455, 123 S. W. 698; Swain v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 104, 86 S. W. 335; Branch, Crim. Law, § 452, p. 278. Under these authorities—in fact under the unbroken line of decisions in this state—it would have been reversible error under the facts in this record for the trial court to have failed to have given the charge which was given on the right of defendant to continue to shoot so long as it reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger.

"On the proposition that the trial court properly charged the jury in this same paragraph of his charge that defendant did not have the right to continue to shoot after the danger ceased, as viewed from his standpoint, we call the court's attention to the opinion of this court, speaking through Judge Harper, in the case of Renn v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 167. It is certainly an elementary proposition of law that defendant has not the right to continue to shoot and inflict wounds that hasten or contribute to the death of the deceased after the danger has ceased, as viewed from his standpoint, and this is what the trial court told the jury in the case at bar, and the trial court only instructed the jury on this phase of the law in connection with his charge presenting one phase of manslaughter.

"If the trial court had not given the latter part of the paragraph of the charge on this subject, as follows: And if such first shot was fired in self-defense, and defendant fired other shots into the head or body of deceased, thereby producing or hastening the death of deceased, when it no longer reasonably appeared to him that he was in danger, then such later shots could not be in self-defense; but the offense in such event would be no higher than manslaughter,—the jury might have found from the evidence that the first shot was fired in self-defense, but that other shots which hastened or contributed to the death of deceased were fired not in self-defense, and have found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree; hence it was incumbent upon the trial court to give the portion of the charge above quoted. But in justice to the state, the court should have required the jury to find that the ingredients of manslaughter existed at the time of the firing of the last shots, before they would be justified in reducing the offense to manslaughter, but instead of so doing he simply charged the jury that under such circumstances defendant could be guilty of no higher offense than manslaughter, and certainly the defendant cannot complain at this charge, as it was presenting one phase of the case raised by the facts in a most favorable light to him. We therefore submit that there is nothing in the contention of appellant on this charge."

Party wall — easement — effect of injury to wall.

An easement in a party wall is not destroyed by the destruction by fire of the owner's building, which so weakens the wall that it cannot be used for the purposes

Note. — Party wall: effect of destruction of building to terminate adjoining owner's easement of support.

The earlier cases upon this subject are collected in the note to Bowhay v. Richards, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 883.

Upon the theory that when a party wall is destroyed by fire, lapse of time, or otherwise, in the absence of a contract for rebuilding it, the easement therein is at an end, it was held in Fewell v. Kinsella, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 1174, that 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

(June 7, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Weber County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin the removal of a wall in which plaintiff claimed an easement. Affirmed.

Statement by McCarty, Ch. J.:

This action was originally commenced against David Eccles, S. T. Whitaker, and Roy Sheedy to enjoin them from tearing down and removing a certain stone and brick wall situated along the south of defendant Eccles' land, which constituted the north boundary of the land and building owned by the plaintiff. During the pendency of the action on this appeal, David Eccles died, and the cause is continued in the name of his administrator. For the purpose of brevity and convenience, the name of Eccles will be used in this opinion, instead of the administrator. It appears from the record that the other defendants have no interest in the subject-matter of the action other than as employees of the defendant Eccles; hence further reference will not be made to them.

The findings of fact made by the trial court, all of which are within the issues, are, so far as material here, as follows:

"(2) That the defendant David Eccles is the owner and in possession of the following described real property situated in Ogden City, Utah, to wit: A part of lot seven (7), block twenty-five (25), plat 'A,' Ogden City survey, and further described as beginning at the northeast corner of said lot seven (7), running thence south along the west boundary of Washington avenue 71.80 feet to the," etc.

"(3) That the plaintiff, Commercial National Bank of Ogden, was and is the owner and holds the title to certain lands lying where one party tears down a building in order to erect another, and where because of the dangerous character of the wall, that is also removed by order of the city council, and the other party thereupon builds a new wall wholly on his own premises, the former party has no easement of support therein and may be prevented from using the same.

And in Ebert v. Mishler, 234 Pa. 609, 83 Atl. 596, where the chief controversy arose over rights in a common alley, it appears that adjoining buildings resting upon a party wall were accidentally destroyed by south of the land of the defendant, and that between such lands so owned by the plaintiff and the south boundary of defendant's land described in finding of fact No. 2 there is an intervening irregular strip of land which the plaintiff purchased from the defendant David Eccles in the year 1903, and paid to said defendant for said irregular strip of land the sum of $1,894, and upon said strip of land the north side of the plaintiff's building was constructed and is situated.

"(4) That along the south boundary of the premises described in the second finding of fact there is a stone foundation and a brick wall upon said foundation extending upward from the ground three stories; that said foundation is 36 inches thick, that the first story of said brick wall is 32 inches thick, and the two upper stories are 28 inches thick. That the said wall is situated wholly upon the said ground belonging to the defendant David Eccles.

"(5) That the plaintiff constructed its building upon its land immediately south of the said land of the said defendant David Eccles in the year 1903, and at that time, for the sum of $634.67 paid to the said defendant, the plaintiff purchased and became the owner of an easement in the foundation and brick wall situated along the south boundary of said defendant's premises from the basement to the center of the sills of the third story, and the said plaintiff has used said wall for the support and maintenance of its building situated on its said premises from the time of the construction of the same. That no interest in the wall and foundation other than the easement aforesaid, and no interest in the lands upon which said wall stands, was purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant.

"(6) That the joists supporting the roof and different floors of plaintiff's building situated upon its said land along the north side thereof rest upon and are supported by the wall on the south boundary of said defendant's land, and the steam and water pipes attached to and as a part of plaintiff's building are now attached to and placed in said wall, and were placed there at the time of its construction under the fire, and one party thereupon removed his half of the wall which was left standing after the fire and used the material therefrom in re-erecting his building wholly upon his own land; and it is said that in the absence of any agreement for the restoration of the wall, neither party may call upon the other for its restoration, but that the easement in the wall ceases and either may dispose of his portion of the premises as he pleases; the party wall having been obliterated, either party has the right to decline to rebuild, or he may rebuild upon his own lands without reference to the former rights in the wall; and one party having rebuilt wholly upon his own lands, the other party, if he desires to rebuild, must likewise erect wholly upon his land.

But it seems that if one party rebuilds the wall, not wholly upon his own premises, but as a party wall, the easement of the other party therein will revive.

Thus, under a deed of a parcel of ground, directing the grantee to erect thereon a building with a party wall for the use of both parties, and reserving to the grantor a perpetual easement in such wall, such easement not being confined to the use of the wall first erected, but being a continuing right which applies to any wall so erected by the grantee, when buildings constructed pursuant to such stipulation with a party wall are accidentally destroyed by fire, so long as the grantee has no building on his lot, the easement of the grantor in the wall is in abeyance; but when the grantee rebuilds, the easement is revived. Accordingly, while the grantor may not compel the grantee to rebuild in order that the former may again have the use of the wall, yet whenever such grantee does rebuild, he is under obligation to prepare the wall at his own cost for the use of the grantor, and the latter cannot be compelled to bear any portion of the expense of such preparation. Frisbie v. Bigham Masonic Lodge, 133 Ky. 588, 118 S. W. 359.

It will be observed that it is held in COMMERCIAL NAT. BANK v. ECCLES, that the mere destruction by fire of a building which so weakens the party wall that it cannot be retained and used as a support for the kind of building which the owner contemplates constructing in place of the one destroyed, but which does not interfere with the support given to the other party, does not terminate the easement of the latter therein; and if the owner of the burned building removes such wall, he must replace it with one which will afford the same support to the other party.

Similarly, it was held in Lexington Lodge v. Beal, 94 Miss. 521, 49 So. 833, that the accidental destruction by fire of one building resting upon a party wall, leaving the adjoining building intact and leaving the wall reasonably safe as a support for that building, at least with a moderate degree of re-enforcement, but leaving the wall incapable of supporting the new building contemplated by the owners of the one destroyed does not give the adjoining owner the right, by refusing permission to the other to tear down and rebuild, to compel the latter either not to build again or to build only such a structure as the wall remaining may suffice to support; the owner of the burned building, has the right to tear down the insufficient or dangerous party wall and replace it with a stronger and better one, provided he gives to the adjoining building the same support as it had in the old wall.

rights granted to plaintiff by the said defendant, and that the said wall, together with the openings for the joists and other supports and for the placing the steam and water pipes therein, are necessary for the support of plaintiff's said building, and are a part of said building, and the rights to have the joists and other supports, steam and water pipes, placed in the north wall of said defendant's building belong to and are a part of the rights belonging to plaintiff's easement in and to said wall.

"(7) That at the time of the construction of plaintiff's building on its said premises, and prior thereto, and since that date, up to and including the 15th day of November, 1911, there was situated upon the premises of the defendant David Eccles a five-story brick and stone building with a basement, and that the said building was on said 15th day of November, 1911, partially destroyed by fire, but that the walls of said building were left standing, and that the south wall was and is sufficient and ample for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff's building as constructed on its said premises.

"(8) That the said five-story building on the lands of defendant has been twice wholly destroyed by fire, so that the walls alone were left. That by reason of the action of said fires and the elements thereof said south wall has been so impaired and damaged that it is insufficient upon which to safely rebuild or to support such a building as was formerly situated and supported on defendant's land, and that same is insufficient to support such higher modern building as defendant proposes to erect on his land.

"(9) That the plaintiff's building has no other or additional support along its north side, save the support of the said wall, and that the taking out and removing of said wall would cause the plaintiff's building to fall and become a mass of ruins.

"(10) That the said defendant David Eccles is desirous of and intends to construct a new and more modern building upon his said land, and that the said south wall of said building is insufficient in its present condition to support the building which the said defendant contemplates and is desirous of and intends to construct upon said premises, and that the said wall cannot be made sufficiently strong to support the contemplated building without great expense and without reinforcing same by taking additional space of the said defendant's premises, and for that reason the said defendant desires to remove and tear down the present wall along the south boundary of his said premises to make room for and permit the construction of the new building as aforesaid.

"(11) That prior to the institution of this action the said defendant David Eccles served written notice upon the plaintiff of his intention to tear down and remove said wall,—but without offering any easement or support in the new wall which he proposed to construct, or any protection or support to the plaintiff's premises by reason of the removal of said wall,—and maintained and contended that the said plaintiff had no right or interest in the present wall, and should have no right or interest in the wall to be constructed.

"(12) That all of said plaintiff's building is occupied by tenants, and that the Fred M. Nye Company hold the ground or first floor and basement under lease, and have therein an extensive and large stock of men's furnishing goods."

As conclusions of law the court found:

"(1) That the plaintiff is the owner of an easement for the support of its building in the present wall situated on the defendant's premises along the south boundary thereof, and that the said plaintiff is entitled to a like easement and support and right in the wall to be constructed by said defendant over and along the south boundary of his said premises.

"(2) That the defendant David Eccles is the owner of the said wall and the ground on which it has stood, subject only to the easement of support of the plaintiff in such wall, as stated in the findings of fact.

"(3) That said wall is insufficient to support another building of like kind as that destroyed, and insufficient to support such new and modern building as defendant proposes to erect, and that the defendant David Eccles is entitled to tear down and remove the wall situated along the south boundary of his said premises, exercising such due care and diligence in the prosecution thereof as will prevent injury to the plaintiff's premises.

"(4) That the said defendant will be required to replace said wall at his own expense with such new and stronger wall as will meet the requirements of his said new proposed building, and shall so construct the said wall so as to afford and give to the plaintiff the same easement, right, and support and use for its building in the said wall to be constructed as the plaintiff now has and enjoys in the present wall."

A judgment responsive to and supported by the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The judgment, among other things, provides that "David Eccles is hereby permitted to remove the wall mentioned . . . at his own expense, with due care so as not to injure plaintiff's building; . . . and the said plaintiff is hereby adjudged and is hereby awarded the same rights, easement, and support in the wall to be constructed by said defendant David Eccles, and the south boundary of his premises, as plaintiff now has and enjoys in the present wall." To reverse the judgment, defendants appeal.

Messrs. Richards & Boyd and Boyd, DeVine, & Eccles, for appellants:

The destruction of a party wall for the purpose for which it was used during the easement attaching thereto ends the easement and all rights thereunder.

McCarty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the grounds upon which appellants ask for a reversal of the judgment is that the findings of fact are not supported by the greater weight of the evidence. We do not deem it necessary to a clear understanding of the questions presented, for us to either review the evidence in detail or set forth the substance thereof. We think it is sufficient to here state that we have carefully examined the record; and, while we find that there is a conflict in the testimony of some of the witnesses on certain issues, we are of the opinion that the findings of fact are supported by a clear preponderance of the evidence. The wall in question is entirely upon the land of appellant Eccles, and, as found by the court, respondent has "no interest in the lands upon which said wall stands." There is much evidence, however, which tends to show that respondent purchased an interest in and became part owner of the wall up to the third story thereof. But since the court found that respondent acquired an easement only in the wall, and as respondent has not appealed or filed a cross assignment of errors, we shall, for the purposes of this appeal, assume that respondent acquired no greater property right in the wall than an easement.

The important question, therefore, is: Did respondent's right to an easement in the wall terminate when the wall was rendered useless to appellant Eccles by the destruction of his building of which the wall formed a part? The position of appellants on this question is clearly stated by their counsel in their printed brief as follows: The purposes of the wall were "to support mutually two buildings, one of five stories and the other (respondent's building) of two stories. The rights of the adjoining owners therein were mutual, a cross easement, each with the right to have its building supported. When from calamity or accident such wall became useless for either of these mutual purposes, the condition or relation ceases. The purposes were gone." And again they say: "The destruction of a party wall for the purpose for which it was used during the easement attaching thereto ends the easement and all rights thereunder." Respondent acquired by purchase from appellant an easement in the wall up to the third story thereof, and has used the same as the north wall of its building. The joists of respondent's building are fastened to and rest on the wall.

The authorities practically all agree that, where a party has acquired an easement of support in a party wall, the accidental destruction of the wall terminates the easement and extinguishes all rights arising thereunder. Therefore, if the wall in question had been rendered useless or unsafe as a support to respondent's building, or if it had been entirely destroyed by the fire, it might be argued with much force that such impairment or destruction terminated the easement. But this case does not fall within this well-recognized rule. Under existing conditions respondent's easement—property right—in the wall is just as valuable and available as a support to its building as it was before the destruction of appellant Eccles' building. The question therefore arises: May Eccles, because of the destruction by fire of his building, which so weakened the wall that it cannot be retained and used as a support for the kind of building he contemplates erecting on the site of the one destroyed, deprive respondent of its property, easement, in the wall, which furnishes the same support to its building as it did before the fire occurred? To permit Mr. Eccles to tear down the wall and remove this support from respondent's building, without requiring him, at his own expense, to erect another wall in its place, and thereby provide the same support for respondent's building as the present wall furnishes, would in effect be a confiscation of respondent's property.

It does not follow because the wall is unsafe as a support for the kind of building appellant Eccles intends to erect that he has the right to terminate respondent's easement of support therein for its building, and proceed to take down and remove the wall to the irreparable damage of respondent. That Eccles has the right to remove the wall and erect another in its stead suitable for the building he contemplates erecting no one will deny, but in doing so he is bound to use ordinary care to avoid injury to respondent's building, and to rebuild without unnecessary delay. Putzel v. Drovers' & M. Nat. Bank, 78 Md. 349, 22 L.R.A. 632, 44 Am. St. Rep. 298, 28 Atl. 276; Lexington Lodge v. Beal, 94 Miss. 521, 49 So. 833. In the case last cited the principle of law applicable to the case at bar is well illustrated in the following language: "Where one of the buildings supported by a party wall has been destroyed, and the wall itself has been so weakened as to be dangerous or insufficient as a support for the building which the owner of the destroyed building is about to erect, he has the right to tear down the insufficient or dangerous party wall, and replace it with one stronger and better, provided he gives to the adjoining house the same right of support as it had in the old one. He is but exercising his legitimate rights of property. If it follows from this that the owner of the adjoining building will be put to inconvenience while the work of demolition and construction is going on, this is an unavoidable consequence attendant upon the adoption and use of party walls. It cannot be the law that the fortunate adjoining owner, whose building is not destroyed, and who may be content with the wall, although weakened or partially destroyed, can, by refusing to the co-owner, whose building has been destroyed, permission to tear down and rebuild the wall, compel him either not to build again or to build only such a structure as the wall remaining may suffice to support. . . . While the adjoining owner, whose building has been destroyed, and who wishes to tear down an insufficient or dangerous party wall, and rebuild, will be accorded this right, it must be exercised so as to work no avoidable injury to the owner of the adjoining building. He will be liable if the work is done negligently and damage to the co-owner results therefrom." See also 30 Cyc. 781, 782.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

Straup, J., concurring:

I concur. The plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, purchased an interest, not in defendant's building, but a portion of the south wall of his building five stories high. The portion of the wall in which such interest was purchased was but three stories high, and in length that of plaintiff's building. It was purchased to furnish the north wall for its building three stories high, and to support the north side of it. True, it purchased no interest in the soil. But the interest purchased in the wall and the purpose for which it was purchased necessarily gave the plaintiff an interest also in the soil upon which the wall rested, so long as it remained and was suitable for such purpose. Such interest was perpetual and unconditional. The defendant's building was injured by fire. The south wall was injured to such an extent as not to be sufficient, as found by the court, to support a building as was formerly supported on the defendant's land or such a building—ten or eleven stories high—as the defendant proposes and intends to erect. But that portion of the wall in which the plaintiff for a valuable consideration purchased an absolute and perpetual interest was not materially injured, and is sufficient to safely and properly support the plaintiff's building in the future as it did in the past, and for such uses and purposes is substantially as good now as it was before. That interest, that use, that purpose—the thing bought, the thing sold and for which the plaintiff paid its money—was not destroyed or materially impaired. The plaintiff still has what it had bought and what the defendant had sold. That the wall was damaged or impaired for other purposes is the defendant's misfortune. The plaintiff is not to blame for that, nor should it be charged with it by compelling it to surrender that which it bought and paid for and still owns and possesses. Observations are made that the defendant should not suffer the whole loss occasioned by the accidental fire. Everyone under such circumstances must bear his own loss. What the plaintiff suffered in such respect it must bear. So, too, must the defendant. The plaintiff with respect to the question in hand suffered none, for it still has about all it had before the fire. That the defendant has not is his, not the plaintiff's loss. And for this reason do I see a distinction between the case here and one where had the wall been wholly destroyed or damaged, or that portion of it in which the plaintiff has an interest. For, in the latter, the interest of the plaintiff as well as that of the defendant would be destroyed or damaged. The thing in which they both had a common interest would no longer exist or be useful to either. But they had no common interest in the whole wall. The common interest was only to the extent of three stories and the length of plaintiff's building. That was all the defendant sold and all the plaintiff bought. Above or beyond that, the defendant granted, and the plaintiff acquired, no interest. The thing so bought and sold, and the purpose for which it was bought and sold, were unrestricted and unconditional. Of course, they had the right to make their own bargain; but that is the bargain made by them. So, above or below the third story, wind may blow and fire rage, but if they do not damage or impair what the defendant sold and granted, and what the plaintiff unconditionally bought and paid for and still possesses and enjoys, I see no reason why it should be compelled to surrender it because the defendant sustained a loss of property in which the plaintiff was given and had no interest whatever. Then it is also said that, if the plaintiff is permitted to use the new wall for the same purpose it used the old, it is granted or given something without consideration. Not so. It now has what it theretofore bought and paid for. The wall, for that purpose, is substantially as good now as it was before the fire. It, however, is not sufficient to support such a building as the defendant proposes and intends to erect. So the court, under its equitable powers, and as is proper, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) has given the defendant the right to remove it if he will erect another and give back to the plaintiff what he, by tearing down and removing the old wall, will take from the plaintiff. Thus, the surrender of what the plaintiff now has, and what it had theretofore bought of the defendant and now owns, possesses, and enjoys, is the consideration for requiring the defendant, if he takes down and removes the old wall, to erect a new one and give the plaintiff that right and interest in it which it owned, possessed, and enjoyed in the old wall at the time of its removal by the defendant. That is but equity, and is, I think, within the adjudged cases.

Frick, J., dissenting:

I regret my inability to agree with the conclusions reached by my associates. I cannot do so, for the reason that, if the judgment in this case becomes the settled law in this jurisdiction, much unnecessary litigation as well as much injustice must inevitably result between the owners of adjoining buildings, one of which, as in this case, is made uninhabitable through its destruction by fire. My associates base their conclusions entirely upon the one fact found by the court, that the wall in question was not entirely destroyed by the fire, but that a portion sufficient for the purposes of respondent was left standing, although such portion is entirely useless as a wall for the proposed building which appellant intends to erect, or for a building similar to the one that was destroyed. It is conceded upon all sides that the wall in question stands entirely upon the land of appellant; that the respondent never had nor now has any interest in the soil on which the wall rests; and that, if it has any rights whatever, it is merely an easement in the remaining wall, and nothing more. It is also conceded that appellant's building was accidentally destroyed by fire, and that the remaining walls are wholly insufficient to support another building, and are therefore practically useless to him. My associates also concede, stating the fact in their own language: "The authorities practically all agree that, where a party has acquired an easement of support in a party wall, the accidental destruction of the wall terminates the easement, and extinguishes all rights arising thereunder." In view of this concession, so frankly stated, I need not refer to the authorities upon the subject. They, however, seek to exclude this case from the consequences stated above, for the reason, they say, that the remaining wall is just as valuable and available as a support to its (respondent's) building as it was before the destruction of appellant Eccles' building. In this statement, therefore, is contained the theory upon which my associates approve the judgment of the court below. This theory, in my judgment, is wholly fallacious. By the enforcement of it the loss occasioned by the fire is placed wholly upon appellant, and the respondent is permitted to escape from the consequences thereof, although it is conceded that appellant's building, as such, and his walls for every purpose that he could use them for walls, are destroyed. Moreover, it is in effect held that, while respondent had a right or easement in the building that was destroyed by fire, it nevertheless has sustained no loss. From such holding it follows that if the wall in question had suffered greater destruction, or if it had been entirely destroyed, then respondent's rights or easement thereunder would have been extinguished. From this I am authorized to assume that if respondent had been so unfortunate as to have its building destroyed by the fire in question, or by another, it would have lost all right to join another building to any new building that appellant might choose to erect, but since it had the good fortune not to lose all, therefore it has lost nothing, and appellant must not only stand the whole loss, but in case he chooses to improve and use his own property by erecting thereon a suitable building he must yield a portion thereof to the use of respondent without any consideration whatever. I say without consideration; since it must be conceded that all respondent purchased was an easement in one of the walls of appellant's building, and when that building was destroyed the easement, in my judgment, was also destroyed. If this be true, how can respondent claim a right in an entirely different wall from that in which it purchased the easement? It seems to me that the fact which in my judgment is controlling is entirely overlooked. This fact is that respondent acquired an easement in a wall only while it was and continued to be a part of a building, and that when the wall from any cause over which the appellant had no control was so affected that it no longer was fit to support the building of which it was a part, so that the building ceased to exist, then the wall must also be held to have ceased to exist for the purposes of the easement. When, therefore, the building was destroyed, the wall for all practical purposes was also destroyed, and hence the easement, in the language of my associates, was extinguished.

If respondent desired to obtain an easement for all time in any building that appellant might erect in place of the old one, if that should be destroyed, it should have entered into a contract to that effect. Would anyone familiar with the record in this case seriously contend that the respondent could have obtained what my associates now hold it did obtain for the amount it paid for the alleged easement in the old wall, namely, an easement in a new wall which may continue for an indefinite period, or for so long as the building may last, and, if the old walls happen to continue to stand, that the easement would continue for all time?

But it is contended that, if respondent is not permitted to attach its building to the new one, it means a practical confiscation of its property rights in the remaining wall. This assumes that the respondent acquired a right in a wall which continued after it had been destroyed to such an extent that it could not longer be used as appellant's building, or as a part of any new one he might erect upon the ruins of the old. Respondent is thus given a right in a thing that has ceased to exist for the purposes contemplated by the parties when the easement was acquired, and has ceased to exist for every purpose except a pile of brick or stone and mortar which by accident, merely, is left large enough to answer the purpose of respondent, although it answers no other purpose whatever. The mere fact that the wall has to be removed by the wrecker, instead of having been consumed by the fire, cannot change its character either as a matter of fact or as a matter of law. Nor can any amount of words make that a wall which merely constitutes the débris of a ruined building. Neither was it contemplated by the parties that it should be so. The fact that the respondent now claims that the wall is sufficient for its purpose is the result of mere accident, and is not based upon any contractual rights. For the purposes of the easement the wall was destroyed when it no longer could be used as a part of appellant's building nor as a part of any building he might choose to erect. Had appellant wilfully destroyed the building, or torn it down for the purpose of erecting another, with the intention of preventing the respondent from using the wall, the conclusion reached by my brethren might be justified. Under the undisputed facts in this case the conclusion reached, in my judgment, is not only unsound, but it takes from one and gives to another that which the court has no right to take or grant. In my judgment adjoining owners should be permitted to make their own arrangements, if they can with respect to the rights one may obtain in the property of the other.

The judgment should therefore be reversed and the action dismissed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 1.)

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Resp.,
v.

CHARLES PRYOR, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 132 Pac. 874.)

Witness — credibility — hysteria.

To affect the credibility of a witness who testifies that instruments were used on her

Note. — Effect of insanity on competency of witness.

The early cases on this question are presented in the note to State v. Myers, 37 L.R.A. 423, and the present note is supplementary thereto, except that no attempt has been made in the present note to include cases of the class presented in the two last subdivisions of the early note, the same being reserved for future annotation.

STATE v. PRYOR appears to be the only reported case in which it was sought to show that the witness was suffering from hysteria at the time of the event testified to. Evidence to show that fact is undoubtedly competent for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, within the rule established by the cases holding it competent to show various other forms of mental disturbance, but it seems that proof of mental disturbance at the time of the events narrated does not necessarily render the witness incompetent, but goes to the credibility only, except where it is otherwise provided by statute.

In Goodwin v. State, 114 Wis. 318, 90 N. W. 170, it was held that the court has no power to require the complaining witness, after she has testified, to submit to a personal examination to determine whether or not she was afflicted with hysteria. It was said, however, that in a case where the judge was seriously doubtful of the mental competency of a proposed witness, he might impose a medical examination as a condition of allowing the witness to testify, to which she might refuse to submit.

In general.

As shown in the earlier note, the rule is now well established that a person afflicted with insanity is not thereby rendered incompetent as a witness if he has sufficient understanding to comprehend the obligations of an oath, and is capable of giving a correct account of the matter which he has seen or heard with reference to the action at issue. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720; McKinstry v. Tuscaloosa, 172 Ala. 344, 54 So. 629; Cuesta v. Goldsmith, 1 Ga. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to effect an abortion, evidence is admissible that at the time of the alleged offense she was suffering from hysteria, which caused her to have hallucinations and illusions.

(June 13, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County convicting him of abortion. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. G. McBride and J. E. McGrew, for appellant:

The evidence of hysteria was admissible.

1 Wharton & S. Med. Jur. § 518; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 28 Conn. 177; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1141; 1 Greenl. Ev. 13th ed. § 365; 25 Cent. L. J. 225;

App. 48, 57 S. E. 933; People v. Enright, 256 Ill. 221, 99 N. E. 936; Covington v. O'Meara, 133 Ky. 762, 119 S. W. 187; Barker v. Washburn, 200 N. Y. 280, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159, 140 Am. A person is not necessarily incompetent to testify because of his impaired mental condition at the time of the occurrences in question, as ordinarily such infirmity goes to the weight of the witness's evidence, not to competency to testify, unless the impairment is substantially total or such as to render the person unconscious of the obligations of an oath. Burns v. State, 145 Wis. 373, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 128 N. W. 987.

A statute prohibiting persons from being witnesses "who are of unsound mind at the time of their production" does not prohibit one from becoming a witness who has sufficient understanding to apprehend the obligation of an oath, and who is capable of giving a fairly correct account of the things he has seen or heard, although he may be afflicted with some form of insanity. State v. Simes, 12 Idaho, 310, 85 Pac. 914, 9 Ann. Cas. 1216; Guthrie v. Shaffer, 7 Okla. 459, 54 Pac. 698; Adams v. State, 5 Okla. Crim. Rep. 347, 114 Pac. 347.

A statute providing that persons of unsound mind are incompetent as witnesses is but a declaration of the common law; whether the person offered as a witness is so unsound in mind and memory as to be totally incapable of testifying is an open question under such a statute as at common law. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720.

The declarations of one having sufficient intelligence to take care of himself and remember friends, relatives, and acquaintances, are admissible upon the question of pedigree, although he has not sufficient mental capacity to transact business or manage and control property. Champion v. McCarthy, 228 Ill. 87, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1052, 81 N. E. 808, 10 Ann. Cas. 517.

Messrs. John F. Murphy and H. B. Butler for the State.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the crime of abortion, and has appealed from the judgment entered upon the verdict of the jury.

The statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2448) provides that "every person who, with intent thereby to produce the miscarriage of a woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve her life or that of the child whereof she is pregnant, shall . . . use, or cause to be used, any instrument or other means, shall be guilty of abortion." The information charges that the appellant, in King county, on the 6th day of September, 1911, with the intent to produce the miscarriage of Regna Abramson, did (omitting qualifying words) use a speculum and a rubber catheter, which instruments he then and there inserted into her private parts; such miscarriage not being necessary to preserve her life, or the life of the child whereof she was then pregnant. This is a second appeal. See 67 Wash. 216, 121 Pac. 56.

The appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. This point was pressed with much earnest-touching his physical condition, but sound on all other matters, was properly permitted to testify concerning another matter, where it appeared that his testimony was clear, coherent, and consistent, and there was no reason to doubt his capability of testifying fully and truthfully. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, supra.

The fact that a witness had suffered an illness which may at times have affected his mentality furnishes no ground for excluding his testimony, where it appears to be thoughtful, to the point, and consistent with other testimony in the case. Brown v. Armstrong & L. Co. 239 Pa. 549, 87 Atl. 11.

The court is not warranted in entirely rejecting the testimony of a witness in considering whether the conclusion of the jury was right, where there was evidence that he had epileptic fits, and had one about five or six hours before the occurrence about which he was called to testify, that such fit would leave a person for a time in a dazed condition, and that two hours before the transaction, he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor and pretty drunk, where it appeared the testimony was given in a clear and intelligible manner, and the witness withstood a cross-examination covering 104 pages of the record as creditably as the average witness, and there was nothing in his testimony to indicate that he was not able to give a correct account of what he saw and heard, or that he did not do so. People v. Enright, 256 Ill. 221, 99 N. E. 936.

The mere fact that the state accuses a defendant with rape in having had carnal knowledge of a female who was at the time incapable of giving legal consent by reason of unsoundness of mind does not per se establish the incompetency of such female to testify against the accused. State v. Simes, 12 Idaho, 310, 85 Pac. 914, 9 Ann. Cas. 1216; State v. Crouch, 130 Iowa, 478, 107 N. W. 173.

In such case the court should examine and pass upon the grounds of objection as if made against the competency of another witness. Ibid.

114 Pac. 347, the prosecutrix in a similar case was permitted to testify over objection of accused that she was incompetent, and the ruling was sustained and the conviction affirmed, though it was not contended that the indictment charging the offense established the incompetency of the witness.

But in Lee v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 285, 64 S. W. 1047, it was held that the female named in the indictment which charged the accused with rape in having had carnal knowledge of a female "being so mentally diseased at the time as to have no will to oppose the act" was an incompetent witness to prove the corpus delicti of the offense charged, especially where the statute provided that no persons could testify who were in an "insane condition of mind when the events happened of which they are to testify."

The mere statement by the plaintiff in his bill of particulars filed in his action for personal injuries, that by reason thereof he was suffering from paranoia, is not sufficient to establish his incompetency to testify. Cole v. Barber, 33 R. I. 414, 82 Atl. 129.

A party to a compromise is competent to testify as to his mental condition at the time of its execution. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Carter, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2017, 66 S. W. 508.

Competency a preliminary question for the court.

The question whether a person who is offered as a witness has sufficient understanding to be competent as a witness is a preliminary question for the court to decide. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720; McKinstry v. Tuscaloosa, 172 Ala. 344, 54 So. 629; People v. Tyree, — Cal. App. —, 132 Pac. 784; Cuesta v. Goldsmith, 1 Ga. App. 48, 57 S. E. 983; Covington v. O'Meara, 133 Ky. 762, 119 S. W. 187; Bowdle v. Detroit Street R. Co. 103 Mich. 272, 50 Am. St. Rep. 366, 61 N. W. 529, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 180; State v. Whitsett, 232 Mo. 511, 134 S. W. 555; Guthrie v. Shaffer, 7 Okla. 459, 54 Pac. 698; Adams v. State, 5 Okla. Crim.

ness at the bar; the argument being that the instruments themselves and the evidence of the medical experts show that the instruments could not have been inserted in the uterus or cervical canal. The appellant admitted that the girl was pregnant by him, and that he used the instruments upon her, but says that he did so for a lawful purpose; namely, to treat excoriations "in the cervix of the uterus."

Touching this question the court gave the jury the following instruction: "In this case it has been admitted that Regna Abramson was pregnant and by the defendant, and that the defendant, on or about the date mentioned in the information, inserted in the private parts of said Regna Abramson the speculum and catheter introduced as exhibits in this case. The only question left for you to determine is: Were such instruments, or either one of them, used with intent thereby to produce a miscarriage, the same not being necessary to preserve either the life of Regna Abramson or of the child whereof she was pregnant? If either instrument, when inserted, was so inserted with that intent, then it makes no difference whether such was the right kind of an instrument, or how far in it penetrated,—whether it actually entered the uterus or

Rep. 347, 114 Pac. 347; Mills v. Cook, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 81.

The inquiry for the court on the preliminary examination when the person is offered as a witness is limited to his understanding of the obligations of an oath and ability to comprehend the examination as a witness. Wright v. Southern Exp. Co. 80 Fed. 85.

In State v. Simes, 12 Idaho, 310, 85 Pac. 914, 9 Ann. Cas. 1216, it was said that the preliminary examination for testing the competency of a person offered as a witness should be made with special reference to the scope of inquiry and subject-matter about which the witness is to testify. "It would be clearly unfair to test the competency of the witness on the particular subject on which he is insane, when in fact he would not be called upon to testify on that subject, and, indeed, he might be perfectly rational and clear on other subjects."

It is within the discretion of the trial court to say which side should first examine the witness as to his competency. State v. Crouch, 130 Iowa, 478, 107 N. W. 173.

The question of competency of a witness, after the hearing of evidence, is so largely a question of fact, and so peculiarly within the knowledge and discretion of the trial court, that the appellate court will not interfere unless the record shows a clear case of error. Ibid.; Guthrie v. Shaffer, 7 Okla. 459, 54 Pac. 698; Mills v. Cook, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 81; People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 Pac. 200; People v. Tyree, — Cal. App. —, 132 Pac. 784; Czarecki v. Seattle & S. F. R. & Nav. Co. 30 Wash. 288, 70 Pac. 750; Burns v. State, 145 Wis. 373, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 128 N. W. 987.

The refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial upon the ground that one of the material witnesses who testified at the trial was, at the time, of such mental unsoundness as to render him incompetent or of such mental condition as to require instructions to the jury in weighing his testimony, will not be disturbed, where the testimony of the witness appears clear and intelligent, with no indication of mental aberration, and the trial court found that while the witness was subject to certain hallucinations, and that insanity had been hereditary in his family, he was capable of making an intelligent and connected statement; and that if the fact of his mental infirmity, as shown on the motion for new trial, had been known at the trial, no instructions to the jury relating thereto would have been necessary. Czarecki v. Seattle & S. F. R. & Nav. Co. 30 Wash. 388, 70 Pac. 750.

If timely request is made, the court should examine into the present mental status of the proposed witness before permitting him to testify before the jury. Mills v. Cook, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 81.

In Williams v. State, 30 Ohio C. C. 342, it was held that, upon objection to the mental capacity of one offered as a witness, the court is not bound to stop the trial to test his mental capacity.

Credibility of witness for the jury.

After the court has determined that the witness offered is competent to testify, the question of his credibility immediately becomes a matter for the consideration and determination of the jury. People v. Tyree. — Cal. App. —, 132 Pac. 784; Cuesta v. Goldsmith, 1 Ga. App. 48, 57 S. E. 983; State v. Simes, 12 Idaho, 310, 85 Pac. 914, 9 Ann. Cas. 1216; Bowdle v. Detroit Street R. Co. 103 Mich. 272, 50 Am. St. Rep. 366, 61 N. W. 529, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 180; Burns v. State, 145 Wis. 373, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 128 N. W. 987.

Presumption of competency; burden of proof.

Persons tendered as witnesses are presumed to be sane and competent to testify until the contrary is shown. People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 Pac. 200; Covington v. O'Meara, 133 Ky. 762, 119 S. W. 187; Cole v. Barber, 33 R. I. 414, 82 Atl. 129; Batterton v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 381, 107 S. W. 826.

And the burden rests upon the person asserting the contrary to show not only mental weakness, but that it is of such a nature and extent as to render him mentally incompetent in respect to relating the facts of the case, or to comprehend the nature and obligations of an oath. People v. Harrison. 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 Pac. 200; Batterton v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 381, 107 S. W. 826.

not, or actually caused an abortion or not,—if it, whatever kind it be, and however or wherever it was inserted, was so inserted with intent thereby to cause an abortion, then you will find the defendant guilty.” The instruction is terse, lucid, and admittedly correct. The girl testified that the appellant told her that he inserted the instruments for the purpose of relieving her of the child. The state’s medical witnesses say that the instruments could have been inserted into the uterus. This is denied by the medical experts offered by the appellant. Measured by the law as announced by the court, it is obvious, without further comment, that this assignment cannot be sustained.

The appellant sought to show by medical testimony that Regna Abramson, who testified for the state, while sane at the time she testified, was, at the time she charges the crime to have been committed, suffering from hysteria, which caused her to have “delusions, hallucinations, . . . and illusions.” The state’s counsel objected on the ground that the testimony was irrelevant and immaterial. The court in sustaining the objection, among other things, said: “The man did insert that instrument, or he did not, with intent; he did or

It is not enough to merely object to a witness on the ground of mental incapacity, or even to charge that he has been adjudged non compos mentis. There must be established a prima facie case of incapacity before the presumption of sanity is overcome. Covington v. O’Meara, 133 Ky. 762, 119 S. W. 187.

Evidence to establish incompetency.

As shown by the earlier note, evidence is admissible for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, to prove that the witness was or is subject to insane delusions; that his mind and memory are impaired by disease; that his conduct is stupid and his talk irrational; that he was previously, or subsequently became, insane; that he has been examined and found of imbecile mind and weak memory; and that at the time of the events narrated there was evidence of mental disturbance.

But testimony of a physician as to the condition of the mind of a person as he found it at a period some two years before such person was produced as a witness is properly excluded as too remote, after the court had ruled upon the competency of the witness and his testimony had been received. People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 Pac. 200.

It was also said in the above case that such testimony could not be admitted for the purpose of impeachment, because it is not one of the modes prescribed by the statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052) for impeaching a witness. Ibid.

A certificate from the War Department, showing that the witness was discharged from the Army because of mental imbecility, is incompetent to discredit his testimony, as it was a mere ex parte statement by a person not shown to be qualified to speak as to the mental condition of the witness, and was also an attempt to impeach the witness on a collateral matter. State v. Spotted Hawk, 22 Mont. 33, 55 Pac. 1026.

A party cannot permit a witness to testify and then prove that he is insane. People v. Enright, 256 Ill. 221, 99 N. E. 936.

Accordingly it was held in the above case that an offer to prove that a witness was insane for a number of years was properly denied where no objections were made when 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

he was offered as a witness. The court said: “If a party knows before the trial that the witness is incompetent on account of mental condition, the objection must be made before he has given any testimony, and if the objection appears upon the trial it must be interposed as soon as it becomes apparent.”

An offer to prove, after the witness had testified, that he was a person of unsound mind, is properly denied where it appears that his testimony is clear, coherent, and as consistent as that of the other witnesses in the case, and there was no objection when he was offered as a witness, or a request that he be examined on his voir dire. State v. Whitsett, 232 Mo. 511, 134 S. W. 555.

The mere fact of mental derangement on some subject unconnected with the subject-matter of the litigation, and which does not affect the testimony of the witness in any way, is not to be considered by the jury in determining his credibility. People v. Enright, supra.

Accordingly it was held in the above case that an offer to prove by four women, one of them the wife of the witness, that he had been in the habit of indecently exposing himself to women and children, and that in their opinion he was insane, was properly excluded, where the witness had testified as to what he had seen and heard at the time of the shooting by the accused, who was on trial for murder. Ibid.

—effect of inquisition, etc.

A person who has been adjudged insane is not, in all cases, incompetent as a witness. His testimony is admissible if he has sufficient understanding to comprehend the obligation of an oath and to be capable of giving a correct account of the matters he has seen or heard in reference to the questions at issue; and whether he has that understanding is a question for the judge to determine in each case, the credit to be given to his testimony being ultimately for the jury to decide.

Proof that one was adjudged insane is no evidence that he is insane when he is offered as a witness four years afterwards, it appearing that he is at large and that he

he did not; that is the whole question." The court was both right and wrong in this utterance; right so far as he stated the fact at issue, and wrong in so far as he reached the conclusion that the testimony was inadmissible. The appellant used the instruments, either for the purpose of committing an abortion, or for a lawful purpose; namely, that of medically treating the uterus. The evidence offered and rejected was admissible upon the question of the credibility of the girl's testimony. It touched the very heart of the case; namely, was there a criminal intent? It was competent for the same reason that testimony tending to show her intoxication at the time of the occurrence would have been competent. 1 Wharton & S. Med. Jur. 4th ed. § 518; 40 Cyc. 2573; 2 Elliott, Ev. § 756; Wharton, Crim. Ev. 370a; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1142; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 28 Conn. 177; Sarbach v. Jones, 20 Kan. 497; Dejarrette v. Com. 75 Va. 867, 40 Am. Rep. 750.

Wharton & Stille thus states the rule: "On the other hand, Morel calls attention to the well-substantiated fact that patients of these classes [sufferers from hysteria] sometimes tenaciously cherish delusions and hal-lucinations that they have been the subject of sexual wrongs from others (e. g., rape, abortion, impregnation), and detail the circumstances of such wrongs with a consistency and exactness which, in those unacquainted with the patient's condition, secure belief."

"Delusions and hallucinations constitute that species of mental unsoundness which is marked by persistent and incorrigible beliefs that things which exist only in the imagination of the patient are real." 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 563.

In considering this question in the Holcomb Case the court said: "This inlet to the understanding may be perfect, so far as any human eye can discern, the moral qualities may all be healthy and active, the conscience may be sensitive and vigilant, and the memory may be able to perform its office faithfully, and yet, under the influence of morbid delusions, reason becomes dethroned, false impressions from surrounding objects are received, and the mind becomes an unsafe depository of facts. The force of all human testimony depends as much upon the ability of the witness to observe the facts correctly as upon his disposition to describe them talks rationally. Covington v. O'Meara, 133 Ky. 762, 119 S. W. 187. The court said: "While it has been said that where one had been proved and adjudged to be of unsound mind arising from mania, the presumption of law is, in a controversy, whether a writing executed by him was executed in a lucid interval, that his condition is unchanged until the contrary is shown (Carpenter v. Carpenter, 8 Bush, 287), that rule does not apply to one offered as a witness in the presence of the court, unless the judgment of lunacy is so recent, or the witness is still confined in an asylum, as to raise the presumption of fact that his condition has not materially changed since the verdict. The judgment of a court finding one of unsound mind is never conclusive that he remains so; much less is it conclusive that his condition continues so as to disqualify him as a witness in his own or another's behalf. The utmost effect of it, as bearing on the competency of the person as a witness, is to raise the question of his competency, when it is for the judge to then decide, upon the witness's appearance, conduct, speech, and any outside testimony that might be offered, whether he is competent. So, when, after having heard the witness depose, and having observed his bearing, the judge overrules an objection as to the competency of the witness, although recently found to be insane, the testimony of that witness becomes a matter solely of credibility."

A record of proceedings before justices for the purpose of determining whether a person was a proper person to be admitted to the insane hospital for treatment was not admissible in evidence six years afterwards, to affect the credibility of the person as a 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

witness. Hicks v. State, 165 Ind. 440, 75 N. E. 641.

Proof that a person had been adjudged a lunatic does not establish his incompetency, where it appears that he had been out of the asylum more than six years and appears intelligent and perfectly sane. Singleton v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 560, 124 S. W. 92.

The finding upon inquiry that one is an idiot and incompetent to manage his own affairs, and the appointment of a committee for him, is not conclusive that he is not a competent witness at a time several years later, but he may be permitted to testify, if, upon questioning, he appears to be competent to do so. Barker v. Washburn, 200 N. Y. 280, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, 140 Am. St. Rep. 640, 93 N. E. 958.

Proof that the person has been found insane, and is an inmate of an insane asylum, affords prima facie evidence that he is of unsound mind, and operates to throw the burden of proving competency upon the party offering him as a witness. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720.

And in State v. Cremeans, 62 W. Va. 134, 57 S. E. 405, it was held that when a witness is offered to testify in a case, and objection is made to his competency, and an offer is made to show that the witness had been confined in an asylum for the insane and also had been put in jail on a charge of lunacy and had not been discharged from his lunacy, he should not be permitted to testify until the court has made a careful examination as to the facts, as well as to the condition of the mind of the witness at the time, and has found that he is competent. A. L. R.

honestly, and if the mind of the witness is in such a condition that it cannot accurately observe passing events, and if erroneous impressions are thereby made upon the tablet of the memory, his story will make but a feeble impression upon the hearer, though it be told with the greatest apparent sincerity. We are therefore of opinion that the insanity of a witness at the time of the transaction about which he is called to testify does impair the force of his testimony, and is a matter proper to be considered by the triers to whom his testimony is submitted; and if this matter is to be considered by the triers we do not perceive any reason why it should not be treated like any other fact."

In the Dejarnette Case it is said: In all "inquiries relating to insanity every reasonable latitude should be allowed in the examination of witnesses, however false or unfounded the court may consider the defense."

The state relies upon the case of State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63. In that case the court remarked that the temporary aberrations or delusions sought to be proven were remote in point of time, and were not of the same type or character as the delusions claimed to have existed in the mind of the witness at the time of the occurrence to which the witness testified. In other respects it differs so widely in its facts from this case that a discussion of it would not be profitable.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the respondents against the appellants for the partition of certain real property. The land in question was acquired from the United States under the homestead laws by one Peter Teynor, who died without lineal heirs. The respondents are his father and mother. The appellant Chloe Heible was his wife at the time of his death. The other appellants claim an interest in the land through mortgages or contracts to convey, executed by Chloe Heible. Peter Teynor entered the land in the year 1901. He was then a single man, never having theretofore been married. On January 1, 1903, he intermarried with the appellant Chloe Heible. He made final proof under the homestead laws on September 12, 1906, and thereafter a patent to the land from the United States was duly issued to him. He died intestate on October 30, 1906, without property, which is perfected after the marriage, the property is separate, and not community.

Bender*, 18 Nev. 361, 4 Pac. 711, 7 Pac. 74.

Thus, in Forker v. Henry, 21 Wash. 235, 57 Pac. 811, the court said:

"It would seem that, under the homestead laws, residence and improvement are required as conditions precedent to the grant of the title. It is evidence that equities attach upon such settlement and improvement which entitle the settler to the continued possession and ultimate title. A consideration of the authorities from those states in which the community property law exists seems to establish the principle: 'If either spouse before the marriage has acquired an equitable right to property, which is perfected after marriage, the property is separate.' There is, perhaps, considerable uncertainty as to a uniform rule concerning the right of the community to reimbursement out of the separate estate of the spouses benefited, for expenditures of money and time and effort made in performing conditions and perfecting and completing the title. But the rule also seems to prevail in favor of the community as to the title initiated during the community, and perfected after the dissolution of the marriage. In the first case, the title takes effect as of time before the community, and the property is therefore separate; and in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the other as of a time during the community, and is therefore community property."

So, in Welder v. Lambert, 91 Tex. 510, 44 S. W. 281, the court said: "Power was single when it [the contract for the lands] was entered into, and the right to earn the lands acquired by it was his separate property. The title relates to its origin, and must take the impress of its character from it."

And in Re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 Pac. 568, the court said: "The land in controversy was not community property at the date when the deceased made and recorded her declaration claiming the same as a homestead, but it was the separate property of the petitioner. The petitioner had, before his marriage, made application to enter the land as a homestead under the laws of the United States; and although he had not, at the time of such marriage, fully completed the term for which he was to reside upon and cultivate it, so as to entitle him to receive a patent therefor from the United States, still he had fully performed all of the conditions required of him by such laws up to that date, and by his prior acts of entry, residence, and cultivation, he had acquired an equitable interest in the land, which, of course, was his separate property, and to which the legal title afterwards conveyed by the patent related; and that which was before separate property, to which he had but an equitable title, was, after the issuance of such patent, still his separate property, and held by him under the legal title conveyed by such patent."

A woman's interest in a headright certificate issued after her second marriage to the heirs of her first husband becomes her separate property. Laufer v. Powell, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 604, 71 S. W. 549.

The filing of another application during the existence of the marriage, for the land in question, together with an additional tract, does not deprive the land of its character as separate property, where the first application was filed before the marriage. Gardner v. Burkhardt, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 590, 23 S. W. 709.

In Akin v. Jefferson, 65 Tex. 137, where a man before marriage purchased certain lands with his own money, and after marriage, by money out of the community funds, compromised a suit brought against having parted with the title acquired by him under the homestead patent.

Letters of administration on Peter Teynor's estate were issued out of the superior court of the county in which the land is situated to John A. Willis, the father of the appellant Chloe Heible. The administrator performed the duties of his trust, and on October 26, 1908, filed his final account with the estate, together with a petition asking for the distribution of the property thereof, praying that his account be settled and allowed, and that the estate be distributed to those lawfully entitled thereto. The court, sitting in probate, entertained the petition and made an order, dated as of the date on which the petition was filed, appointing November 16, 1906, as the time for hearing the petition, further ordering that the clerk of the court give notice thereof by causing notices to be posted in three of the most public places in the county in which the land is situated "at least two weeks before said day of settlement and hearing of petition, and publish notice thereof, according to law, for two weeks before said day of settlement and hearing upon the petition" in a certain designated newspaper. Proof by affidavit was made of the posting and publishing by the

him for the land, the court said that if, by the original purchase, he secured a good title, the land was his separate property; but if, by the first purchase, he got no title, and acquired none by limitation before marriage, the lands then became community property.

In most of these cases the land was public land upon which the entry had been made before marriage and the patent granted afterward; but the same rule has been applied where the land was held under contract of sale at the time of the marriage, and the legal title acquired subsequent thereto. Lawson v. Ripley, 17 La. 238; Wade's Succession, 21 La. Ann. 343; Medlenka v. Downing, 59 Tex. 32; Welder v. Lambert, supra.

So, also, the same rule has been applied where one spouse went into adverse possession before marriage, but the limitation period did not expire until after marriage. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Speights, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 59 S. W. 572 (reversed in 94 Tex. 350, 60 S. W. 659, upon the ground that the statute of limitation had been so interrupted as not to give possession); Alford Bros. v. Williams, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 436, 91 S. W. 636. In Sauvage v. Wauhup, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 143 S. W. 259, however, it was held that this rule did not apply to property the sole claim to which was adverse possession, but applied only where the right to land is referred to some legal or equitable claim appearing before marriage. The court does not cite any authorities to the precise point decided. The court said that the Speights Case was not authority, as it had been reversed by the supreme court of the state, and that in the Williams Case a single spouse claimed the land as the assignee of a land certificate; the court, however, in the Williams Case, said that the claim under the land certificate was merely another and distinct ground for the decision.

In a few cases the facts were such as to render the general rule cited above inapplicable.

Thus, the fact that a land certificate was granted to a single man will not cause the land to be his separate property, where he was married before actual location was made. Phillips v. Palmer, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 91, 120 S. W. 911. This decision is based 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

upon the ground that the certificate before location was personal property, and under the express terms of the Texas statute, personal property of the spouses before marriage became common property.

So, mere possession of the land by a partnership of which the husband was a member is not sufficient to overcome the presumption that the land, patents for which were applied for and acquired long after marriage, became community property. Re Boody, 113 Cal. 682, 45 Pac. 858.

And mere possession by a single man, without any title, of lands purchased subsequent to marriage, with common funds, does not make the lands separate property. Johnson v. Johnson, 11 Cal. 200, 70 Am. Dec. 774; Pancoast v. Pancoast, 57 Cal. 320.

So, the mere payment of the surveyors by one of the spouses before marriage will not, however, deprive the land of its character as community property. Mills v. Brown, 69 Tex. 244, 6 S. W. 612.

In Davidson v. Woodward, 84 C. C. A. 495, 156 Fed. 915, writ of certiorari denied in 209 U. S. 547, 52 L. ed. 920, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 758, the general rule was recognized, but held not to apply where a contract for the purchase of certain lots was made before the marriage, but was abandoned, and subsequent to marriage another contract was made, and the property was paid for by community funds.

In Wadkins v. Producers' Oil Co. 130 La. 308, 57 So. 937, affirmed in 227 U. S. 368, 57 L. ed. 551, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 380, the settlement was made before the entryman's marriage, but the marriage and the death of the wife both occurred between the time of the application for the preliminary homestead entry and final proof. In such a case it was held that the land did not fall into the community. The real point at issue in this case, however, was the effect of the dissolution of the community between the time of the preliminary application and the final proof. This is the question discussed in the note to Creamer v. Briscoe, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 154.

In some cases it has been held that the land the initial steps to acquire which were taken by one of the spouses before marriage was separate property, although the money to acquire the final title thereto had been clerk, and on the day fixed for the hearing the court entered a decree in which it approved the final account and distributed the estate. That part of the decree relating to the proof of service of notice of the time of the hearing recited that it appear "to the court by affidavits on file herein that due and regular notice, as required by law and the order of this court, was given of the hearing hereof." The order distributed the whole of the estate to the appellant Chloe Heible as the sole heir at law of Peter Teynor, deceased. In making the order of distribution the probate court proceeded on the theory that the real property was, when acquired from the United States, the community property of Peter Teynor and Chloe Teynor, his wife, and that it descended on the death of Peter Teynor, under the statutes of the state governing the descent and distribution of community real property, to the wife, since the entryman died without issue.

The court in the case now before us, on the same state of facts, held the property to be the separate property of Peter Teynor, and to have descended on his death, under the statutes governing the distribution and descent of separate property, one half to the father and mother of the deceased, and one half to his wife, Chloe Teynor, holding further that the decree of distribution entered in the administration proceedings was void because entered without sufficient notice. The first question suggested by the record relates, therefore, to the nature of the title acquired by Peter Teynor in virtue of his homestead entry. Did the land become, on his acquisition of the title thereto, his separate property, or did it become the community property of himself and his then wife, the appellant in this proceeding?

On the question our own cases are out of harmony. Indeed, they seem incapable of being reconciled, whether considered with relation to the facts upon which they are founded, or with relation to the reasons by which they are thought to be sustained. The cases in which the question of the nature of the title acquired by a homestead entry from the United States is considered are the following: Philbrick v. Andrews, 8 Wash. 7, 35 Pac. 358; Bolton v. La Camas Water Power Co. 10 Wash. 246, 38 Pac. 1043; Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 32 L.R.A. 671, 39 Pac. 229; Forker v. Henry, 21 Wash. 235, 57 Pac. 811; Re Feas, paid out of community funds subsequent to marriage.

Thus, where the pre-emption declaration and exclusive occupation of a woman preceded her marriage, the land becomes her separate property, although the patent was not issued until marriage; and this is so even if the money paid the government was community money, where, with full knowledge of the husband, the land was proved up and paid for in her name. Harris v. Harris, 71 Cal. 314, 12 Pac. 274. The court said: "Even if it appeared that the money was paid out of community funds, the land would be the separate property of the wife. With full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff [the husband], the land was proved up and paid for in her name, and the proof of her occupation and 'declaration,' or affidavit, was as necessary a prerequisite to the acquisition of the government title as was the payment of the price. The patent is a record which proves the facts which preceded its issue, on proof of which the proper officers of the United States were authorized to issue it. For certain purposes, the possession of either spouse is the possession of both. But here the pre-emption declaration and exclusive occupation of the defendant preceded her marriage with the plaintiff, and constitute part of the acts which culminated in the certificate of purchase and patent. The plaintiff ought not to be permitted to ignore her declaration and possession (without proof of which she could not have received the benefits of pre-emption), and treat the acquisition of the government title simply as an ordinary purchase, made after marriage, with com- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

munity funds. Under the pre-emption laws, a woman, after her marriage, may secure a pre-emption based on occupancy, the right to which is her separate property. That was done in this case, and the plaintiff, who seeks to benefit by the transaction, cannot say the pre-emption title was not acquired legally and regularly."

So, land held by an unmarried man under a contract of sale, a part of the consideration of which he had paid, becomes his separate property, although the legal title is not acquired until after marriage, and part of the remaining instalments are paid by the money of his wife, and part by community money. Woodward v. Davidson, 150 Fed. 840.

In the case of Morgan v. Lones, 80 Cal. 317, 22 Pac. 253, it was determined that the occupant of lands for whose benefit the town site acts were passed had an equitable interest in the lands, and, if such occupant is an unmarried woman, and marries, such interest is her separate property; and this is so, although the patent from the government to the municipal authorities has not issued and the husband advanced the funds necessary to get a conveyance from the municipal authorities.

In Louisiana, however, it is the rule that if the property or any part of it is paid for by community money, the community is to be reimbursed to that extent. Barbet v. Langlois, 5 La. Ann. 212; Morgan's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 153.

In the following cases the court held that although the preliminary steps for acquiring the land were taken before marriage, and the title acquired during the existence there-

Schmitt*, 60 Wash. 23, 110 Pac. 635.

Grouping the cases according to their facts, and the decision of the court upon the facts, in the first group can be placed the cases of Philbrick v. Andrews and Re Feas. In these cases all that appeared in the record was that the land was occupied by the entryman and his wife at the time final proof was made and patent issued, and it was assumed, as if not subject to controversy, that the property was the community property of the husband and wife.

In the second group can be placed Forker v. Henry and Rogers v. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. In the first case the land was settled upon and entered as a homestead by a single woman who lived thereon for some four years and then married. Thereafter, while the marriage relation continued, she made final proof and was granted a patent. In Rogers v. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. the land was settled upon and entered by a married man living with his wife. Some two years later, while living on the land, the wife died, leaving issue. A year and a half thereafter the entryman married a second time, and two years after the second marriage made final proofs and received a patent. In each of the cases the land was held to be the separate property of the entryman.

In the third group can be placed Kromer v. Friday; Ahern v. Ahern; James v. James, and Cox v. Tompkinson. In these cases the wife resided upon the land with her husband at the time of its entry, and continued to reside thereon until her death, which occurred in each instance prior to making final proof and the receipt of pat-of, nevertheless the property fell into the community; but, as will be seen, there were peculiar facts in each case which may tend to distinguish them.

In Hawkins v. Stiles, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 1011, the statute provided that any settler on certain lands was entitled to purchase not to exceed 160 acres at 50 cents per acre upon his having the land surveyed and the field notes returned to the General Land Office before a fixed date,—the payment of the 50 cents per acre also to be made before such date. Certain settlers having had their lands surveyed and the field notes duly returned, assigned their interest to an unmarried man, who subsequently married, and then paid the 50 cents per acre out of community funds and received his patents. It was held that under the statute the payment of the 50 cents per acre was an essential part of the inception of the title, and as the payment was made during the community, and out of community funds, the land became community property. The court said: "We are constrained to believe that under this statute no title could be acquired unless its terms were complied with; that three things were essential to obtaining title on the part of the Rawlses, or those who claim under them; to wit, they must have been settlers, they must have had the land surveyed and the field notes returned to the land office, and must, in addition, have paid the purchase money. Without the concurrence of these three elements, no title vested; and the mere surveying and filing of field notes was not the inception or origin of title, as contended by appellees, but furnished, at most, merely a basis for the privilege of purchasing. . . . If the settler saw fit to accept and comply with the terms of the statute within the time prescribed, then it offered to convey the land to him in preference to any other person wishing to purchase. There was not, in advance of such compliance, any right acquired by the settler. . . . It is true that, without the performance of the first two conditions, no preference was even granted; but it is likewise true that, without the paying of the money, no actual right or title vested. Others had the right to buy without such conditions, by merely paying the purchase price, giving the actual settler a mere preference to purchase the tract upon which he settled. A failure to exercise this right of purchase, after performing the first two conditions within the prescribed time, terminated this privilege. Consequently we think no right to the land in question began or sprang into existence until all three of the conditions were complied with; and therefore all these requirements, in our judgment, were conditions precedent to the vesting of title in the Rawlses or their transferees."

Under the principle that the doctrine of relation is a fiction of law adopted by the courts solely for the purpose of justice, it was held in Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 32 L.R.A. 671, 39 Pac. 229, that a patent for homestead land will not relate back to the time of making final proof, so as to cut out the rights of a woman under a marriage ceremony performed between the two dates, where, long prior to final proof, she had been living with the claimant as his wife.

W. M. G.

ent, although occurring after the full period of residence required by the Federal statute as preliminary to making final proof had expired. The property acquired was held to be community property.

In the fourth group can be placed Bolton v. La Camas Water Power Co. and Cunningham v. Krutz. In the first of these cases the wife resided on the land from the time of its entry by the husband until the residence period expired, but died before the making of final proof and the issuance of patent. In the second case the entry was made by a married man living with his wife. The wife died some three years later, after a continuous residence on the land subsequent to the entry. A few months later the husband commuted the entry and received a patent for the land. The property was held in each case to be the separate property of the husband.

In the fifth group can be placed Curry v. Wilson, 45 Wash. 19, 87 Pac. 1065; Curry v. Wilson, 57 Wash. 509, 107 Pac. 367; Krieg v. Lewis, and Eckert v. Schmitt. In these cases the wife resided with the husband on the homestead from the time of the original entry until after the making of final proof, and in two of them until after patent was issued. The land acquired was held to be the community property of the spouses.

In the sixth group can be placed the cases of Towner v. Rodegeb; Hall v. Hall; and Delacey v. Commercial Trust Co. In the first case the land was settled upon prior to the extension of the public surveys thereover, and prior to the time the land was subject to entry under the public land laws. The settler died before the land became so subject to entry, and it was held that he had no estate of inheritance therein or estate of any kind that was cognizable in proceedings instituted on his estate in the probate court. In Hall v. Hall the parties thereto, while husband and wife, settled upon unsurveyed lands of the United States, and lived thereon together as husband and wife for a period of more than five years. Prior to the time the lands were open to entry they were divorced, and subsequent to the divorce the lands became subject to entry, and the husband entered the same as a homestead, and subsequent thereto made final proofs and received a patent. It was held that his divorced wife had no interest in the property. In Delacey v. Commercial Trust Co. it was held that a mere settlement on government land by a husband and wife conferred no community interest in the land.

several conclusions we shall not set forth. It is manifest, however, that no reasoning based upon principle can reconcile the first with the second group, or the third with the fourth. It is the opinion of the court now that the property in each of these groups, if nothing more appeared in the record than is shown in the opinion, should have been held to be the separate property of the entryman. In other words, the rule should be that, in all cases where the marital relation does not exist at the time of the original settlement and entry, and continue until final proof is made, the property should be held to be the separate property of the spouse who finally acquires the patent to the land. The folly of any other rule is illustrated by the case of Rogers v. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. 48 Wash. 19, 92 Pac. 774, 85 Pac. 1014. This case we have placed in the second group, but it belongs under its facts in the fourth group also. In that case it will be remembered that the entryman was married at the time he made entry on the land; that his then wife died, leaving issue, some two years later, after a continuous residence thereon; that about a year later the entryman married a second time, resided with his second wife on the property for some two years more, and made final proof and received a patent. If a community interest is impressed on the land by the fact of marriage at the time of its entry, as is held in the fourth group of cases, and if a community interest is also impressed by the fact of marriage at the time of the making of final proof and the issuance of the patent, as is held in the first group, then this land was impressed with the interests of two distinct communities, the one in favor of the issue of the first wife and the other in favor of the second wife. A rule that leads to such incongruous results is certainly not to be commended.

The facts of the case at bar bring it within the cases found in both the first and second groups of cases as we have listed them; and, since we conclude that the decisions in respect to the first group rather than in the second were wrong in principle, we hold the property in question here to have been the separate property of the husband on its acquisition from the government.

The second question suggested by the record is the validity of the decree of distribution entered in the probate proceedings. This present action is a collateral attack upon the decree, and it is conceded that, unless the record shows affirmatively a want of jurisdiction, it is conclusive upon all the world. We think the record does show affirmatively a want of jurisdiction. The statute relating to decrees of distribution in probate proceedings provides that such decrees may be made on the application of the executor or administrator, or anyone interested in the estate, but only after "notice has been given in the manner required in regard to an application for the sale of land by an executor or administrator." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1589. The statute relating to the sale of real estate by an executor or administrator provides that the court, after the petition for the sale is filed, shall "make an order directing all persons interested to appear at a time and place specified, not less than four nor more than eight weeks from the time of making such order," and that a "copy of such order to show cause shall be personally served on all persons interested in the estate at least ten days before the time appointed for the hearing of the petition, or shall be published at least four successive weeks in such newspaper as the court shall order." Id. §§ 1499, 1500. From an examination of the dates before set out it will be observed that in this instance the time lapsing between the date of the order to show cause and the time fixed for the hearing was only twenty-one days, and that less than three weeks elapsed between the first publication of the order and the time fixed for the hearing. The notice actually shown in the record, therefore, was clearly insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order.

But the appellant says that, since this action is a collateral attack on the decree, all intendments are in favor of its validity, and, since personal service on the persons interested ten days prior to the time fixed for the hearing is made equivalent to published notice, the court will presume, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that such a service was made. But, as we say, we think the record does show on its face to the contrary. The recital in the judgment is that the court finds from the "affidavits on file" that due service was made. As the only affidavits on file, or that were put on file, show service by publication only, the idea of any other service is clearly negatived. "If a want of jurisdiction affirmatively appears upon the face of the . . . record, the judgment will be held to be void upon collateral as well as direct attack." Wick v. Rea, 54 Wash. 424, 103 Pac. 462.

The judgment appealed from will stand affirmed.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Appt.,
v.

W. R. CRAWFORD et al., Respts.

(— Wash. —, 133 Pac. 590.)

Constitutional law — denial of due process — excessive penalty.

Imposing a penalty of a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment of not exceeding one year, or both, for violation of the statute forbidding the exaction of more than 5 cents for one continuous ride on a street car within any city or town, is, although no minimum is prescribed, so excessive as to deny railway companies due process of law.

(July 8, 1913.)

Note. — Excessive penalty as denial of due process of law.

This note deals only with cases where the gist of the objection was the excessiveness of the penalty imposed, to the exclusion of cases where the right to impose any penalty at all was disputed upon the ground that it was discriminatory, or obnoxious to other constitutional objections; e. g., penalties for failure of railroad to pay claims (see note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 102, and other notes there referred to); so the question whether a penalty is obnoxious to the constitutional provision against cruel and unusual punishments is excluded. See on that question, note in 35 L.R.A. 567.

The view taken in STATE v. CRAWFORD, that a penalty (not to exceed one year's imprisonment, or fine not to exceed $1,000, or both) imposed upon a railway company for the violation of a public-service law is so excessive as to deny the railway company due process of law, finds sanction in Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, which holds that a statute providing for the establishment of rates for railroad transportation without giving the corporation an opportunity to be heard, which fixes penalties for disobedience of its provisions by fines so enormous and imprisonment so severe as to intimidate the corporations and their officers from resorting to the courts to test the validity of the rates, is unconstitutional, as depriving the corporations of the equal protection of the laws. The court said: "For disobedience to the freight act the officers, directors, agents, and employees of the company are made guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction may be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not exceeding ninety days. Each violation would be a separate offense. and therefore might result in imprisonment of the various agents of the company who would dare disobey for a term of ninety days each for each offense. Disobedience to the passenger rate act rend-

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County, which reversed a judgment of the County Court, convicting defendants of violating the provision of the public-service law limiting the fares which might be charged for street car service. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. V. Tanner, Attorney General, Stephen V. Carey, Assistant Attorney General, John F. Murphy, and S. H. Steele, for appellant:

The term "penalty," used in the title of the act, is broad enough and specific enough to sustain a criminal prosecution.

The penalties are not excessive.

State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 68 Wash. 160, 123 Pac. 3. Mr. Scott Calhoun for respondents.

ers the party guilty of a felony and subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment in the state prison for a period not exceeding five years, or both fine and imprisonment. The sale of each ticket above the price permitted by the act would be a violation thereof. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for the company to obtain officers, agents, or employees willing to carry on its affairs except in obedience to the act and orders in question. The company itself would also, in case of disobedience, be liable to the immense fines provided for in violating orders of the commission. The company in order to test the validity of the acts, must find some agent or employee to disobey them at the risk stated. The necessary effect and result of such legislation must be to preclude a resort to the courts (either state or Federal) for the purpose of testing its validity. The officers and employees could not be expected to disobey any of the provisions of the acts or orders at the risk of such fines and penalties being imposed upon them, in case the court should decide that the law was valid. The result would be a denial of any hearing to the company."

So, in Consolidated Gas Co. v. Mayer, 146 Fed. 150, a gas company is held to be denied due process of law by a statute which makes a charge for gas in excess of the statutory rate a complete defense in an action to collect, and by a statute limiting the charge for gas to a certain rate, and subjecting gas companies to a $1,000 forfeiture for each violation of the act, the penalties being so drastic and ruinous as practically to debar the company from making a test of the law. Same effect on subsequent hearing, 157 Fed. 849, affirmed on this point in 212 U. S. 19, 53 L. ed. 382, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034.

And commenting upon a statute which prescribed similar cumulative penalties for every charge of more than a certain sum per head for yarding cattle, where a few days' violation of the statute by merely charging a higher rate would exhaust the entire value of the property in satisfaction of the penalties incurred, Mr. Justice Brewer, writing the opinion in Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co. (Cotting v. Godard) 183 U. S. 79, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

46 L. ed. 92, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30, says: "A statute (although in terms opening the doors of the courts to a particular litigant) which places upon him as a penalty for a failure to make good his claim or defense a burden so great as to practically intimidate him from asserting that which he believes to be his rights is, when no such penalty is inflicted upon others tantamount to a denial of the equal protection of the laws."

So, penalties of $500, payable to the person aggrieved, for every violation of an act prescribing the maximum rates which railway companies may charge for the carriage of passengers within the state, and fine or imprisonment or both, imposed upon any agent of the company violating the act, are held in Ex parte Wood, 155 Fed. 190, to be so excessive and ruinous as to deny the company due process of law.

In Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061. 116 N. W. 885, a penal clause of a general police regulation of tenement houses was the effect that every person violating the act should be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, should be subject to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $200, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than fifteen days and not more than sixty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and for each day after the first that such violation should continue, such person should be subject to a fine of $10, at the discretion of the court, in addition to that hereinbefore provided. The court, in holding the act unconstitutional, said that where the penal feature of a police regulation is so severe, having regard to the character of the regulation, as to efficiently intimidate property owners from using their property at all for tenements or lodging house purposes, and from resorting to the courts for redress or defense as to their honestly supposed rights, it is highly unreasonable. It is a defiance of the equal protection of the laws, rendering the act void, irrespective of whether its provisions would otherwise be valid.

But penalties of from $100 to $10,000, imposed upon a railway company for failure

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 25 of the public-service commission law (Laws 1911, p. 558) provides: "No street railroad company shall charge, demand, or collect more than 5 cents for one continuous ride within the corporate limits of any city or town. . . ." Section 95 of the act is as follows: "Every officer, agent, or employee of any public-service company, who shall violate or fail to comply with, or who procures, aids, or abets any violation by any public-service company of any provision of this act, or who shall fail to obey, observe, or comply with any order of the commission, or any provision of any order of the commission, or who procures, aids, or abets any such public-service company in its failure to obey, observe, and comply with any such order or provision, shall be guilty of a gross misdemeanor." The Code (Rem. & Bal. § 2267) provides: "Every person convicted of a gross misdemeanor for which no punishment is prescribed in any statute in force at the time of conviction and sentence shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year, or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both." The defendants were prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced in the justice court of Seattle precinct, King county, for an alleged violation of the provisions of § 25 of the public-service commission law. The charge is that the defendants, being the officers, employees, agents, and servants of the Seattle, Renton, & Southern or refusal to obey an order made by a state railroad commission, fixing reasonable rates, are, in Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Campbell, 173 Fed. 937, held not to be so excessive as to deny the company the equal protection of the laws. The court, commenting upon Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, stated that the statutes involved in that case differed so widely from the Oregon statutes involved here, in the severity of the penalties prescribed, as to render the Young Case not authoritative in this case.

So, where an act to establish minimum rates for the transportation of crude oil and the products thereof, and to forbid rebates, imposed upon the common carrier for a violation of the act penalties of $500, payable to the person injured, together with a reasonable attorney's fee, and made the giving of rebates a misdemeanor punishable by fine and forfeiture of the right to do business, it was held in Tucker v. Missouri P. R. Co. 82 Kan. 222, 108 Pac. 89, that the penalties prescribed by the act in question were not so oppressive that their natural effect would be to intimidate carriers from resorting to the courts to test its validity. The court, in speaking of Ex parte Young, supra, said: "Compared with the drastic penalties prescribed by the legislature of the state of Minnesota, those of the Kansas statute are mild indeed. The latter are not imposed upon officers, agents, or employees; they affect the corporation only, are merely pecuniary, and are neither extravagant nor unreasonable."

In State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 68 Wash. 160, 123 Pac. 3, it is held that the Washington Railroad Commission act which imposes upon a railroad company penalties for failure to comply with orders of the commission for furnishing additional facilities cannot be held unconstitutional, as contravening the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, in that the penalties are excessive, since, as stated by the Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon a similar contention in Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Emmons, 149 U. S. 364-367, 37 L. ed. 769-771, 13 Sup. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ct. Rep. 870: "The answer to this is that there is no inhibition upon a state to impose such penalties for disregard of its police regulations as will insure prompt obedience to their requirements. . . . And the extent of the penalties which should be imposed by the state for any disregard of its legislation in that respect is a matter entirely within its control."

If the penalties are imposed for the violation of an order passed after notice and an opportunity for a hearing, it cannot be said that the parties affected have been denied due process of law. Thus, it was held in Wadley Southern R. Co. v. State, 137 Ga. 497, 73 S. E. 741, that a state statute which confers on a railroad commission the power to require railroads to afford the usual and like customary facilities for interchange of freight to patrons of each and all routes or lines alike, and to make just and reasonable rules for preventing unjust discrimination, and provides for notice and an opportunity of a hearing of the railroad company thereby affected by any order of the commission, and for a violation of an order of the commission, imposes a penalty on the corporation in a sum not to exceed $5,000, at the discretion of the trial judge, and also subjects any person violating or abetting the violation of the order to punishment for a misdemeanor, does not offend the constitutional guaranty of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws, in that the railroad thereby affected is prevented from testing the validity of the statute or the order of the railroad commission because of excessive penalties. The court said: "The distinction is obvious between a case where the statute imposes a penalty for disobedience to an order of the commission, made after notice and an opportunity to be heard, and the case of a statute which imposes serious and heavy penalties for its violation, where the validity of the statute depends upon the existence of facts and their effect, which can only be determined after an investigation of a most complicated and technical character. An illustration of the latter case may be found in Ex parte Young, supra."

J. D. C.

Railway Company, a railway corporation operating a street railway within the corporate limits of the city of Seattle, unlawfully charged and collected from the complaining witness a 10-cent fare for one continuous ride within the corporate limits of the city. Upon appeal to the superior court a demurrer to the complaint was sustained. The state prosecutes an appeal.

The point urged by the respondents in support of the judgment is that the railway company is, by the terms of the statute, denied the equal protection of the law, and that its property is liable to be taken without due process of law, because it may only have a hearing upon a claim of the unconstitutionality of the statute, at the risk, if mistaken, of being subjected to such heavy and successive penalties as to practically foreclose it of the right to litigate that question. This view has received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764. A like principle was announced in Ex parte Wood (C. C.) 155 Fed. 190.

In the Young Case certain stockholders of the Northern Pacific Railway Company brought suit in the Federal court against the company, the members of the State Railroad and Warehouse Commission, and the attorney general of the state of Minnesota. The object of the suit was to prevent compliance with the provisions of certain acts of the legislature of the state of Minnesota and certain orders of the State Railroad and Warehouse Commission, prescribing the rates which should be charged for transportation of passengers and commodities upon railroads within the state. The bill, among other things, prayed that the attorney general and the members of the commission be enjoined from enforcing the provisions of the several acts. The court gave a temporary restraining order as prayed for. On the next day the state, on the relation of its attorney general, commenced an action in the state court against the railway company, the object of which was to compel the company to put into effect the rates and charges fixed by the laws of the state. Thereupon, and in response to a rule to show cause why he should not be punished as for contempt, the attorney general, after a hearing, was held to be in contempt of the Federal court, out of which the temporary restraining order had issued. He thereupon sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the Federal Supreme Court. In discussing the effect of extreme and cumulative penalties in the several legislative acts, the court said: "It may therefore be said that when the penalties for disobedience are by fines so enormous and imprisonment so severe as to intimidate the company and its officers from resorting to the courts to test the validity of the legislation, the result is the same as if the law in terms prohibited the company from seeking judicial construction of laws which deeply affect its rights. It is urged that there is no principle upon which to base the claim that a person is entitled to disobey a statute at least once, for the purpose of testing its validity, without subjecting himself to the penalties for disobedience provided by the statute in case it is valid. This is not an accurate statement of the case. Ordinarily a law creating offenses in the nature of misdemeanors or felonies relates to a subject over which the jurisdiction of the legislature is complete in any event. In the case, however, of the establishment of certain rates without any hearing, the validity of such rates necessarily depends upon whether they are high enough to permit at least some return upon the investment (how much it is not now necessary to state), and an inquiry as to that fact is a proper subject of judicial investigation. If it turns out that the rates are too low for that purpose, then they are illegal. Now, to impose upon a party interested the burden of obtaining a judicial decision of such a question (no prior hearing having ever been given) only upon the condition that, if unsuccessful, he must suffer imprisonment and pay fines, as provided in these acts, is, in effect, to close up all approaches to the courts, and thus prevent any hearing upon the question whether the rates as provided by the acts are not too low, and therefore invalid. The distinction is obvious between a case where the validity of the act depends upon the existence of a fact which can be determined only after investigation of a very complicated and technical character, and the ordinary case of a statute upon a subject requiring no such investigation, and over which the jurisdiction of the legislature is complete in any event. We hold, therefore, that the provisions of the acts relating to the enforcement of the rates, either for freight or passengers, by imposing such enormous fines and possible imprisonment as a result of an unsuccessful effort to test the validity of the laws themselves, are unconstitutional on their face, without regard to the question of the insufficiency of those rates."

The fine to be imposed under the Minnesota statute was heavier than that provided by our statute, but the principle is the same. Here the penalty is "punishment by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year, or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both." It is apparent that in the operation of a street railway in the city of Seattle, the officers and agents of the operating company might violate the statute 1,000 times, or perhaps many thousand times each day, and in each instance would subject themselves to the penalty of the law.

The attorney general argues that the statute gives the courts a wide discretion in the matter of punishment, and that they are permitted to impose a fine as low as 1 cent and to impose a jail sentence as short as one hour. This is true, but it is also true that their discretion would permit the maximum sentence. As an illustration of the practical working of the act, it seems proper to observe that the justice court imposed a sentence of thirty days' imprisonment in the King county jail.

The attorney general cites State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 68 Wash. 160, 123 Pac. 3, and insists that it announces a view that sustains the constitutionality of the law. In that case, after a full hearing upon the merits, the railway company appearing by counsel, the commission entered an order requiring the railway company to erect a suitable station at Hay and Whitman county, for the accommodation of passengers and freight, the same to be completed within forty-five days after the service of the order. The time for complying with the order expired on September 24, 1909, but the station was not completed until the 11th day of January following. The railroad company did not seek a review of the order within the time prescribed by law, or at all; hence, under the statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 8629) the order became "final and conclusive." The suit was for a recovery of a penalty for noncompliance with the order, and a judgment was entered for $1,000. In the discussion of the case the court said that the railroad company appeared at the hearing, submitted its testimony, and raised no question as to the sufficiency of the complaint or the jurisdiction of the commission under the complaint to make an investigation of its station facilities at Hay. It was held that the proceeding was regular, that the commission had jurisdiction, and that the railroad company having failed to review the order as it was permitted to do under the statute, the order became, in the language of the statute, "final and conclusive." The distinction is obvious. The necessity for the station had been legally adjudged, and the penalty was imposed under the statute because of the failure of the railroad company to obey the order. This distinction was recognized by Mr. Justice Brewer in Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co. (Cotting v. Godard) 183 U. S. 79, 46 L. ed. 92, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30, where 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) he said: "It is doubtless true that the state may impose penalties such as will tend to compel obedience to its mandates by all, individuals or corporations; and if extreme or cumulative penalties are imposed only after there has been a final determination of the validity of the statute, the question would be very different from that here presented."

The view we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary to consider the other questions discussed by counsel.

The judgment is affirmed.

(— Wash. —, 134 Pac. 480.)

Bills and notes — alteration — reducing amount payable — effect.

1. Indorsing upon a note before negotiations of a fictitious payment for the purpose of reducing its amount is within the provision of the negotiable instruments act, which avoids a note in favor of non-assenting parties in case of a material alteration which is defined to be inter alia a change in the sum payable.

Same — execution — time occurs.

2. An indorsement of a fictitious payment on the back of a note to reduce it to the amount which the discounting bank is willing to advance upon it occurs before execution of the note, for the purpose of determining its effects upon the instrument.

Same — holder in due course — bank directing alterations.

3. A bank which directs the indorsement of a fictitious payment upon a note to reduce it to the amount which it is willing to advance upon it before discounting it is not a holder in due course, so as not to be affected by the alteration, under the negotiable instruments act.

Note. — Indorsement of payment on bill or note as a material alteration.

In Johnston v. May, 76 Ind. 203, where a note signed by a maker and surety was left in the hands of the maker to deliver to the payee, and at the time of delivery a fictitious credit was indorsed on the note, the indorsement was held such a material alteration

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bogle, Groves, Merritt, & Bogle, for appellant:

The alteration, in order to be material, must vary the original legal effect and operation of the note made by a party to the contract, without the express or implied consent of some other party to the contract.

2 Cyc. 142.

The indorsement, having been made subsequent to its execution by makers, is no part of the note itself, and does not, therefore, change the "sum payable," within the meaning of the statute, so as to constitute a material alteration.

1 Randolph, Com. Paper, 300, 301; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 1396; Hakes v. Russ, as to release the surety; and this is the view taken in WASHINGTON FINANCE CORP. v. GLASS.

In the Johnston Case it was said that the fact that the indorsement reduced the amount for which the surety could be held liable did not prevent the alteration from being regarded as a material one, the criterion for determining the materiality of an alteration being whether the note sued upon is the same as that executed by the surety.

On the contrary, where a note was executed by a principal maker and a surety, and left in possession of the principal maker with the understanding that it was to be delivered to the payee therein as evidence of the purchase price of cattle, and the principal maker purchased other cattle, giving in payment thereof the note in question, and indorsed thereon as a credit the difference in the purchase price of the cattle, the indorsement of the credit is not such an alteration as will discharge the surety. Laub v. Rudd, 37 Iowa, 617. "This indorsement," says the court, "effects no change upon the face of the note. It is the same note as respects date, amount, payee, and time of payment as before. If the note had been negotiated and after that (the amount of the indorsement) had been credited thereon, no one would claim that such an alteration had been made as would discharge the surety. The effect is just the same when the credit is indorsed at the time of negotiation."

The mere indorsement of a credit on a joint and several note was held not to be a material alteration of the same in Hakes v. Russ, 99 C. C. A. 327, 175 Fed. 751; but in this case, where, in the sale of a horse to a number of persons, the vendor agreed to obtain the signature of a certain number of persons to the note, but, instead, accepted cash payment from some of them and indorsed the amounts received on the note, relieving them from signing the joint and several obligation for the purchase price, the failure to have the note signed by all the purchasers according to the agreement with each of those who did sign was held to be a material change in the contract.

No matter what the discount, appellant could have recovered the full amount of the note from the makers, in the absence of any showing of bad faith on their part.

In Hawkins v. Humble, 5 Coldw. 531, where a promissory note was given for the hire of a slave, and before the period of hiring expired the slave returned to his former owner and there remained, and the hirer and owner compromised the matter without the knowledge or consent of the surety on the note, and entered a credit on the note for the amount the hire was reduced on account of the slave's return, it was held there could be no recovery on the note against the surety. The slave having returned to his owner, there could be no recovery on the obligation for his services except on a new contract under the law of this state; and it was held that it was not competent for the principal debtor to waive his legal rights under the original contract and decline to take advantage of the forfeiture so as to bind the surety, nothing is said as to the indorsement being a material alteration, but the case is decided on the ground above stated.

As between the parties, the striking out of the word "forty" from an amount in a note for $840, and an indorsement on the back of the note, to the effect that "this note changed to $800—$40 advanced October 12, '99. G. G. November 2, '99," which indorsement was made by the payee after a partial payment thereof by the maker, who instructed the payee to indorse the amount on the note as interest, but, instead, indorsement was made as above stated,—is not a material alteration. Whitehead v. Emmerich, 38 Colo. 13, 87 Pac. 790.

In the following cases there was not an indorsement of payment on the note, but another method of effecting the same result was used:

In State Solicitors' Co. v. Savage, 39 Fla. 703, 23 So. 413, the owners of real estate

Mr. W. W. Felger, for respondents:

The note in this case was materially altered without the knowledge or consent of the respondents Stokes and wife, and such alteration vitiated the note as to them.

executed a mortgage thereon to secure a note executed by a third person for $1,500. In negotiating the note, the payee, being unable to negotiate it for the full value, obtained $1,000 thereon and placed on the face of the note, below the signature, an indorsement to the bank discounting it, followed by the statement that "the said principal sum being reduced to $1,000," and also indorsed a statement of like effect on the mortgage. This was held not to be a material alteration of the note, the court stating: "There has been no change in the original physical form of the note by erasure or interlineation; and while it may be conceded that a note may be altered by indorsements or memoranda thereon without disturbing its physical appearance . . . yet if the memoranda or indorsements do not have the legal effect to alter the legal import and operation of the note, but express a new, distinct, and collateral agreement between the payee and principal named therein, it will only be evidence of the new agreement intended, and it cannot be said that the note, the evidence of the prior agreement, was thereby altered. . . . This was not an alteration of the note, but in legal effect a credit of $500 on it."

The court further said that it was not contended that the new or collateral agreement was detrimental in any way to the mortgagors.

Where an accommodation note for $2,500 is indorsed by the payee, with a direction to the cashier of the bank at which it is made payable to "pay on within $750," the note was held in Douglass v. Wilkinson, 17 Wend. 431, affirmed in 22 Wend. 559, to be a valid obligation for $750.

In Merchants' & M. Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373, where a joint accommodation note signed by several parties for $6,000 was, without the knowledge of the sureties, discounted at a bank for $4,000, the cashier indorsing upon the note "discounted for $4, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

000, and should be so read," such indorsement was held not to invalidate the note, since this was equivalent to the bank's paying the full amount of the note and immediately receiving back the difference.

On the contrary it has been held where an accommodation note for $3,000 is executed and placed in the hands of one of the parties, who discounts it at a bank—which had knowledge of the relation sustained to the note by the surety—for $2,000, the cashier writing across the face of the note, "this note was discounted for $2,000, which amount is due upon it," the note as a contract to pay $3,000 never had any legal existence or vitality; and as the surety never assented to the change wrought in the character and legal effect of the note, he is not bound to pay it as a note for $2,000, and is relieved from the contract by the alteration. Portage County Branch Bank v. Lane, 8 Ohio St. 405.

The court in this case holds that the original contract never became a valid and binding agreement, and therefore it was not necessary to determine what would have been the effect of a modification of the agreement reducing the amount for which the surety was liable; for, says the court, the proposition of the surety for a loan of the original amount "was never accepted by the plaintiff, nor any modification of that proposition ever assented to by Lane (the surety); the paper never had as against him any legal vitality, and to hold him liable thereon for any amount, or for the money actually loaned by the plaintiff, would be to create a liability of a surety by mere implication, which all the authorities forbid."

As to memorandum on back of note at the time of execution as substantive part thereof, see note to Kurth v. Farmers' & M. State Bank, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 612.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant Glass solicited the defendants Stokes and wife to join him and his wife as makers of a promissory note for the sum of $15,000. Stokes and wife agreed to do so upon condition that he would secure the signatures of W. A. Ridgway and wife and William Houston and wife. This Glass agreed to do, and the note was accordingly signed by Stokes and wife. No effort was made, so far as the record shows, to secure the other names. The note was turned over to Ridgway to negotiate for the benefit of Glass. At the time the note was executed it was not known where or of whom the money could be obtained, and the space provided for the name of the payee was left blank. Ridgway took the note to the Spokane & Eastern Trust Company, at Spokane, and endeavored to obtain a loan in the sum of $15,000. At first the negotiations hung on the question of discount; the bank demanding the sum of $1,000. For reasons, which to the bank seemed sufficient, coupled with the possible reason that Ridgway refused to guarantee the loan for more than $11,000, the bank finally refused to loan more than $11,000, subject to a discount in the same proportion, or eleven fifteenths of $1,000. The bank then filled in the name of Ridgway as payee, and had him indorse the note in blank, and took a personal guaranty of its payment. It then paid him the sum of $10,240.14, being $11,000 less the agreed discount. To make the note conform to the contract made with Ridgway, the bank indorsed a payment of $4,000 on the back of the note. Ridgway paid the proceeds of the note to Glass. The defendants Stokes and wife have never ratified the changes made in their contract. The note was not paid when due, and this suit was brought to compel payment. The defendants Stokes and wife have set up several defenses; only one of which will be noticed by us; i. e., a material alteration. The court found that there was a material alteration of the note, and defendants Stokes and wife were absolved of all liability. A judgment was rendered in their favor. Plaintiff has appealed.

It is the contention of the appellant that the judgment is ill founded in law, for the reasons that the alteration is not material, in that it reduced the amount to be paid, and was therefore for the benefit of the makers, that an indorsement of a payment on the back of an instrument is not an alteration within the meaning of the statute, and that the alteration, if any, was made before the note was executed, and hence is not within the prohibition of the negotiable instruments act. That act provides:

"Where a negotiable instrument is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable thereon, it is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorized, or assented to the alteration, and subsequent indorsers. But when an instrument has been materially altered and is in the hands of a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor." § 3514, Rem. & Bal. Code.

"Any alteration which changes—(1) the date; (2) the sum payable, either for principal or interest; (3) the time or place of payment; (4) the number or the relations of the parties; (5) the medium or currency in which payment is to be made; or which adds a place of payment where no place of payment is specified, or any other change or addition which alters the effect of the instrument in any respect, is a material alteration." § 3515, Rem. & Bal. Code.

We had occasion to discuss these sections in the case of Handsaker v. Pedersen, 71 Wash. 218, 128 Pac. 230. There, as here, the instrument did not find favor in the current of trade, and to meet the demands of the bank to which the note was offered, other names were added as makers. We held that this was a material alteration within the meaning of the statute. It was insisted that Pedersen should not be heard to make the defense of material alteration, for the reason that the change was for his benefit, in that the addition of other names as makers tended to reduce pro tanto his primary liability. We contented ourselves with quoting the statute, which seemed too plain for discussion, and by reference to Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, §§ 1375 and 1387.

Whatever comfort may be extracted from the older authorities, we are quite clear that it was the purpose of the negotiable instruments act to avoid and make impossible just such a situation as is presented in this case. There was a purpose in the adoption of the negotiable instruments act, declared in the propaganda which preceded its adoption, and manifested in the act itself, and that is that all cases arising under it should, if possible, be decided by reference to it, and not by reference to any equities existing between the parties. It may be in a given case that an indorsement of a payment would be for the benefit of a surety or an accommodation maker. In another case it might work his destruction. So, too the addition of another name as a maker, or the extension of the time of payment, would theoretically be for the benefit of the surety or accommodation maker, but the law regards not the purpose or the effect of the change. Handsaker v. Pedersen, supra; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1375. It is enough that, whether advantageous or not, the change results in a contract upon which the minds of all parties have not met. Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall. 82, 18 L. ed. 727. The statute cannot be read in any other way. Therefore, in order to avoid such contingencies, the negotiable instruments act was drawn, and when adopted displaces the law merchant, which had become, through the mediumship of hard cases, saturated with permissible causes of action and defenses of an equitable nature. In his first criticism of the proposed law (14 Harvard L. Rev. 241), Professor Ames, dean of the Harvard Law School, admits this virtue. "Especially to be commended are those sections of the new Code which settle, and in the right way, certain questions which have been a prolific source of litigation and antagonistic decisions." See, generally, the reprint of Ames-Brewster controversy, Brannan, Negotiable Instruments Law, 2d ed. p. 162 et seq.

There is no ambiguity or doubt in the statute we have quoted. It says a change of the sum payable is a material alteration, and to put its intent beyond the cavil of a doubt it was provided that any "change or addition which alters the effect of the instrument in any respect is a material alteration." This view makes it unnecessary to go beyond the statute, or to discuss the many admittedly conflicting authorities on alterations of instruments under the law merchant.

But it is said that an indorsement of a payment on the back of an instrument is not a material alteration; that the statute 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

is intended to cover only such changes as touch the face of the instrument. Whether an indorsement, made in good faith after the instrument has been given currency, would be a material alteration we are not called upon to decide. We are quite clear, however, that the indorsement of a fictitious payment as a condition precedent to the acceptance, negotiation, discount, or delivery of a note to the original payee or lender of the money, changes "the effect of the instrument, . . ." as well as the sum payable, and is an act proscribed by the statute. It must be borne in mind that the bank never intended to loan $15,000. It did not loan $15,000. No money was paid in excess of $10,240.14, nor was any sum actually paid in good faith, or at all, to be indorsed on the note. The whole transaction, in so far as the contract pretends to deal with any sum in excess of $10,240.14, is a fabrication. There are reasons for holding a fictitious payment to be a material alteration. All of them are referable to the principle that a person has a right to make his own contracts. The law, as we now have it, was not drawn solely with reference to the right of the payee of a note. There is nothing sacred in a contract drawn in the form of a promissory note. A payee or holder is not permitted to recover on his part of a contract alone, nor can he insist that the law make a contract for him, or the other contracting party. He must recover upon the contract made by his adversary, and if the instrument has been so changed that it does not voice the original will of the maker, there can be no recovery. A case in point is that of Johnston v. May, 76 Ind. 293. There had been an indorsement of a fictitious credit. The court said: "We need not argue, for the purpose of showing that such an alteration of the note was a material alteration, for that is manifest; and the facts found by the court show that this alteration was made in the absence and without the authority of the appellee, and without his knowledge or consent, by the principal in the note and the payee thereof, or one of them, before or at the time of its delivery. Under the decisions of this court such an alteration will vitiate and avoid the note, and prevent a recovery thereon from the appellee. Holland v. Hatch, 11 Ind. 497, 71 Am. Dec. 363; Schnewind v. Hackett, 54 Ind. 248; Collier v. Waugh, 64 Ind. 456; McCoy v. Lockwood, 71 Ind. 319; Dietz v. Harder, 72 Ind. 208. It may be said, however, that the effect of the alteration of the note, in this case, was to reduce its amount and diminish the appellee's liability, and therefore he ought not to be heard to complain of such an alteration. In the case of Coburn v. Webb, 56 Ind. 96, 26 Am. Rep. 15, the effect of the alteration of the note in suit was the same as in the case now before us, to diminish the amount of the surety's liability, and the same point seems to have been made in that case as the one now under consideration. Upon that point, in the case cited, this court said: 'This change of the note did not, perhaps, operate to the prejudice of Coburn. But that is not the legal criterion by which to determine whether an alteration of a note destroys it. The question is, Is the note sued upon the same note, in legal effect, as that signed by Coburn? If the alteration made the note a different one in legal effect, then it is not Coburn's note, and he is not bound by it. These views are fully sustained by the current of authorities in this state and elsewhere.' This case meets the first two propositions advanced by counsel, and we can safely rest our decision of them upon it, and the Handsaker Case, and the authorities therein cited. We have not overlooked the insistence of counsel that the Indiana case is substantially overruled in later cases, but we do not so read the books. In Meeker v. Shanks, 112 Ind. 207, 13 N. E. 712, it was held that the name of the payee might be changed without avoiding the contract of an accommodation maker, on the theory that "it was immaterial to the surety who advanced the money, so that the person for whose accommodation he signed obtained the benefit of it." It is enough to say that the alteration here complained of was not discussed. The authority of Johnston v. May was not denied. Holthouse v. State, — Ind. App. —, 97 N. E. 130, was a case on a contractor's bond, and was decided with reference to the general rules of the law. The negotiable instruments act was in no way involved. It was not relied on by counsel, or considered by the court. The case of Merchants' & M. Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373, should be mentioned. This case is seemingly in point, and is relied on by appellant. A note for $6,000 was signed by seven people, one of whom was the principal maker. The bank discounted the paper for $4,000 only, and the cashier indorsed upon it at the time, "Discounted for $4,000, and should be so read." Upon suit brought it was held that, "the original transaction, in its legal effect, amounted to a loan of $6,000 to all the makers of the note, and a payment thereon forthwith of $2,000, which, in effect, was credited at the time upon the note by the indorsement, which the cashier at once made upon it." And "the fact that $4,000 only, instead of $6,000, was loaned without the consent of some of the makers of the note, who were sureties, does not vitiate the note; for the party who received the money, had he received in cash the $6,000, would have had a perfect right, without the consent of his sureties, to have paid back at once $2,000 to the bank." This case stands alone so far as we have been able to trace the decisions. It is not cited or commented on by any of the prominent text-writers. In our judgment it is not sound when applied to the state of facts there occurring. We have no doubt an actual bona fide transaction would be upheld by the court. It was not so in that case; neither is it so in this. In the instant case, if the bank took the paper at its face, and Glass, for whose benefit the note was discounted, had thereafter found that he did not need the full $15,000, and had repaid the $4,000, there could be no doubt of the right to recover. There would have been a loan and a repayment. The case shows no such state of facts. The payment, if it can be so called, was a fiction. The fault of the West Virginia case lies in this: The court assumes that the legal effect of the transaction amounted to a loan of $6,000 and a payment forthwith of $2,000. This is not true. There can be no loan without credit. The makers of the note never had credit for the $6,000. Therefore there could not be a loan of $6,000 and a payment of $2,000. The object of the note in the present case was to establish a credit for $15,000. If it were not so, respondents might not have signed the note. No such credit was ever established. Whether a transaction of the kind occurring in the two cases is a material alteration depends upon its faith. If the transaction is real, and based upon the full credit of the note, it is not a material alteration; if the credit is simulated, and the indorsement of a payment is a subterfuge, it is.

It is next contended that the indorsement was made after the execution of the note, and therefore forms no part of it (1 Randolph, Com. Paper, pp. 300, 301; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1396; 7 Cyc. 629), and many cases are cited to sustain the proffered issue. Counsel for respondent has cited cases to sustain the contrary of this doctrine. No purpose will be served by reviewing and distinguishing these cases. Counsel for appellant indulges in a learned argument, but it seems to us that they admit their case away when they say: "It is true that words on the back of a note made at the time of or prior to the execution of said note, if they in any way affect the operation of the note, are considered as a material part of the note, and that an alteration of such words would be a material alteration, and that the writing of an indorsement on the back of a note, if made contemporaneous with the note, is considered as a part of the note; but an indorsement made subsequent to the execution of the note is not considered as a part of the note itself."

The real question confronting the court is: When was the note executed? A note is distinguished by its parts and particular requisites. It must be in writing, and signed by the maker or drawer; it must be an unconditional promise to pay a sum certain; and it must be payable to order or bearer. There are certain other requisites not now necessary to enumerate. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 3392. Keeping this section of the statute in mind, it is the law that until a note meets these requirements it is not executed. A note is executed when it is complete in its parts and launched on the current of trade. This note sued on, although signed by certain parties, and in this sense executed by them, was not an executed instrument within the meaning of the law. It was not ready for delivery, nor was it delivered, until the name of the payee was inserted and the indorsement made. "Execution of a note requires both a signature and delivery. In a legal sense the word 'execute' includes delivery, and implies a complete contract." Words & Phrases, Title "Execute." See also Nicholson v. Combs, 90 Ind. 516, 46 Am. Rep. 229; Bagley v. McMickle, 9 Cal. 430. The bank refused to accept or discount the note until the fictitious payment was indorsed upon it. As the note was admittedly indorsed before delivery, and delivery being an essential element of execution, it follows that the change was made before execution, and is therefore material. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1396. We are not called upon to decide what the legal effect of an indorsement after execution would be.

Neither can the plaintiff recover under the provision of the negotiable instruments act, wherein it is provided that when an instrument has been materially altered, and is in the hands of a holder in due course not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 3514. The Spokane & Eastern Trust Company was not a holder in due course. First Nat. Bank v. Barnum (D. C.) 160 Fed. 245. The bank had notice of the infirmity. It was a party to, and participated in, the act of alteration.

Other defenses are urged; but, being satisfied that no recovery can be had for the reasons stated, we will not pursue our inquiry further.

Affirmed.

Subrogation — loan to pay mortgage — want of agreement for.

Agreement that a mortgage shall be kept alive in favor of one who advances money to pay it, and that he shall be subrogated to its lien, is not necessary to effect such subrogation as against the holder of an inferior judgment lien of the existence of which he is ignorant, if he makes the advance with the understanding that the mortgage shall be satisfied and that he shall have a first lien upon the property.

cure subrogation to the liens of certain mortgages which had been satisfied and discharged. Reversed.

Statement by Kirby, J.:

Appellants brought suit for subrogation to the lien of certain mortgagees, whose mortgage debts were paid off by the money loaned by it for the purpose under the agreement that it would be given a first mortgage lien upon the property. J. U. Martin testified that on December 31, 1903, he gave a mortgage upon the lands, and the gin situate thereon, to Hugh Wright for $1,600, and on April 6, 1909, another on the same property to G. E. Yeatman for $800. On the 23d of April, 1909, the appellee company recovered a judgment against him in the Independence circuit court, where the land was situate, which constituted a lien thereon. Martin applied to the Southern Cotton Oil Company to borrow money to pay off the two prior mortgages upon the land and gin, and on the 4th of February, 1910, borrowed from it $2,200, giving a mortgage upon the property to secure same. With this money he paid off both of said mortgage debts, and the mortgages securing them were satisfied of record. There was no agreement that the lien of the mortgages should be kept alive, but Martin told appellee that the money was to be used to pay them off, and that the mortgage securing its payment would be a first lien upon the land; that when he got the money he would pay off the other two, and the

Where the security fails of its purpose because of some defect in its execution, or because of want of authority or capacity in the person executing it.

In Marx v. Clisby, 130 Ala. 502, 30 So. 517, where the executor of a will, who was also made the trustee for the children of the testatrix, wrongfully executed a mortgage upon the trust estate in order to obtain money to pay the debts of the testatrix, it was said that, assuming an absolute want of authority in the trustee to borrow the money, yet he having borrowed and appropriated it to relieving the estate of debt for which it was liable, the lender would be subrogated to the rights of those creditors whose debts were paid out of the money loaned by him.

In Helm v. Lynchburg Trust & Sav. Bank, 106 Va. 603, 56 S. E. 598, it was held that the lender of money upon the security of a deed of trust is, in case the deed of trust proves to have been forged, entitled to be subrogated to the lien of taxes and of a prior valid encumbrance discharged by it out of the proceeds of the loan.

In Otis v. Gregory, 111 Ind. 504, 13 N. E. 39, it was held that one who released a mortgage held by him in order that the owner, who was about to make a sale of the property, might use the amount due him in purchasing property in another state, on which it was agreed that he should have a mortgage when the transaction should be completed, was entitled, upon the mortgage turning out to be invalid because of nonjoinder of the mortgagor's husband, to be subrogated to the lien of the vendor of the purchased property.

In Re Lee, 105 C. C. A. 111, 182 Fed. 579, it was held that where money is loaned in pursuance of an express agreement that it is to be used to discharge an existing encumbrance on the borrower's property, and that the lender is to have the first lien upon the property to secure its payment, and the money is so used, such lender may be subrogated to the rights of the encumbrancer whose debt has been paid, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) not only as against the borrower, but also as against his trustee in bankruptcy, and as against anyone else who subsequently acquires an interest in the property with knowledge of the circumstances under which the money was lent.

In Re Automobile Livery Service Co. 176 Fed. 792, it was held that where at the time certain automobiles were pledged to secure a loan to pay the purchase price, the title to the pledged property was in the maker for his security for the purchase price, the lender, in case the pledge is to be regarded as invalid for want of authority in the officers of the borrower, in the absence of a resolution of its directors, to give the pledge, is entitled, as against the borrower's trustee in bankruptcy, to be subrogated to the lien of the maker of the automobiles to satisfy which the proceeds of the loan were used.

In Scott v. Land, Mortg. Invest. & Agency Co. 127 Ala. 161, 28 So. 709, where money was loaned for the purpose of discharging a vendor's lien, the lender taking a mortgage which turned out to be invalid on account of its being defectively acknowledged and the lands being a homestead, it was held that, there being no intervening equity, the lender was entitled to be subrogated to the vendor's lien.

In Bell v. Bell, 174 Ala. 446, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1205, 56 So. 956, it was held that one who advanced money to pay the purchase price of real estate under an agreement that he should be secured by mortgage was entitled to subrogation to the vendor's lien as against the rights of the wife of the vendee, who did not comply with the statutory requirements in executing the mortgage so as to bind her interest therein.

In Davies v. Pugh, 81 Ark. 253, 99 S. W. 78, one who at the request of a husband advanced money to pay off a mortgage constituting a valid lien on his homestead, and to whom the mortgage and note were delivered by the mortgagee, and who subsequently surrendered the old mortgage and note upon receiving as security a mortgage on the property which purported to be extitle would be cleared up. It was his intention to make it a first lien, and the Cotton Oil Company understood that there were no other encumbrances against the land, after the payment of said mortgages, prior to its own; that it had a first lien by reason of its mortgage, as was intended to be given it upon the loan being made. The Cotton Oil Company had no knowledge in fact of appellee's judgment lien against the property at the time it made loan and took its security. Its representative, who agreed to make the loan, said: "I didn't know there was a judgment against it; I agreed to advance him the $2,200, and understood that the record would be cleared so that our mortgage would be first, and that there wouldn't be anything else against the property in any way; I wouldn't have advanced the money under any other conditions, and the advances being on the condition that our mortgage would be first; I advanced it with the understanding that Martin was to have the existing mortgages satisfied, and give me a mortgage, which I considered would be a first lien." The index to the record of the judgment only showed a judgment against W. R. Rice et al. The chancery court found that there was no agreement, express or implied, between appellant Martin or the older mortgagees that it should be subrogated to their rights under their mortgages, and that it agreed to loan Martin the $2,200, and take a mortgage on the property, believing at the time that it was getting a first lien thereon, and from secured and acknowledged by the husband and wife, but which proved invalid because it was not in fact signed by the wife, was held entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the discharged encumbrance, although he did not show an agreement at the time that he should hold the mortgage as security, since he did in fact hold it, and under all the circumstances such an agreement may fairly be inferred.

In Dixon v. National Loan & Invest. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 541, and Flynt v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 60, 93 S. W. 423, one whose mortgage securing a loan a part of which, by the agreement of the parties, was used to pay a vendor's lien, was invalid by reason of the property being a homestead, was held entitled to subrogation to the rights of the vendor.

But in Davis v. Davis, 81 Vt. 259, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1035, 69 Atl. 876, one who advanced money on request of a husband to pay off a mortgage on certain premises signed by the husband and his wife, taking as security a mortgage signed by the husband alone, was held not to be entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the mortgage discharged as against the wife's claim of homestead. The court said: "It is essential to a right of subrogation independent of agreement that the person making the payment be one who is under some obligation regarding it, or who has some interest to be protected by it. Payment by a stranger at the request of the debtor will not entitle the payer to subrogation unless there was an understanding to that effect."

And in Askew v. Parker, 131 La. 753, 60 So. 233, where a loan, the proceeds of which were used in paying a debt secured by vendor's privilege, was secured by a mortgage the foreclosure of which was resisted on the ground that the property was homestead property, it was held that the lender was not entitled to be subrogated to the vendor's claim; the conditions prescribed by the Code for the taking place of legal subrogation not existing, and there being no conventional subrogation.

the scope of this note, but which may be of interest in the present connection is Murphree v. Clisby, 108 Ala. 339, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933, 52 So. 907, where it is held that one who loaned money to an insane person with which to purchase real estate, without knowledge of the borrower's insanity, taking back a mortgage thereon, was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of his debtor against the vendor, so as to compel the vendor to return the purchase money to him.

Where the security fails because of partial or total want of title in the person giving it.

In Hughes v. Thomas, 131 Wis. 315, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744, 111 N. W. 474, 11 Ann. Cas. 673, it was held that one who advanced money to an executor who was also life tenant of the property, to pay a mortgage executed by the testator, expecting to receive security on the fee, but whose security bound only the life estate, was entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee,—especially where there were no intervening rights, or prejudice worked to anyone.

In Brown v. Hooks, 133 Ga. 345, 65 S. E. 780, it appeared that a decedent devised to his daughter, who was his sole heir at law, a life estate in certain lands, with remainder to her children. The daughter asserted title in fee to the land adversely to the will, contending that the instrument was invalid; and borrowed a sum of money from one who knew of the will, sufficient to pay off the debts of the estate, giving a mortgage and certain personal sureties, whom the lender afterwards voluntarily released, for the repayment of the loan. Subsequently, during the lifetime of the daughter, the mortgage was foreclosed and the land bid in by the mortgagee. The will was afterward duly probated; and the daughter having died, her children brought ejectment. The court adhered to the rule laid down in Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204, 38 S. E. 384, that subrogation will arise only in those cases where the party claiming it advanced the money to pay a debt which in the event of said loan the debts held by Ware and Yeatman should be paid and the mortgages satisfied. The complaint was dismissed for want of equity, and from the decree appellants appeal.

default by the debtor he would be bound to pay, or where he had some interest to protect, or where he advanced the money under an agreement, express or implied, made either with the debtor or creditor, that he would be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor; and held that as against the remaindermen the lender was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of creditors of the estate; and that the fact that the lender was himself a creditor of the estate did not bring him within that class of persons who could be said to have an interest in the estate to protect which it was necessary for him to pay off the decedent's debts. With reference to the conclusion that no equitable subrogation could be implied in the lender's favor from the fact of the payment of the debts of the estate, the court said: "Three important, vital, controlling facts unite in pointing to this conclusion as the only possible one under the evidence in this record and the law applicable to the issues involved: First, while the claims against the estate, as appears from the receipts given or memoranda made upon the accounts and notes, were paid by Brown, he was in fact lending the money to Mrs. Hooks; he became her creditor and she his debtor, and they recognized this relation, as was shown by papers executed by her to secure Brown for the loan made by him. In the second place, this loan was made by Brown to Mrs. Hooks to protect the interest of Mrs. Hooks in the property, as heir at law of V. A. Clegg, and not of the interest which she took under the will,—to aid her in freeing the estate of the deceased from charges against it, and not to protect any interest of the plaintiffs in the present action; for Mrs. Hooks and Brown ignored all possibility of Mrs. Hooks' children, who were remaindermen under the terms of the will of Clegg, having any right whatever in the estate. Mrs. Hooks was claiming adversely to the will, and adversely to any rights that her children might have had under the provisions of the will. Admitting that Mrs. Hooks and Brown acted in good faith, it still 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stands as a fact that their attitude towards the claims of the plaintiffs in this action was one of hostility to their rights and an absolute denial of the existence of those rights. And the third fact to which we have referred as being of vital importance is that, when Brown advanced the money to pay off the debts against the estate, he took not only Mrs. Hooks' obligation to repay, but also took security—and solvent personal surety—upon that same obligation, which subsequently he voluntarily released. Under such a state of facts as this, under the broadest doctrine of subrogation recognized by the decisions of this court, the defendant in the court below was in no position to invoke the application of the doctrine."

In Fife v. Ohio Invest. Co. — Ind. App. —, 100 N. E. 392, where a chattel mortgagee, having removed the mortgaged property to another county without the mortgagor's consent, gave a second mortgage thereon for a loan, a part of which was applied as a partial payment on the debt secured by the first mortgage, it was held that the facts were insufficient to give the second mortgagee the right of subrogation to the first mortgage; the court remarking, however, that had the second mortgagee furnished the money to pay the whole debt secured by the first mortgage and its security failed or proved insufficient, the claim of subrogation would stand on a better foundation.

being of sufficient value to pay both the judgment creditor's claim and the lender's mortgage.

In Brown v. McLean, 18 Ont. Rep. 533, one who had advanced money to pay off existing mortgages, taking a mortgage for the amount in ignorance of an execution against the lands of the mortgagor, which were in the hands of the sheriff at the time, was held entitled, as against the execution creditor, to be subrogated to the rights of the original mortgagees, upon the ground of mistake, he having acted under a belief that he was obtaining a first charge upon the property; and it was further held that he was not disentitled to relief because, by using ordinary care, he might have discovered the existence of the execution, the execution creditor not having been prejudiced thereby.

In Morris v. Bentley, 2 Terr. L. Rep. 253, one who had taken a mortgage in reliance upon a search of the register, which showed only one other encumbrance upon the property, which he caused to be discharged, was held entitled to subrogation to the lien thereof as against another encumbrancer whose mortgage did not appear on the register, but which, having been filed with the registrar who had entered it on the daybook only, would otherwise have been entitled to priority.

So. 57, it appeared that A, whose land had been sold under an execution, borrowed money from B with which to redeem it, giving a mortgage as security for the loan, and on the same day giving another mortgage to C. Subsequently, being unable to pay B's mortgage, A conveyed the property to B. It further appeared that B applied to D for a loan and proposed as security a mortgage on certain lands, including those acquired from A; that D refused to make the loan unless C would declare that she had no interest in said lands and would join in the mortgage, which C accordingly did. Upon the maturity of D's mortgage D applied to E for a loan with which to pay it. E refused to make such loan unless C would declare that she claimed no interest in the lands proposed to be mortgaged as security, and C accordingly did make such declaration. Thereafter B mortgaged the property to the cross complainant for a loan to be used in paying off, so far as it would go, the mortgage previously executed to E, representing in the application for the mortgage that the lender would have a first lien on said lands, and that the balance to E not paid out of the loan would be arranged with B by other securities. The loan was accordingly made and E's mortgage was discharged of record. Upon this state of facts it was held that cross complainant was entitled, as against C, to be subrogated to the lien and rights acquired by B by reason of his having furnished the money with which A redeemed the mortgaged premises from the execution sale but that it had no equity of subrogation, as against C, to the lien of D's mortgage.

Kirby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not contended that there was any express agreement between Martin and appellant that it should be subrogated to the rights of the prior mortgagees upon the payment of their debts out of the money which it loaned for that purpose, but it is insisted that, since it made the loan with the express understanding and agreement that its security upon the property therefor should constitute a first lien, the other mortgage debts having been paid off with its money, it is entitled to subrogation to the rights of said mortgagees, as against the judgment lien of appellee, of which it was ignorant when it made the loan and took its security. It was not a volunteer in the payment of these other mortgage debts; the loan having been negotiated from it by the mortgage debtor for the express purpose of paying them. "One who pays a debt at the instance of the debtor is not a volunteer." Rodman v. Sanders, 44 Ark. 504.

The doctrine of subrogation is an equitable one, having for its basis the doing of complete and perfect justice between the parties without regard to form, and its purpose and objects is the prevention of injustice. Cyc. also says: "And generally where it is equitable that a person, not a mere stranger, intermeddler, or volunteer, furnishing money to pay a debt, should be substituted for or in the place of the creditor, such person will be so substituted." 37 Cyc. 371.

In Chaffe v. Oliver, 39 Ark. 542, this court said: "Subrogation, in its literal and equitable significance, is the demanding of something under the right of another, to which right the claimant is entitled, for the purposes of justice, to be substituted in place of the original holder. Its phases are various, but it preserves its characteristic features throughout. It is the machinery by which the equity of one man is worked out through the legal rights of another. . . . It rests upon the maxim that no one shall be enriched by another's loss, and may be invoked wherever justice and good conscience demand its application, in opposition to the technical rules of law which liberate securities with the extinguishment of the original debt. This equity arises when one not primarily bound to pay a debt, or remove creditors of decedent effecting a sale of the realty in satisfaction of their claims.

In Manks v. Whiteley [1912] 1 Ch. 735, 81 L. J. Ch. N. S. 457, 106 L. T. N. S. 490 [1912] W. N. 87, it appeared that the owner of property charged with two mortgages offered to sell his equity of redemption, without, however, disclosing the existence of the second mortgage. The purchaser accepted conditionally upon finding someone to advance money to pay off the mortgage. A lender was found who agreed to advance a sum of money on first mortgage, and who did advance the sum, which was paid over to the original mortgagee. The transaction being completed by three contemporaneous instruments: (1) a reconveyance by the original mortgagee to the purchaser; (2) a conveyance by the owner to the purchaser; and (3) a mortgage by the purchaser to the lender. It was contended that the original mortgage should be treated in equity as having been kept alive for the benefit of the purchaser and his mortgagee, who together advanced the money for the discharge. The court of appeal conceived itself bound by the decision in Toulmin v. Steere, 3 Meriv. 210, 17 Revised Rep. 67, to hold that where the payer of an encumbrance is owner in fee of the mortgaged estate, and the debt is not his own debt, the presumption is that he does not intend to keep the charge alive for his own benefit, and that to rebut this presumption there must be evidence of actual intention to keep it alive. Fletcher Moulton, L. J., however, dissented, and after examining the earlier English cases bearing upon the question held Toulmin v. Steere to have been wrongly decided, and characterized as an absurdity the result of the doctrine therein, as exemplified in the case under consideration, that a man is in greater danger from an equitable charge of which he has no notice than of one of which he has notice, because he can have had no conscious intention with regard to the former, seeing that he did not know of its existence. This case appears, from a subsequent application to the court, to have been appealed to the House of Lords, which, at the time of the compilation of this note, had not yet disposed of the appeal.

an encumbrance, nevertheless does so; either from his legal obligation, as in case of a surety, or to protect his own secondary right; or upon the request of the original debtor, and upon the faith that, as against the debtor, the person paying will have the same sureties for reimbursement as the creditor had for payment. And this equity need not rest upon any formal contract or written instrument. Like the vendor's lien for purchase money, it is a creation of a court of equity from the circumstances." The theory of equitable assignment, as laid down by Pomeroy, is: "In general, when any person having a subsequent interest in the premises, and who is therefore entitled to redeem for the purpose of protecting such interest, and who is not the principal debtor, primarily and absolutely liable for the mortgage debt, pays off the mortgage, he thereby becomes an equitable assignee thereof, and may keep alive and enforce the lien so far as may be necessary in equity for his own benefit; he is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee to the extent necessary for his own equitable protection. The doctrine is also justly extended, by analogy, to one who, having no previous interest, and being under no obligation, pays off the mortgage, or advances money for its payment, at the instance of a debtor party and for his benefit; such a person is in no true sense a mere stranger and volunteer." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1212.

In Capen v. Garrison, 193 Mo. 335, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 838, 92 S. W. 368, the court said: "Equity will not ingraft this doctrine on the transaction in the face of a contract that negatives the idea of subrogation. In other words, the contract may be silent on the subject, yet not inconsistent with the idea of subrogation, or, on the other hand, it may be silent on the subject, yet its terms expressly or by implication forbid the application of the doctrine. So, it may be said that equity may apply the doctrine, although the contract does not, either expressly or by legal implication, call for it; but it will not apply it if the contract, either expressly or by legal implication, forbids it. The parties may not have had subrogation in their minds at all when they made the contract, but that fact alone would not control in a question of application of the doctrine. Equity will apply it, though the parties may never have thought of it, if it is not inconsistent with the contract or in violation of anyone's legal rights, and if justice demands it. . . . The usual application of this principle occurs where a person, at the request of the debtor, pays the mortgage debt, or where one interested in the property pays an encumbrance to protect his own interest, or where he stands in the relation of surety to the debt."

It is undisputed that both the mortgagor, Martin, and the mortgagee, appellants, understood when the mortgage was executed that the debts secured by the two prior mortgages were to be paid with the money advanced on this mortgage, and that it would be a first lien against the property for the money so advanced. It was not agreed, and it was not the intention of the parties, that said other mortgages should be assigned to appellee upon the payment of the debts secured by them with money advanced by it, it is true, but it would have had the right to insist upon such assignment; and, since its security failed to constitute a first lien because of the judgment of appellee, of which appellant was ignorant at the time of taking its mortgage, we see no reason why equity should not treat it as an assignee of the first mortgages, discharged with the money advanced by it, and under its doctrine of equitable assignment, and effectuate the agreement with the lender that its security should be a first lien. It had the right after its mortgage was made, to apply the money advanced in payment of the other mortgages and take an assignment thereof to protect itself, and in holding that appellant became the equitable owner of said mortgages upon their payment with the money so advanced by it, and in applying the doctrine of subrogation, the appellee company is in no worse position than it would have been if said mortgages had not been paid, and no injustice is done it; for it cannot complain that the subrogation makes its position less favorable than it would have been if appellant company had not made the loan and advanced the money to pay off said mortgages. It can by a proper procedure force the payee to have the credit or satisfaction of the judgment set aside if it has been entered, and the said judgment will continue and remain a binding obligation against the judgment debtor, constituting a lien against his property as though no such credit or satisfaction was entered. Having made the payment, it was entitled to the benefit of the doctrine of subrogation, and became the assignee of the claims paid, and, not being a volunteer or stranger, it is immaterial that a release, instead of an assignment, was made. No rights of innocent third persons having intervened, the release does not prevent the person making the payment or furnishing the money therefor from becoming the equitable assignee of the claims paid. Sidener v. Pavey, 77 Ind. 241; Cumberland Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Sparks, 49 C. C. A. 510, 111 Fed. 652; Rachal v. Smith, 42 C. C. A. 297, 101 Fed. 159; Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204, 38 S. E. 382. See also 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 845, third division of case note to Capen v. Garison.

Appellees insist that the case should be affirmed as controlled by the decision in Cohn v. Hoffman, 50 Ark. 108, 6 S. W. 511. In that case a person furnished the money to pay the remaining note due for purchase money of the land, and there was no agreement nor understanding that he was to succeed to the vendor's lien, and no assignment of the note was taken by him. Nor was there any element of mistake therein, as in this case, and the court said: "No circumstance connected with the transaction manifested an intention to keep the lien alive for his protection." Here the parties expressly agreed that the appellant, mortgagee, was to have a first lien upon the premises; and, while it is true they thought that the record of its mortgage and the payment of the debt secured by the two prior mortgages and their release would effectuate that purpose, it failed to do so because of the lien of the judgment of appellee intervening, of which appellant was ignorant, and should not be charged with negligence in failing to discover it, since an examination of the index to the record of judgments would not have disclosed it.

It follows from the principles announced that, under the doctrine of equitable assignment and subrogation, appellant the Southern Cotton Oil Company was entitled to subrogation to the rights of the prior mortgagees to the amount of their claims paid by the money advanced by it, and to the satisfaction therefor out of the property prior to the payment of the lien of appellee, which must be postponed to such payment.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion, subrogating appellant to the right to foreclose liens against said property for the amount so paid the prior mortgagees, and if the same is not paid, that the property shall be sold, and that amount of the proceeds thereof paid to said the Southern Cotton Oil Company, free from the lien of the judgment.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

GREAT WESTERN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ESTA M. SNAVELY.

(— C. C. A. —, 206 Fed. 20.)

Insurance — incontestable clause — applicability to reinstatement.

A provision in a life insurance policy that it shall be incontestable after one year applies to proceedings taken to secure reinstatement after default in payment of premiums, so that after the lapse of a year from reinstatement the policy cannot be avoided for fraud in securing it, although insured agrees in his application for reinstatement that the policy shall be void if any statement is untrue.

Note. — Applicability of incontestable clause to false statements made in application for reinstatement.

The holding of the court in the case above reported, that the "incontestable clause" of an insurance policy equally precludes the insurer from contesting the policy for falsity of statements made in the reinstatement certificate, as for falsity of statements made in the original application, accords with the only other decision directly in point, Teeter v. United L. Ins. Asso. 159 N. Y. 411, 54 N. E. 72, affirming 11 App. Div. 259, 42 N. Y. Supp. 119.

It also receives indirect support from Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Galbraith, 115 Tenn. 471, 112 Am. St. Rep. 862, 91 S. W. 204, and Ash v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. 26 Tex. Civ. App. 501, 63 S. W. 944, which place their decision that the insurer may contest the policy on the ground of falsity of statements made in the application for reinstatement, on the ground that the period of contestability had not yet expired.

The doctrine is also supported by the statement made by the court in Massachusetts Ben. Life Asso. v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 42 L.R.A. 261, 30 S. E. 918: "It is true, it has been held that a reinstatement makes a new contract; but the old contract is looked to for the terms, conditions, and stipulations of the new contract. The old contract in the present case being that the policy should be 'incontestable after three years from its date,' upon the payment of three annual premiums, the new contract (there being neither in the application for reinstatement nor the original policy anything to the contrary) would be governed by the same terms; and the period of incontestability would be reached three years from the date of the original policy, notwithstanding the fact that one of the three annual premiums required to be paid had not been paid at maturity, and a lapse and reinstatement had taken place. The failure to take advantage of the right of forfeiture, and the consent for reinstatement, restores the original contract in all its vigor. Especially is this true where there was no notice of any character to the insured that such a radical change in his contract would be brought about by a lapse and reinstatement."

teged to be due on a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The fact that a policy is renewable from quarter to quarter, instead of being for a period of years, upon condition of the payment of premiums, will not deprive the insured of the benefit of a clause making it incontestable after two years from its date. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Asso. 97 Iowa, 226, 32 L.R.A. 473, 59 Am. St. Rep. 411, 66 N. W. 157.

The questions whether the period during which a policy is contestable on the ground of falsity of statements made in connection with an application for reinstatement runs from the date of issuance of the original policy or from the date of the reinstatement, and the question whether the reinstatement has the effect to set the period of contestability for falsity of statements 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

St. Rep. 749, 23 N. E. 186.

Wolverton, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 27, 1907, plaintiff in error, in consideration of the sum of $164.70 then paid, and a like sum to be paid in advance for each and every year for twenty years, issued to Arthur G. Snively a twenty-year life policy of insurance for $5,000, payable in case of his death to Esta M. Snively, his wife, the defendant in error, as beneficiary. The application for the insurance was made a part of the policy. The contract contained, among other things, the following provisions:

"A grace of thirty days, during which this contract will remain in full force, will be allowed in the payment of all premiums except the first.

"In case of default in the payment of any premium or interest, the company will reinstate the contract at any time, if not previously surrendered for its cash value, upon written application by the insured to the company at its home office with evidence of insurability satisfactory to the company, payment of all premiums that would have been paid in the intervening time if no default had been made, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum computed from the premium due date, and payment or reinstatement, with interest at like rate, of any indebtedness existing at the time of default.

"This contract is incontestable after one year from date of issue."

The insured defaulted in the second payment, due December 27, 1908, for more than thirty days, and did not pay the same until March 5, 1909; but upon such payment the policy was reinstated by the insurance company. In order to secure the reinstatement, the insured was required to and did sign what is denominated a "Certificate of Health and Revival Contract," and among other things made declaration as follows:

"I hereby declare to and agree with said company that I am now in good health and free from every ailment and complaint; . . . that I have not had any injury, sickness, or ailment of any kind; and that I have not consulted or been prescribed for by any physician or received any medical treatment since the date of my original application on which said policy was issued, except as here stated:

"Operation appendicitis, Sept. 1—08. Off duty two weeks. Entirely recovered.

"And I hereby renew the statements and agreements contained in said original application, and expressly agreed that if any answer or statement contained therein, except as modified in this contract, or if any statement made or contained herein, be untrue in any respect, then said policy is and shall continue to be absolutely null and void, and the reinstatement thereof inoperative and of no effect."

As a defense the insurance company set up that the reinstatement of the policy was consented to upon the strength of this certificate, and that the same was false, fraudulent, and untrue, in that the insured was then afflicted with a serious malady, of which he subsequently died. The insured paid the third instalment of premium when due, and thereafter, to wit, on July 3, 1910, died.

Trial was proceeded with before a jury; but, when the defendant came to offer proof in support of its defense, it was not allowed to introduce such proof, on the ground that the policy was by its terms rendered incontestable. Whereupon a verdict for plaintiff was directed, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant predicates error.

It is the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error that the representations made by the insured for reinstatement of the policy are in effect warranties, and, the insured having expressly agreed that if such representations were untrue in any respect the policy should remain inoperative, it follows that the reinstatement is nugatory and of no effect, and hence that the company should have been permitted to introduce its proofs showing the falsity of the statements made. This depends wholly upon the operative effect of the clause rendering the policy incontestable after one year.

It will be noted that the insured died more than one year after the policy was reinstated, a fact which renders it unnecessary to inquire whether the reinstated policy became a new contract or merely a revival of the old. In either case, death occurred more than one year after the negotiations were consummated. It can hardly be disputed that the terms of the old contract became the terms of the new or revived contract, call it what you will, so far as applicable to the new conditions; for it is the policy that is reinstated, and it contains the terms which constitute the contract. No new policy is issued, but the old becomes again the contract, and the parties must look to that for its terms and conditions, and to none other. Among others, the incontestable clause remains in the policy, and must be given effect if applicable to the conditions attending the negotiations for reinstatement.

The incontestable clause in the present policy is very general, excepting nothing from its scope, and by the strong current of authority precludes any defense after the expiration of one year on account of false statements, warranted to be true, although they may have been made for a fraudulent purpose. This is true as spoken of the original policy. The grounds for its support are that insurance companies, in order to obtain business, represented that they will issue policies incontestable as to certain matters after a designated period, and individuals negotiate with them on that basis. Furthermore, the clause constitutes in effect a short period of limitation, which it is perfectly competent for the parties to agree upon. While it is true that fraud vitiates all contracts, yet in contracts of the kind, where the beneficiaries are placed at a disadvantage because the dead cannot speak, it is not contrary to public policy for the parties to agree that the company shall be precluded upon the subject after some specified time, reasonable, within which to make investigation. The clause lends stability to the contract, and renders life insurance of greater value to the insured and beneficiary. The subject is exhaustively and ably discussed in Massachusetts Ben. Life Asso. v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 42 L.R.A. 261, 30 S. E. 918. See also Wright v. Mutual Ben. Life Asso. 118 N. Y. 237, 6 L.R.A. 731, 16 Am. St. Rep. 749, 23 N. E. 186; Teeter v. United Life Ins. Asso. 159 N. Y. 411, 54 N. E. 72; Austin v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. (C. C.) 132 Fed. 555; s. c. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064, 73 C. C. A. 498, 142 Fed. 398; 25 Cyc. 872.

Now, if it be said that the reinstated policy is a new contract, about which we pass on opinion, the incontestable clause must needs speak from the date of the reinstatement. It must do this, or else it is a dead letter in the contract. Further, if the clause precludes the defense of false representation and fraud in the original contract, by a strong parity of reasoning it would preclude a like defense as to the new contract, for both were secured upon the representations of the insured as to his physical fitness, condition of health, etc. But the fraud is charged only as to the later representations. Speaking of a policy containing an incontestable clause, which had been reinstated, the court in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Teeter v. United Life Ins. Asso. supra, said: "Thereupon the policy of insurance was restored in full vigor as of that date (the date of the reinstatement), and by its very terms it was to become incontestable after two years."

The two years having elapsed from that date, it was held that the company was barred by the terms of the contract from contesting the policy on the ground that the statements contained in the reinstated certificate of the insured touching the state of his health were untrue. In Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Galbraith, 115 Tenn. 471, 112 Am. St. Rep. 862, 91 S. W. 204, where it was held that the revived policy became a new contract, the court, in its preliminary reasoning, said: "If this be its nature, then it must operate in the future from the date of its reinstatement, and whatever might be its original date, or howsoever long it may have run, yet it would seem, by the force of necessary logic, to follow that the incontestable clause would begin its new life with the date of the new contract."

The reasoning appeals to us as logical and sound, and the conclusion suggested must inevitably follow from the premises. We conclude, therefore, that the District Court committed no error in the present controversy, and its judgment will be affirmed.

2. A bank may set off upon the deposit account of an insolvent corporation its unmatured note held by the bank at the time of insolvency.

(April 8, 1913.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, dismissing their bill filed to set aside a set-off by the defendant bank of a fund deposited by an insolvent corporation with it upon its unmatured note as an unlawful preference. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles W. Wisner, Jr., and W. W. Parker for appellants.

Messrs. William L. Marbury and Jesse Slingluff, for appellees:

A bank has a lien on the deposits of an insolvent depositor to the extent of the indebtedness owing by such depositor to the bank, and can appropriate such deposits to the payment of the obligations held by it, whether due or not.

Records v. McKim, 115 Md. 299, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 197, 80 Atl. 968; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Franklin Bank, 31 Md. 404; Miller v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 30 Md. 392; Colton v. Drovers' Perpetual Bldg. & L. Asso. 90 Md. 85, 46 L.R.A. 388, 78 Am. St. Rep. 431, 45 Atl. 23; McShane v. Howard Bank, 73 Md. 157, 10 L.R.A. 552, 20

393; Merrill v. Cape Ann Granite Co. 23 L.R.A. 313; Fera v. Wickham, 17 L.R.A. 456; and Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 15 L.R.A. 710.

The holding in HAYDEN v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK, that the insolvency of the depositor in a bank, and the appointment of a receiver for it, the depositor being a corporation, entitles the bank to offset against the deposit an unmatured note against the corporation, is sustained by many cases referred to in the foregoing notes, although it is also denied by many cases also referred to in said notes.

In a late case it is held that a bank summoned as garnishee in an action against an insolvent depositor may set off against the general deposit impounded by the garnishment, a note held by it against the depositor, which was not due when the garnishee summons were served, and it is said that the insolvency of the debtor is the foundation for this relief. Wunderlich v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 109 Minn. 468, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 811, 134 Am. St. Rep. 788, 124 N. W. 223, 18 Ann. Cas. 212.

But it has been held that the mere fact that the debtor is a nonresident of the state is not sufficient to entitle a bank to an equitable set-off of its unmatured claim against the debtor upon his deposit, where it has been garnished by another creditor. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Randolph Barton also for appellees.

Stockbridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In June, 1909, a certificate of incorporation was executed by three persons as incorporators for the purpose of the conduct of a fruit and produce commission business under the name of "J. H. Seward & Company, Incorporated." The certificate of incorporation provided for an authorized capital of $50,000, of which amount three shares were subscribed for at the first meet-

It is, however, said that if the bank's debt was due and the depositor had been insolvent, or if the depositor was insolvent and also a nonresident, such special circumstances might have formed the basis for invoking equitable aid. Presnall v. Stockyards Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 151 S. W. 873.

Where a bank, through fraudulent representations of the debtor as to his financial condition, has been induced to renew his note, upon discovering the fraud, it may disaffirm the transaction, cancel the credit given, and offset the amount due it against a deposit of the debtor. Mann v. Franklin Trust Co. 143 N. Y. Supp. 660.

The balance of a regular bank account at the time of filing a petition in bankruptcy is a debt due to the bankrupt from the bank, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion between the bank and the bankrupt, with the view of creating a preferential transfer, the bank need not surrender such balance, but may set it off against notes of the bankrupt held by it, although the same were not due at the time of the bankruptcy. Germania Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Loeb, 110 C. C. A. 263, 188 Fed. 285. For other cases as to the effect of insolvency proceedings upon right of set-off, see note to Richardson v. Anderson, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393.

ing of the incorporators, and subsequently stock was issued for a cash subscription to the amount of $16,500. The stockholders, in whose names these certificates were made out, do not appear to have individually paid for the stock so issued in their names, but the amount of the subscriptions was apparently paid by Mrs. J. H. Seward, the wife of the man whose name was given to the corporation, and who became president of it and continued in such capacity down to the appointment of a receiver on January 6, 1911. The method employed in making payment for some of the stock was devious and with no sufficient reason appearing therefor, and the holders of the stock named in the certificates do not make it entirely clear whether they received, or thought they received, the stock issued in their names as a gift, or whether the stock was in reality the stock of Mrs. J. H. Seward, and the business, therefore, her business, conducted under the form of a corporation. This, however, is not material to the case as presented by the record.

The corporate entity so created began business in the month of June, 1909, and continued for eighteen months, when proceedings were instituted by Mrs. J. H. Seward by a bill alleging the insolvency of the corporation, and praying for the dissolution of the corporation, the appointment of a receiver, and other relief. On the same day that the bill was filed, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the board of directors, an answer was filed, admitting the insolvency of the company, and assenting to the appointment of a receiver, and upon such bill and answer a receiver was appointed on the 6th day of January, 1911. The answer did not give any assent to the dissolution, nor did the decree attempt to dissolve the corporation. Thereafter, on the 4th of May, 1911, the bill of complaint in this case was filed.

At the time of the appointment of the receiver there stood to the credit of J. H. Seward & Company, Incorporated, on the books of the Citizens' National Bank, the sum of $21,250.51. At the same time the bank was the holder of the four following promissory notes of the corporation, which it had discounted: One for $9,200, due January 6, 1911; one for $2,300, due January 19, 1911; one for $3,000, due March 14, 1911; and one for $4,500, due April 12, 1911,—in all, $19,000. It also held a few small notes of customers of J. H. Seward & Company which had been indorsed by the corporation and discounted at the bank. All four of the notes mentioned above were notes of the corporation, bearing the indorsement of Josephine A. Seward, the wife of J. H. Seward. On January 6, 1911, the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) date of the appointment of the receiver and of the maturity of the note for $9,200, the same not having been paid, the bank charged it as a debit against the amount of the deposit standing to the credit of the corporation, and on the day following it in like manner debited the remaining notes which it held of the Seward Company.

It claimed the right to do this under what is known as the banker's lien, and the present bill seeks to set aside this setting off of $19,000 against the deposit of $21,000 as being an attempt to create an unlawful preference in favor of the bank,—one which would operate at the same time to discharge the liability to the bank of Mrs. J. H. Seward as indorser upon the notes, and in the alternative is a prayer to require Mrs. Seward to pay to the receivers the $19,000 so appropriated by the bank to the payment of its own debt. The bill alleges a fraudulent collusion between the corporation and the bank in that the bank had knowledge of the financial condition of Seward & Company, and that the $21,000 of credit had been accumulated there for the purpose of carrying out the scheme of unlawful preference to the bank and release the liability of the indorser.

That the alternative relief prayed against Mrs. Seward in the bill cannot be granted is sufficiently established by the case of Hughes v. Hall, 118 Md. 673, 85 Atl. 946, decided at the October term, 1912, of this court, in the language of Judge Pearce, when he said: "It cannot be successfully contended . . . that a prior decree of dissolution is not essential to the maintenance of a bill by a receiver to set aside an unlawful preference."

In considering the question of the right of the bank to assert a lien for the benefit of notes of a customer which it has discounted, but which are not yet due, there has been some diversity of decision in this country, and in such states as New York (Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, 74 N. Y. 467, 30 Am. Rep. 319), Missouri (Kortjohn v. Continental Nat. Bank, 63 Mo. App. 166), South Carolina (Bank of Spartanburg v. Mahon, 78 S. C. 408, 59 S. E. 31), Illinois (Commercial Nat. Bank v. Proctor, 98 Ill. 558), Wisconsin (Oatman v. Batavian Bank, 77 Wis. 501, 20 Am. St. Rep. 136, 46 N. W. 881), and Michigan (Bradley v. Thompson Smith's Sons, 98 Mich. 449, 23 L.R.A. 305, 39 Am. St. Rep. 565, 57 N. W. 576, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 159), it is held that, in order that the bank may assert the lien and maintain the set-off, the debt must be due. In Wisconsin there is an express statute to that effect, and in Michigan a substantially similar statute. In New York the decisions, while asserting the broad, general proposition, qualify it in two ways: First, that if the note is a demand note, it may be set off against the deposit of a customer under the lien (People v. St. Nicholas Bank, 44 App. Div. 313, 60 N. Y. Supp. 719); and, second, in the leading case of Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, supra, it is expressly stated that the "insolvency of a party sometimes moves equity to grant a set-off which would not be allowed at law." In other states the right of set-off is distinctly recognized as existing in favor of a bank, whether the note be due or not. Kentucky Flour Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Fidelity Trust & S. V. Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank) 90 Ky. 225, 9 L.R.A. 108, 13 S. W. 910; Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 91 Tenn. 336, 15 L.R.A. 710, 18 S. W. 822; Georgia Seed Co. v. Talmadge, 96 Ga. 254, 22 S. E. 1001; Skunk v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 16 Ohio L. J. 353, where the Ohio court held that when a depositor becomes insolvent, the bank holding notes not due, which it had discounted for him, and the proceeds of which had gone into his deposit account, the bank could, as against the insolvent or his assignee, withhold enough of the deposit to protect such notes; Stewart v. National Security Bank, 6 W. N. C. 399, in which the Pennsylvania court sustained the right of lien upon the ground that the establishment of insolvency operated to mature all debts; Ainsworth v. Bank of California, 119 Cal. 470, 39 L.R.A. 686, 63 Am. St. Rep. 135, 51 Pac. 952; Dommon v. Boylston Bank, 5 Cush. 194; and Thomas v. Exchange Bank, 99 Iowa, 202, 35 L.R.A. 379, 68 N. W. 780. The doctrine announced in these cases has likewise received the approval of the Supreme Court of the United States in Schuler v. Israel, 120 U. S. 506, 30 L. ed. 707, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648. In that case a creditor of the depositor had attached the fund in the hands of the bank, and the bank endeavored to assert its lien for the benefit of a note which it had discounted and which was then not yet due, and in sustaining the right of the bank to the lien, the Supreme Court based its ruling on the ground that the bank had the same right against the garnishee as in defending itself against its debtor; and that in the latter case, by filing a bill alleging the debtor's insolvency, and showing that, if compelled to pay its debt to him its claim, which was not yet due, would be lost, it could be relieved by a proper decree and procure a set-off of the two claims. The view in this state has been consistently in accord with the line of cases last cited. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Franklin Bank, 31 Md. 404; Miller v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 30 Md. 392; Colton v. Drivers' Perpetual 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bldg. & L. Asso. 90 Md. 85, 46 L.R.A. 389, 78 Am. St. Rep. 431, 45 Atl. 23, in which case the note involved matured after the insolvency of the bank and the appointment of the receivers; Richardson v. Anderson, 109 Md. 641, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, 130 Am. St. Rep. 543, 72 Atl. 485, in which case the authorities both here and elsewhere were fully and ably reviewed by Judge Thomas; and First Denton Nat. Bank v. Kenney, 116 Md. 24, 81 Atl. 227, Ann. Cas. 1913 B, 1337.

In view of these repeated decisions, the rule of law in this state is too firmly established to be lightly shaken, and the decision of the court below must be affirmed, unless the evidence discloses some fraud on the part of the bank, or such facts properly brought to the knowledge and attention of the bank as to properly charge them with knowledge which would make the acts done tantamount to a fraud. There are quite a number of these which were strenuously insisted upon by the appellants as being sufficient to justify such a finding, but upon a careful and exhaustive examination of each and every one of these, the evidence given falls far short of what is required to justify a finding of collusion and fraud.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, appealed from, will therefore be affirmed.

Decree affirmed; costs to be paid by the appellants out of the funds in their hands.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JAMES H. VREELAND, Respt.,
v.

FOREST PARK RESERVATION COMMISSION, Appt.

(—N. J. —, 87 Atl. 435.)

Eminent domain — forbidding use of property — prevention of fire.

The act entitled "An Act for the Protection of Woodlands," approved April 12, 1909 (P. L. p. 102), violates the constitutional prohibition against taking private property for public use without compensation, and affords no support for an attempt to take private lands without compensation.

Headnote by BERGEN, J.

Note. — Legislation for fire protection is usually upheld as an exercise of the police power, and legislation regulating the destruction of property to prevent the spread of fires in emergencies is said to be declaratory of the common-law right of self-preservation, and is likewise usually justified under the police power.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court enjoining the entry upon plaintiff's land for the purpose of clearing, for the prevention of fires, a strip along the right of way of a railroad. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nelson B. Gaskill, Assistant Attorney General, and Edmund Wilson, Attorney General, for appellant:

The act in question is a valid exercise of the police power of the state intended to promote the general welfare of the citizens of the state.

There is a well-recognized distinction between the taking of property and the regulation of the use of property with possible consequential injuries thereto, under the exercise of the police power.

If the proposed action of the defendant amounts to a taking of the property, then it cannot be justified under the police power.

VISSION. The statute there involved seems to have been an attempt actually to take property and use it permanently for the prevention of possible future fires, and to justify, under the guise of the police power, an act that could be justified only under the power of eminent domain. While there have been analogous cases involving other subjects, a search has not revealed any such involving legislation for the prevention of fires.

Bergen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of complaint in this cause charges that the Erie Railroad Company, under the direction and authority of the Forest Park Reservation Commission of the state of New Jersey, threatens to enter upon complainant's lands, and there, at a distance of not less than 100 feet nor more than 200 feet from the outer rail on each side of the track of the railroad of the defendant corporation, and extending parallel with it, to clear a strip of complainant's land not less than 10 feet wide, of trees, brush, grass, and turf, and expose the bare earth, and then and there to cut down said trees growing on said strip and dig up the said land, as authorized by a statute of this state, entitled "An Act for the Protection of Woodlands," approved April 12, 1909; and the prayer is that the Forest Park Reservation Commission and the Erie Railroad Company be enjoined from so doing. The regularity of the proceedings had under the act are not questioned, and the answer of the Erie Railroad Company admits that it intends to enter upon the complainant's land and cut down the trees thereon, clear the grass and turf, and expose the bare earth, so far as it may be necessary to comply with the statute of this state. It also admits that no offer of compensation to the complainant has been made, and that no proceedings have been taken for the purpose of condemning the land, under the right of eminent domain or otherwise. The statute which the defendants claim authorizes the intended entry upon the complainant's land provides that wherever there is woodland, meaning thereby land or swamp upon which there is a growth of woods or brush, joining the right of way, or less than 110 feet from the roadbed of a railroad upon which are operated locomotives using coal or wood for fuel, there shall be constructed a fire line, in the manner threatened by defendants as described in the bill of complaint, which defendants claim is a justification for their proposed action. The complainant challenges the constitutionality of this act upon the ground, as he claims, that it is a taking of his land for public use without compensation. This contention was sustained in the court of chancery, and a decree made granting the restraint prayed for, from which decree the defendants appeal.

That the complainant will be deprived of the ordinary use of his property, and required to submit to its spoliation to a considerable extent, is not denied, but this the defendant claims is an incident arising from the exercise of police powers to which the complainant must submit for the general public good. We have no doubt that the proposed action amounts to a taking of the complainant's land. The trees and brush thereon are to be cut down, the grass destroyed in such a manner as to expose the bare earth, and where the land is swampy, a ditch not less than 3 feet wide is to be dug to the level of permanent water. In addition to this, all logs, fallen branches of trees, brush, grass, and other combustible material will be cut and removed from complainant's land, between this strip and the railroad, a distance not less than 100 feet, but it may be 200 feet. The threatened appropriation of the strip of land 10 feet or less in width will deprive the complainant of all beneficial use of the land involved, and is a taking of land which cannot be justified, as a proper exercise of police powers. There is nothing in the nature of the land or its use, that creates a nuisance to be abated. The sole purpose of the statute is to protect the public from a non-existent, but possible, condition, if sparks of fire should be thrown from the engines of the defendant railroad company, running over land adjacent to that of the complainant, and for that purpose authorizes the appropriation of private lands lying adjacent to railroads for the purpose of preventing the spread of fires caused by the railroad company, for the benefit of property other than that of the owner of the land taken.

In Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232, the statute declared that, whenever it appeared necessary for the protection of the public health that any part or parcels of land should be drained by other means than sewers, the board of health of the municipality affected was empowered to direct the same to be done, and if the necessary drains could not be connected with a sewer, the drainage should be carried to the adjacent river. Under this statute the authorities entered upon the petitioner's land and constructed an outlet through his lands into the Harlem river for all of the drains it was thought necessary to build; and there it was held that no statute could confer authority to construct such a drain through the land of petitioner without compensation to him for the land taken, if done without his consent. The opinion of the court of appeals was delivered by Judge Earl, in which he said: "But there never can be any necessity under the police power or the law of necessity to permanently appropriate land to the public use without compensation. It may temporarily be interfered with or appropriated; necessity may justify so much, but when the necessity passes away, the right ceases."

In the case under consideration, nothing appears which justifies the appropriation of the complainant's land under the police power. The contemplated action is not a regulation of the use by the complainant of his property, nor does any condition exist which may be interpreted to create an emergency which would warrant the taking of private property for use or destruction, for the general good, without compensation. All that appears is that, in order to establish a fire line on each side of all of the railroads of the state, the adjacent land may be taken without compensation, and being an actual permanent appropriation for the protection of the public against the possible spread of fire, the complainant is entitled to compensation. As the statute under which the defendants justify authorizes the taking of his land without compensation, it contravenes art. 1, § 16, of the Constitution, which declares, "Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

The decree appealed from should be affirmed.

Note. — Statutory limitation of time for relief against tax deed as affecting right to set up invalidity of tax title as a defense.

As to statute limiting time for attack on tax sale, or creating a conclusive presumption as to its validity, as applied to a sale under proceedings void for jurisdictional defects, and under which possession has not been taken, see note to Nind v. Myers, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 157.

On the question of practice, it seems to be quite generally held that where the purchaser at tax sale applies for a writ of assistance, or otherwise seeks to gain possession, the owner may file a petition in the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

same proceeding to vacate the sale on the ground of invalidity. 37 Cyc. 1373, note 18.

While there are a few exceptions to the general rule as above stated (see 37 Cyc. 1373, note 18), the subject of this note presupposes the correctness of the general rule, and no case decided against the defendant by reason of any exceptions is included.

"Within the proper and constitutional bounds it is entirely competent for the legislature to prescribe a short period—e. g., three, five, or seven years—within which the courts may take cognizance of actions brought to overturn tax titles." Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced this action in the superior court, seeking recovery of real see note in 2 L.R.A. 514. So far as the effect of such statutes is limited to actions brought for the purpose of attacking the tax title, their constitutionality is here assumed; but where an attempt is made, as in BUTY v. GOLDFINCH, to extend their operation so as to deny to the former owner the right to set up the illegality of the tax title as a defense, to that extent their constitutionality is here considered.

Cases turning upon a statute which limits the time in which a tax title holder may bring an action are not here considered, as such statutes are intended to have directly the opposite effect to that of the class here considered. And it is equally clear that statutes such as the one considered in Edgerton v. Bird, 6 Wis. 527, 70 Am. Dec. 473, which have been construed to "cut both ways" (see Falkner v. Dorman, 7 Wis. 388, and Knox v. Cleveland, 13 Wis. 246), will not give rise to many cases in point, for the tax title holder's right of action is barred at the same time as that of the patent title holder. The tax title holder in possession has no need of bringing an action after the patent title holder's right to affirmative relief is gone, and if out of possession, his right of action is barred whether or not his tax title is valid. If the land is vacant and he claims only constructive possession (see Coleman v. Peshtigo Lumber Co. infra), or if he has been wrongfully deprived of possessing (Geekie v. Kirby Carpenter Co. infra), and brings the action after the limitation has run, then the case comes properly within the scope of this note. This was an earlier statute than the one quoted in Brunette v. Norber, infra.

Assuming that the holder of the patent title is barred by a statute of limitation from attacking the tax deed as invalid in a direct action brought for the purpose, and that the tax title holder is not barred from his right of action, and exercises his right, may the former set up the invalidity of the tax deed as a defense?

Where the patent title holder is in possession.

The great weight of authority supports the doctrine that statutes taking away from the owner, who has always had active physical possession of the property, the right to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

property, claiming title thereto under a tax deed executed by the treasurer of King county in pursuance of a tax foreclosure judgment rendered in the superior court of that county. The defendant, being in possession of the property, and claiming to have been in possession ever since prior to the tax foreclosure, defended upon the ground, among others, that the tax foreclosure judgment and deed were void for want of jurisdiction, because there was no service of any process whatever in the foreclosure action, either personal or constructive, upon either of the defendants therein named; this defendant and her then husset up as a defense the illegality of the tax title, are unconstitutional in that they deprive him of his property without due process of law.

In harmony with this doctrine practically all statutes of limitation except that of Mississippi and possibly that of Wisconsin, have been construed as not intended to apply to the defense of the owner in possession.

BUTY v. GOLDFINCH is in harmony with both phases of the doctrine as stated.

The holding that if such statute was intended to bar the right of the former owner, who has always held possession, from attacking the validity of the tax deed as a defense, the statute is unconstitutional, is supported by Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, Gil. 358; Taylor v. Miles, 5 Kan. 498, 7 Am. Rep. 558, as to deed for taxes on land, assessed at a time when the land was not taxable.

And in Stoudenmire v. Brown, 48 Ala. 699, in an action in ejectment by the holder of a tax deed against the patent title holder, the court declared unconstitutional, as offending the due process of law clauses of both the state and Federal Constitutions, a statute making the tax deed conclusive evidence of the regularity of the sale, proceedings, etc., after the limitation period.

To the same effect is Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329, where the action was by a tax title holder against the patent title holder in possession, who was permitted to attack the validity of the deed in the face of a statute plainly forbidding such an attack after five years. See long quotation from this opinion in BUTY v. GOLDFINCH.

And in Corbin v. Hill, 21 Iowa, 70, in an action by a tax title holder to recover from the patent title owner the possession of the property, it was held that it is not competent for the legislature to make the deed conclusive evidence against the owner so as to override the facts of illegality, or estop him from proving the truth. The decision, however, went in favor of plaintiff on the ground that the tax deed was not invalid, the trial court's decision allowing the attack.

In Quinlon v. Rogers, 12 Mich. 168, in a suit by the tax title holder to recover possession from the patent title holder, a statute making the deed conclusive evidence after two years was held to be unconstitutional.

band being named as the defendants therein, they being the record owners as well as the actual owners of the property, and it being their community property. This defense was met by the plaintiff by denial of the alleged want of service in the tax foreclosure action, and by invoking the three-year statute of limitation against actions to set aside and cancel tax deeds. A trial before the court resulted in findings and judgment in favor of the defendant, and in quieting her title as against the claims of the plaintiff, reserving a lien upon the property in his favor for a small sum on account of taxes paid by him thereon. From this disposition of the cause the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

On May 1, 1903, and for several years prior thereto, respondent was the wife of T. B. Daly. On that day they were divorced. While they were husband and wife they acquired title to the property herein involved as their community property, taking title thereto in the name of the husband, T. B. Daly. The property was then wild, unimproved, and unoccupied. Soon thereafter and prior to their divorce they commenced to clear and improve the property, doing sufficient work thereon to render plainly visible their actual physical pos-sitional; but this holding was based upon the ground that another section of the same statute had been previously (8 Mich. 430) declared void, which former decision had deprived the owner of his right to have his day in court, as provided by the statute, even within the two years, and that the section before the court was dependent upon the void section, and fell with it.

And the holding that such statutes were never intended to bar the original owner in possession from attacking the validity of the tax deed as a defense is supported by:

—Myers v. Coonradt, 28 Kan. 211, where the court, after discussing a ruling by another court that the former owner is so barred where the land has remained unoccupied during the limitation period, says: "But whether that ruling be correct or not, it does not apply to a case in which the original owner is in actual possession. In such a case the initiative does not lie with him; he may rest secure in his possession and title until somebody attacks them, and when so attacked he may show any defect in the title of the assailing party. It is also true that said § 141 prescribes the five-years limitation not merely upon an action for the recovery of land, but also one to defeat or avoid a sale or conveyance of land for taxes. And it may be that the original owner in possession might be unable after the expiration of five years to maintain an action to remove the cloud which the tax deed casts upon his title; but it does not follow that because he may not maintain an action to quiet his title, that the opposing title, the tax deed, is to be adjudged perfect, and the holder thereof allowed to recover possession from him."

—Salter v. Corbett, 80 Kan. 327, 102 Pac. 452, where the court said: "The five-year statute of limitations which protects tax deeds was unavailing to the plaintiff, for the reason that it is exclusively a defense and cannot be used as a cause of action. The prima facie effect of the deed was therefore the most that the plaintiff could establish."

—Daniels v. Case, 45 Fed. 843, where such a provision limiting the time within which actions against tax purchasers must be commenced was held to have no application in actions brought by the tax title holder.

L.R.A. (N.S.) 1011, 115 S. W. 1146, it was held that a statute providing that "no suit shall be commenced in any court of this state to invalidate any tax title to land after three years from the time said land was sold for taxes" does not prevent all impeachment of such title after three years, and that the patent title holder could impeach the tax title, setting up its invalidity as a defense in an action of ejectment by the tax title holder. Presumably the former owner was in possession.

Under the section of the Louisiana Constitution, quoted in Ashley Co. v. Bradford, infra, if the tax debtor remains in actual or constructive possession of the land, he is not barred from attacking the tax deed for invalidity as a defense. Poitevent & F. Lumber Co. v. Honey Island Land & Timber Co. 100 C. C. A. 279, 176 Fed. 733.

In Taylor v. Danley, 83 Kan. 646, 112 Pac. 595, 21 Ann. Cas. 1241, it was held that a tax deed valid upon its face, though fatally defective, is protected from attack by the five-year limitation statute, but that the holder thereof, by seeking affirmative relief, subjects the deed to attack for every reason for which it might have been attacked before the five years had elapsed. In 90 Kan. 1, 132 Pac. 533, a case between the same parties, the court makes the above summary of its former holding; but in the latter case the decision went off on the ground that plaintiff, as holder of the tax title, was barred by the two-year limitation.

In Martin v. Barbour, 140 U. S. 634, 35 L. ed. 546, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 944, affirming 34 Fed. 701, the holder of the patent title was permitted to show defects in the tax title while opposing the confirmation of the sale by the land commissioners after the statutory period had elapsed, but this holding was based upon the ground that the owners had been deprived of a substantial right, and not upon the ground that their plea was a defense, as distinguished from an affirmative action.

But the Mississippi statute, which provides "that all sales of lands hereafter made for nonpayment of taxes due under any law of this state shall be valid to all intents and purposes,—said lands subject to redemption as provided by law,—and that no such sale shall be impeached or questioned in any manner, or for any cause, sav-session thereof. The trial court found, in substance, that respondent's possession of the property thus commenced was thereafter open, notorious, and continuous until the trial of this action in October, 1912. In November, 1903, Rosa D'Elia, claiming to be the owner of a delinquent tax certificate against the property, commenced an action in the superior court of King county to foreclose the same by filing therein her application in usual form. Thereafter judgment of foreclosure was rendered in that action in her favor. Thereafter sale of the property was made by the treasurer of King county in pursuance of that judgment, when he executed a tax deed to Rosa D'Elia on January 23, 1904; she being the purchaser at that sale. Thereafter appellant acquired by mesne conveyances whatever right, title, or interest in the property Rosa D'Elia had acquired by the tax foreclosure and sale, and on February 23, 1912, commenced this action against respondent to recover possession of the property. The commencement of this action, it will be noticed, was over eight years after the execution of the tax deed, upon which appellant rests his claim to the property. In March, 1906, T. B. Daly conveyed all his interest in the property to respondent, his former wife; the decree of divorce not having divested either of them of their ing fraud or mistake in the assessment or sale of the same, or upon the proof that the tax for which the same were sold had been paid prior to such sale, and no suit to set aside any title acquired under such sale, hereafter to be made, shall be brought, unless within five years from the date of the sale," prevents all attacks on the validity of the tax title except those allowed by the statute, no matter how made. Sigman v. Lundy, 66 Miss. 522, 6 So. 245; Carlisle v. Yoder, 69 Miss. 384, 12 So. 255. The court in Sigman v. Lundy, said: "As to the sales thereafter to be made, it added the assurance that after the lapse of five years no hostile claim should be asserted. Whether the purchaser at tax-sale or the former owner was in possession of the land sold, whether the land was occupied or vacant, the security afforded by the act existed. The provision as to future sales was intended to be, and was, an irrevocable and irrepealable stipulation that, after the lapse of the time named, no assailing of the title should be made. It was, and was intended to be, a part of the contract into which the purchaser would enter,—an inherent, continuing element of right secured, running with the land, and a perpetual security of the title."

Oconto County v. Jerrard, 46 Wis. 317, 50 N. W. 591, and Milledge v. Coleman, 47 Wis. 184, 2 N. W. 77, are frequently cited as supporting the Mississippi cases, and it is true that the court uses language that seems to commit it to that position. But both cases were actions by the patent title owner out of possession to recover possession from the tax title holder, and of course they are not in point on the question here under annotation. It will be seen, supra, that the Wisconsin statute is interpreted as one that "cuts both ways." These two cases were cited as binding upon the Federal courts as a rule of construction in Wisconsin, by the court in Geekie v. Kirby Carpenter Co. 108 U. S. 385, 27 L. ed. 160, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 315, in which case the party claiming under the tax title was plaintiff, but the controversy was not concerning land, but logs cut from the land, and it clearly appeared that possession of the logs had been wrongfully taken from the plaintiff. Although the court does not place the decision upon this 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) ground, it is quite evident that the question here under annotation was not squarely before it. See Nicholson v. Hale and Millikin v. Lockwood, infra.

The statute of limitations will bar an attack by the former owner, who wrongfully dispossessed the tax title holder after the period of limitations had expired, upon the validity of the tax deed as a defense in an action by the tax title holder to regain possession. Nicholson v. Hale, 73 Kan. 599, 85 Pac. 592; Millikin v. Lockwood, 80 Kan. 600, 103 Pac. 124.

Where tax title holder has actual or constructive possession.

The courts agree upon the proposition that where the holder of a tax title valid upon its face takes possession legally, and holds adversely during the limitation period, his title cannot thereafter be attacked on the ground of illegality by the former owner, even as a defense.

Also they agree that a tax deed to vacant land, valid upon its face, when recorded gives the holder thereof constructive possession as long as the land remains vacant, and that if such constructive possession is uninterrupted by the actual possession of the former owner during the whole limitation period and up to the time of bringing the action, the tax title cannot be attacked by the former owner, even as a defense.

In Walker v. Boh, 32 Kan. 354, 4 Pac. 272, the court, in construing a statute which provided "any suit or proceeding against the tax purchaser, his heirs or assigns, for the recovery of land sold for taxes, except in cases where the taxes have been paid or the land redeemed as provided by law, shall be commenced within five years from the time of recording the tax deed, and not thereafter," recognized the rule as above stated with reference to constructive possession, but, on account of the fact that the plaintiff who held the tax title had been out of the state practically all of the limitation period, refused to apply it, and allowed the former owner to plead the illegality of the tax deed as a defense.

And the holding in Walker v. Boh, supra, was approved in Coale v. Campbell, 58 Kan. 480, 49 Pac. 604, but was not applied be-interest therein. In November, 1911, respondent was married to Geo. E. Goldfinch, and they are now husband and wife. While he was made a defendant in this action and is with his wife in possession of the property, he disclaims all interest therein. We therefore refer to her alone as the defendant and respondent. The trial court found, in substance, that no service of summons or process, either personally or by publication, was made in the tax foreclosure action upon T. B. Daly, the then record owner, or upon respondent, his former wife and joint owner, or upon any person whomsoever. The trial court not only found that the respondent was in the open and notorious possession of the property at all times since the commencement of the tax foreclosure action, but also that she had made valuable and lasting improvements thereon at a cost to her of not less than $900, and that she has paid all general taxes charged against the property for the years 1903 to 1911, inclusive, except the year 1906, for which year she tendered payment to the county treasurer, which tender was refused by the treasurer because some other person had previously paid the taxes for that year. Neither appellant nor any of his predecessors in interest, including Rosa D'Elia, were ever in possession of the property, nor did they ever seek to obtain possession because of the intervention of another statute of limitations which had run against the tax deed and barred the action, making an attack on the validity of the deed unnecessary.

And in Harris v. Edwards, 32 Kan. 580, 4 Pac. 1044, the rule as to constructive possession under the Kansas statute, above quoted, was applied. The defendant was the holder of a later tax title, but he was in practically the same position as a grantee of the former owner.

In Stump v. Burnett, 67 Kan. 589, 73 Pac. 894, the rule was again recognized, but the former owner had taken actual possession after the expiration of the limitation period, and held it undisturbed for two years, and it was held that he could plead the illegality of the tax title in an action brought to dispossess him, but that he could get no affirmative relief, even in the same proceeding. This decision was based upon the theory that a statute of limitation is a defensive weapon, and never an offensive one, and that neither party could use it to enlarge his holdings.

Under the clause in the Constitution of Louisiana which provides that "no sale of property for taxes shall be set aside for any cause, except on proof of dual assessment, or of payment of the taxes for which the property was sold prior to the date of sale, unless the proceeding to annul is instituted within six months from service of notice of sale, which notice shall not be served until the time of redemption has expired, or within three years from the adoption of this Constitution as to sales already made, and within three years from the date of recordation of the tax deed, as to sales made hereafter, if no notice is given. The manner of notice and form of proceeding to quiet tax titles shall be provided by law," and legislation thereunder, those who buy property at tax sale not tangibly but only constructively in the possession of the tax debtor, and themselves obtain no other possession than the constructive possession which follows the tax title and its registry, are protected against attacks made by the tax debtor on any other grounds than those allowed by that provision, and unauthorized attacks cannot be made by way of defense to an action by the tax title holder to quiet his title. Ashley Co. v. Bradford, 109 La. 641, 33 So. 634.

And the same is true where the tax title holder has actual physical possession all of the limitation period. Canter v. Williams, 107 La. 77, 31 So. 627.

In Shawler v. Johnson, 52 Iowa, 472, 3 N. W. 604, it was held that the former owner is barred by the five-year statute of limitations from attacking the validity of a tax deed not void upon its face as a defense in an action by the holder of the deed, who was in possession during the limitation period. The court said that the fact that the holder brings the action does not open the way for the former owner to assail the tax title in a manner that he could not do if he were plaintiff. The report does not disclose the wording of the statute. This holding was supported in Bullis v. Marsh, 56 Iowa, 747, 2 N. W. 578, 6 N. W. 177; and Monk v. Corbin, 58 Iowa, 503, 12 N. W. 571.

And in Brunette v. Norber, 130 Wis. 632, 110 N. W. 785, it was held that the holder of the patent title is denied the right after the limitation period to attack the validity of the tax deed as a defense in an action against him for trespass, where the plaintiff had been in possession all of the time, and had paid all of the taxes accruing subsequent to the sale, the statute providing: "No action shall be brought by the original owner for the recovery of lands purporting to be conveyed for the nonpayment of taxes by a deed void on its face after the expiration of five years from the date of the recording of the tax deed, in cases where the grantee in the tax deed shall have taken actual possession of such land within two years after such recording, and shall have actually and continuously maintained such possession to the end of such period of five years."

But where the land is unoccupied, but the tax title holder claims constructive possession, if his tax deed is void upon its face, he cannot, even under the stringent statute of Wisconsin, maintain an action against the patent title owner on the theory that the owner is barred from attacking his deed, for the reason that a void deed, although recorded, cannot start the statute of limitations to running. Coleman v. Peshtigo Lumber Co. 30 Fed. 321.

thereof until the commencement of this action in November, 1912.

Some contention is made by counsel for appellant that the evidence was not sufficient to support the findings of the trial court that there was no service of process in the tax foreclosure action and that respondent was in open and notorious possession of the property continuously since prior to the commencement of that action. We deem it sufficient to say that a careful review of the evidence convinces us that it was ample to call for the making of these findings.

The principal contention of counsel for appellant is that the tax deed has become conclusive against the claims of respondent, and that she has been thereby divested of all title to the property by virtue of the three-year statute of limitation against actions to set aside tax deeds. In view of the fact that the tax foreclosure judgment was rendered without jurisdiction because of absolute failure of process in that action, it is plain that the tax deed does not result in divesting respondent of her title to the property, unless the statute of limitation here invoked can be held to have rendered unavailable to respondent her defense resting upon want of jurisdiction of the court to render the tax foreclosure judgment. The statute invoked, being § 162, Rem. & Bal. Code, reads: "Actions to set aside or cancel the deed of any county treasurer, issued after and upon the sale of lands for general, state, county, or municipal taxes, or for the recovery of lands sold for delinquent taxes, must be brought within three years from and after the date of the issuance of such treasurer's deed." This statute has been the subject of consideration by this court, and given full force and effect in the following cases, which are relied upon by counsel for appellant. Cordiner v. Dear, 55 Wash. 479, 104 Pac. 780; Anderson v. Spokane, P. & S. R. Co. 57

Wash. 439, 107 Pac. 183; Huber v. Brown, 57 Wash. 654, 107 Pac. 850; Baylis v. Kerrick, 64 Wash. 410, 116 Pac. 1082; Fleming v. Stearns, 66 Wash. 655, 120 Pac. 522.

In each of those cases the original owner of the land was the plaintiff, seeking in effect to set aside a tax deed and recover the land held or claimed by the defendant under the tax deed. In each it was held that the cause of action there sought to be enforced was barred by this statute; but in none of them was it held or even suggested that this statute would bar the original owner, in possession at all times following the tax foreclosure, from defending his possession and title upon the ground of such foreclosure being void, when claim to the property is asserted by another under such foreclosure. In none of those cases was the effect of this statute upon the defense, which the original owner in possession might make involved. Our attention has not been called to any decision of this court, and we think there have been none, where any such question has been considered. We have held that a void tax deed may constitute such color of title as to become a basis for the running of the statute of limitations (Lara v. Sandell, 52 Wash. 53, 100 Pac. 166); but not that such color of title, unaccompanied by possession, will by mere lapse of time divest the original owner of title to property he is in the actual possession and enjoyment of. This respondent did not commence this action "to set aside or cancel" the tax deed, nor "for the recovery of" the property in question. She was already in possession of the property and in the full enjoyment of all the rights in that regard which ownership and possession could possibly give her. Being in this situation, she had no occasion to do anything or take any steps looking to the protection of those rights until some one sought to invade them. All that she here seeks to invoke in the protection of her

In an action by the holder of a tax deed to quiet title in himself against one claiming prior title, the defendant is not denied the right to plead the invalidity of the tax title, under Mills's Anno. Stat. (Colo.) § 3904: "No action for the recovery of land sold for taxes shall lie, unless the same be brought within five years after the execution and delivery of the deed therefor by the treasurer, any law to the contrary notwithstanding," if the tax deed is void upon its face. Dimpfel v. Beam, 41 Colo. 25, 91 Pac. 1107; Clark v. Huff, 49 Colo. 197, 112 Pac. 542; Foster v. Clark, — Colo. App. —, 121 Pac. 130. But these cases are of practically no force upon the point here under annotation for the reason that they follow Crisman v. Johnson, 23 Colo. 264, 58 Am. St. Rep. 224, 47 Pac. 296, and Gomer v. Chaffee, 6 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Colo. 314, where it was held that, if the tax deed is void upon its face, the holder thereof is not protected by the statute in a suit against him to quiet title in the former owner.

Although the tax deed is not void on its face, but because of its failure to recite the jurisdictional requirements which go to the power of the treasurer to issue the deed, it is not prima facie evidence of title, therefore, it could not set in operation the Colorado short statute of limitations. (See statute quoted in Dimpfel v. Beam, supra.) Therefore the former owner as defendant in an ejectment suit was not denied the right to attack its validity. The court here makes no point of the fact that the former owner was defendant. Sheesley v. Voorhees, — Colo. App. —, 134 Pac. 1108. J. W. M.

rights is by way of pure defense. If the language of this statute should be given the construction claimed for it by counsel for appellant, we are unable to see how it could be held to be a valid exercise of legislative power in the light of the due process of law provisions of the Federal and state Constitution.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. at page 522, after noticing the legislative power to pass statutes of limitation, observes: "All limitation laws, however, must proceed on the theory that the party, by lapse of time and omissions on his part, has forfeited his right to assert his title in the law. Where they relate to property, it seems not to be essential that the adverse claimant should be in actual possession; but one who is himself in the legal enjoyment of his property cannot have his rights therein forfeited to another for failure to bring suit against that other within a time specified to test the validity of a claim which the latter asserts, but takes no steps to enforce. It has consequently been held that a statute which, after a lapse of five years, makes a recorded deed purporting to be executed under a statutory power conclusive evidence of a good title, could not be valid as a limitation law against the original owner in possession of the land. Limitation laws cannot compel a resort to legal proceedings by one who is already in the complete enjoyment of all he claims."

In Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329, 342, Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, touching statutes of limitation and legislative power to make them effective against persons already in possession, said: "These laws do not purport to take away existing rights, although their operation may often have substantially that result. But they are designed to compel parties whose rights are unjustly withheld from them to vindicate their claims within some reasonable time. If a person who has been ousted of his possession or dominion desires to regain it, he knows that he must resort to those means which are furnished by the law, either by the peaceable act of a party himself or by legal prosecution. A limitation law simply requires him to proceed and enforce these rights within some reasonable time, on pain of being deemed to have abandoned them. Such laws can only operate on those who are not already in the enjoyment and dominion of their rights. A person who has a lawful right and is actually or constructively in possession can never be required to take active steps against opposing claims. The law does not compel any man who is unassailed to pay any attention to unlawful pretenses, which are not asserted by possession or suit. When such a title is set up, he has a right to defend himself by jury, if the claim is one of common-law cognizance, or otherwise, if of a different nature. But to hold that, under any circumstances, a man can be deprived of a legal title without a hearing is impossible without destroying the entire foundations of constitutional protection to property. No one can be cut off by limitation until he has failed to prosecute the remedy limited; and no one can be compelled to prosecute when he is already in possession of all that he demands."

In Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, 495, Gil. 358, Chief Justice Wilson, speaking for the court upon the same subject, said: "It is not necessary for a party in the enjoyment of his rights to institute any proceedings against an adverse claimant, and to require him to do so would be, in many cases, imposing a grievous and expensive burden. A law requiring a party to take such action is not, nor has it, any analogy to, a statute of limitation. Statutes of limitation only operate as an extinguishment of a remedy, and, of course, can have no application to a party who neither seeks nor needs a remedy."

In Dingey v. Paxton, 60 Miss. 1038, 1054, the court, speaking through Justice Cooper on the same subject, said: "Before the entry of the defendant upon the lands, the plaintiffs, by their tenant, were in actual occupancy of all the land which was susceptible of cultivation, and were in the constructive possession of the whole tract. The sale of the lands for the unpaid taxes of 1874 was insufficient, under well-settled principles, to divest their title. By a proceeding in invitum the state had attempted to acquire title under its laws as then existing and had failed. By a subsequent law it provides that, notwithstanding such failure, the shadow of title thus acquired shall become the actual title unless attacked within a certain time. It is the expiration of time without regard to possession which is to transfer title from the owner and vest it in the state, or its vendee or donee. The power of the legislature to prescribe within what reasonable time one having a mere right of action shall proceed is unquestionable; but there is a wide distinction between that legislation which requires one having a mere right to sue, to pursue the right speedily, and that which creates the necessity for suit by converting an estate in possession into a mere right of action, and then limits the time in which the suit may be brought. The mere designation of such an act as an act of limitation does not make it such, for it is in its nature more than that. Its operation is first to divest from the owner the constructive possession of his property, and to invest it in another, and in favor of the possession thus transferred to put in operation a statute of limitations for its ultimate and complete protection. A complete title to land, according to Blackstone, consists of juris et sesinæ conjunctio; the possession, the right of possession, and the right of property. One who is in the actual or constructive possession of his lands, and who has the right of possession and of property, needs no action to enforce his rights. He is already in the enjoyment of all that the law can give him, and cannot be disturbed in such enjoyment except by 'due course course of law.'

It is of interest to note that in these Minnesota and Mississippi cases the actions were brought by the original owners, who had evidently been in possession up to near the time of the bringing of their actions, to recover against the holders of the tax deeds, who had acquired possession in some manner evidently against the will of the original owners. These holdings were in effect that the statute did not operate in favor of the holder of the tax deed while the original owner was in actual possession of the land. The Mississippi case apparently goes to the extent of holding that a void tax deed will not draw to its holder the constructive possession of the land, even if the land is unoccupied. The supreme court of Iowa, in Lewis v. Soule, 52 Iowa, 13, 2 N. W. 401; Monk v. Corbin, 58 Iowa, 503, 12 N. W. 571, and cases there cited, holds that the statute of that state providing, "no action for the recovery of real property sold for the nonpayment of taxes shall lie unless the same be brought within five years after the treasurer's deed is executed and recorded," gives a void tax deed the effect of drawing the constructive possession of unoccupied lands to the holder of such deed, but leaves the inference which is almost conclusively to be drawn from the language of its decisions that such constructive possession will not be drawn by the tax deed to its holder while the original owner is in actual possession of the land. The logic of all these decisions is that the statute will not run in favor of the holder of a tax deed while the land in question is in the actual possession of the original owner. This, of course, is in harmony with the view that he who is in possession and full enjoyment of his property is not required to protect his right to the property by instituting legal proceedings against another who merely claims such property, but takes no steps to recover it.

who is assailed by a suit in which the plaintiff rests his right upon an instrument other than a tax deed, we find the holdings of the courts equally conclusive in respondent's favor.

In Pinkham v. Pinkham, 60 Neb. 600, 610, 83 N. W. 837, 841, where the defendant sought to defend his possession under a deed needing reformation, and by his answer sought to have it reformed, and the statute of limitations was invoked against such defense, Justice Holcomb, speaking for the court, said: "It is urged that the statute of limitations operates as a barrier to prevent the appellee from reforming the instrument under which he claims by correction of the alleged error. There are, we think, two substantial reasons why this plea cannot be made available; first, the appellee is in possession of the land under claim of title to the property; his right and title is assailed by appellants. He may, in such a case, rightfully present any defense, legal or equitable, to sustain his title to the property, irrespective of the running of the statute. When his right of possession is attacked, a cause of action accrues, by which he may plead and prove any equitable defense of which he may be possessed. As long as his title is undisputed, and he is in the peaceable possession of the property thereunder, the statute of limitations would not run, so as to prevent him when sued from setting up any equity he has in defense of his possession."

Responding to a petition for rehearing in this case, in 61 Neb. 336, 85 N. W. 285, Justice Sullivan, speaking for the court, used this vigorous expression: "The right to commence and prosecute an action may be lost by delay; but the right to defend against a suit for the possession of property is never outlawed. The limitation law may, in a possessory action, deprive a suitor of his sword, but of his shield never."

In Robinson v. Glass, 94 Ind. 211, 216, Judge Elliott, speaking to the question of a defense invoked against a mortgage, alleging fraud in its execution, said: "In the argument on the assignment of cross errors, it is contended that, as the mortgage was executed more than six years before the suit was instituted and the defense of fraud interposed, the rights of the appellants are barred by the statute of limitations. This position is untenable. Actions are barred, but defenses are not. A person who is sued upon a contract may show that it was procured by fraud, although more than six years elapsed before the action on the contract was instituted and the defense interposed. We speak now of pure defenses, and not as to matters which may be relied upon as forming a foundation for a counter-claim or cross complaint."

In Mott v. Fiske, 155 Ind. 597, 603, 58 N. E. 1053, 1055, involving a defense made against a deed upon which the plaintiff rested his claim, the defendant asserting it to have been executed as a mortgage, Judge Monks, speaking for the court, said: "Appellant nor anyone under whom she claims title has ever occupied said land, nor is it shown that they ever attempted to enforce any rights thereto under the deed from Work before the commencement of this action. Under such circumstances, whenever any attempt is made to enforce any rights under said deed, mere lapse of time will not bar the right to assert and show that the same is a mortgage."

In Muse v. Yarborough, 11 La. 521, 532, the court applied the maxim, Quæ temporalia sunt ad agendum perpetua sunt ad excipiendum, as applicable to the defense made by a defendant in possession. The translation of this maxim is given in 32 Cyc. 1279, as follows: "Things which afford a ground of action, if raised within a certain time, may be pleaded at any time, by way of exception."

The applicability of this principle under our law will be more readily understood by noting the fact that in Louisiana the word "exception" is a comprehensive term referring to defenses. Garland's Revised Code of Practice (La.) 3d ed. 1910, § 330; Gayosa de Lemos v. Garcia, 1 Mart. N. S. (1824) 324. The substance of the doctrine which we have been discussing is well summed up in the text of 25 Cyc. 1063, as follows: "Pure defenses are held not to be barred by the statute of limitations." Numerous authorities are there cited supporting and illustrating the applicability of this general rule.

Much of what we have said may seem more appropriate to the question of the constitutionality of statutes which assume to take away defenses which may be made by those in possession and enjoyment of their rights when assailed by others. But we think the authorities reviewed are equally applicable as showing that our legislature did not intend that the statute should ever be invoked to deprive one, in the possession and enjoyment of all he claims, from making any lawful defense he may have in the protection of such possession and enjoyment, regardless of the question of time which may have elapsed following the initiation of the right under which his assailant claims. We do not hold that the statute is unconstitutional, but only that it has no application to the defense which this respondent here invokes; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

she being in the possession and enjoyment of the property at all times prior to the commencement of the void foreclosure proceeding.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CARNEGIE NATURAL GAS COMPANY v.

A. G. SWIGER et al., Plffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 79 S. E. 3.)

Eminent domain — pipe line — constitutionality.

1. Chapter 74, Acts 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, chap. 42, §§ 18, 20), amending and re-enacting §§ 18 and 20 of chap. 42. Code 1906, and providing thereby for an alternative method of condemning land or easements by pipe line companies for transporting carbon oil or natural gas, is valid, and not violative either of § 30, art. 6, or §§ 9 and 10, art. 3, of the Constitution of this state, or of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Same — easement — description.

2. Such right of way or easement authorized when less than the fee is taken need not describe a definite width or depth, but must pursue a definite line, with courses and distances given, and have definite and fixed termini.

Headnotes by MILLER, J.

Note. — Eminent domain: right to exercise power as affected by fact that principal benefit will be derived out of the state.

Practically all the questions decided in CARNEGIE NATURAL GAS CO. v. SWIGER, except the particular one here under annotation, are covered in note to Grafton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1, on judicial power over the right of eminent domain, and in notes to which reference is there made.

Only cases turning upon the question of benefits outside of the state in which the desired property is situated are here considered. All other objections to the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, such as that condemner is a foreign corporation, and that the use is not, under other circumstances, a public use, are assumed to be unavailable as a defense, hence cases involving only those and similar questions are excluded. The question of condemning land within a state for the use of the United States is not here considered.

But two classes of cases are here considered, i. e., those in which it is found that no benefit to the state in which the Evidence — public use — sufficiency.

3. The evidence in this case sustains the finding and judgment of the court below as to the public use of the right of way or easement proposed to be taken.

Eminent domain — pipe line — protection of public.

4. Where, by a general law, such pipe line company is authorized to take such rights of way or easements for its public service, the right of the public therein, and the reasonableness of the charges for the service, though not written in any statute or ordinance, are sufficiently protected by general law to warrant the taking thereof for such public use.

Same — public need — extent of necessity.

5. Where such public service corporation is so authorized, and enters upon and assumes the duties of its public service, there is public need for rights of way and easements justifying the taking of private property therefor, and what is necessary is generally a matter within its discretion not controllable by the courts.

Same — restricted service — effect.

6. That but few persons are being served property is located, or to inhabitants thereof, will accrue from the proposed use of the property, and those in which it is found that only part of the benefit will so accrue.

No benefit within state.

A vital distinction is made between direct and indirect benefits. Grover Irrig. & Land Co. v. Lovella Ditch, Reservoir & Irrig. Co., infra, furnishes an excellent example of indirect benefits, and Columbus Water Works Co. v. Long, infra, furnishes one of direct benefits. The opposite holdings of the courts in the two cases, while in complete agreement as to principles, show the importance of the distinction.

The courts in the limited number of reported cases are unanimous upon the proposition that property cannot be condemned by virtue of the state's power of eminent domain, if no direct benefit from its proposed use is to accrue to the state in which it is located, or to at least a few inhabitants thereof.

In Grover Irrig. & Land Co. v. Lovella Ditch, Reservoir, & Irrig. Co. — Wyo. —, 131 Pac. 43, the court, in a well-reasoned opinion containing an exhaustive discussion of the principles underlying the question and the authorities supporting them, holds that property in one state cannot be taken under the power of eminent domain, if it appears that the entire benefit to be derived therefrom will accrue to the people of another state. The fact that the use to which the property was to be appropriated would develop the agricultural lands of a neighboring state, and thus indirectly benefit the people of the home state, was held to be insufficient to justify the exercise of the right.

at the time such right of way or easement is proposed to be taken will not defeat the right of such company to take such right of way or easement, if the real purpose is to serve the public.

Trial — eminent domain — necessity of taking — question for court.

7. The question of the public need or benefit of such proposed right of way or easement is generally a question for the court, and not one of fact for jury trial

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Harrison County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a gas pipe line. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The title to the act embracing the sections permitting this taking works a concealment of the objects of the act.

In Columbus Water Works Co. v. Long, infra, the court said: "It seems to be an admitted fact generally, that the power inheres in a state for domestic uses only, to be exercised for the benefit of its own people, and cannot be extended merely to promote the public uses of a foreign state;" but this statement is in the form of an admission rather than a holding. For the holding, see infra.

In Washington Water Power Co. v. Waters, infra, the court conceded that "condemnation could evidently not be had in this state for the purpose alone of serving a public use in another state."

Where land in one state is flooded by a dam which was built for milling purposes in another state, the owner of the dam cannot receive the benefit of a statute of the landowner's home state which provides a method of appraisal in the nature of condemnation proceedings, to take the place of actions at law in all cases of flooding lands for milling purposes, and the owner of the flooded lands may maintain an action for damages, for the reason that the public benefit derived from the use of the land does not accrue to inhabitants of the state. Wooster v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 39 Me. 246. And the fact that the people of the state where the land is situated will receive an indirect benefit through the increased prosperity of the community where the mill is situated will not suffice to bring the case within the statute. Salisbury Mills v. Forsaith, 57 N. H. 124. These two cases are not strictly eminent domain cases, but they involve the same principles.

But where the use is to furnish a supply of water for the District of Columbia, the legislature of a state has power to authorize the exercise of the right of eminent domain, even though none of the water is used by the inhabitants of the state. Reddall v. Bryan, 14 Md. 444, 74 Am. Dec. 550. However, this decision is not opposed to the doctrine enunciated in the decisions, supra, for it is based upon the theory that the home state participates in the enjoyment of property used by the United States. The real question involved, i. e., the power of a state to condemn property for the use of the United States, is not within the scope of the note.

Part of benefit within the state.

It will be seen by the cases, infra, that the relative amount of direct benefits accruing inside and outside, respectively, of the state, is not material.

Where part of the benefit will accrue directly to people of the state in which the property to be taken is located, the fact that part accrues to people of another state will not defeat the right to exercise the power of eminent domain. This proposition has been upheld,

The court said: "While a state will take care to use this power for the benefit of its own people, it will not refuse to exercise it for such purpose because the inhabitants of a neighboring state may incidentally partake of the fruits of its exercise. Such refusal would violate the principles of a just public policy and the neighborly comity which should exist between states."

The power developed at these plants, however, was not used wholly in the respective states, so that the proportion of service received by the people of the respective states may not be correctly represented by the figures, but it did appear that, by using both plants for service within the home state, there would have been sufficient power for that purpose alone without making the increase. In Grover Irrig. & Land Co. v. Lovella Ditch, Reservoir & Irrig. Co. supra, this point is freely conceded, and, in support thereof, the court says that the right of the United States to condemn land within a state for the use of the former is "sustained upon the ground that property required for the purposes of the national government, being for the use of the people of all the states, is as well for the use of the people of that state where it is located," and in support of this proposition cites *People ex rel. Co. 138 Pa. 168, 22 Atl. 95.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner elected to proceed pursuant to the alternative method prescribed by § 20, chap. 42, Code Supp. 1909, chapter 74, Acts 1907, to condemn an easement or right of way less than a fee for a natural gas pipe line through defendant's lands, according to a plan attached to the bond tendered defendant showing the route of its proposed pipe line through his lands.

Failing to agree with him as to the damages, and defendant refusing to accept the bond tendered him, petitioner, after five days' notice, presented the same to the judge of the circuit court in vacation, as prescribed by the statute, and also its petition praying among other things that said bond be approved. Whereupon defendant appeared and demurred to the petition, which being joined in by petitioner and argued by counsel, the court took time to consider, giving to petitioner, over objection by defendant, leave to file said bond and to make the same part of the record, but denying petitioner, until the further order of the court or judge, right of entry on the land.

On a later day, having considered the matters of law arising upon the prior proceedings, the judge was of opinion to approve the bond, unless within three days defendant should except to the form, amount, or surety, and file his exceptions with the clerk, and to that end continued the case to July 22, 1911, in chambers.

On the day to which the case was so adjourned, defendant again appeared, and tendered and asked leave to file certain objections in writing to the proceedings, also his objection to the amount and form of the bond, none to the surety, and also some nine special pleas in writing, and an additional paper entitled plea and further exceptions to the bond and approval thereof; and also made other motions not material, and which need not be considered.

At a later day the demurrer was overruled, defendant's pleas numbered 1, 2, and 3, and his so-called plea and further exceptions were filed, but pleas numbered 4 to 9, inclusive, were rejected, and issue was joined on the several pleas filed. Without passing on the exceptions to the bond, the court directed the testimony to be taken on the issues presented by the pleas, and on final hearing, on September 20, 1911, pronounced the judgment now complained of, finding that petitioner had the right to condemn the right of way or easement over defendant's lands for the purposes set forth in its petition, and finding the same sufficient in all particulars, approved the bond filed, and further found, ordered, and directed that petitioner had the right to, and might at any time, and immediately if necessary, enter upon said easement or right of way for the purpose of constructing its pipe line as proposed in its petition, to which rulings and judgment exceptions were taken and saved on the record.

The pleas rejected, so far as material, are covered by those filed, and there was no prejudicial error in rejecting those not filed. The issues presented by the demurrer and the several pleas and motions filed, and to which the evidence relates, will now be considered.

First, it is affirmed that said chapter 74, Acts 1907, amending and re-enacting §§ 18 and 20 of chapter 42, providing thereby for the alternative method of condemning land or easements by pipe line companies organized for transporting carbon oil or natural gas, is unconstitutional: (1) For infringing § 30, art. 6, of the Constitution (Code 1906, p. lx), providing that "no act hereafter passed shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in its title;" (2) for the infraction of § 39 of the same article (Code 1906, p. lxii), providing "and in no case shall a special act be passed, where a general law would be proper, and can be made applicable to the case;" (3) because violative of the due process provisions of § 10, art. 3 (Code 1906, p. li.), of our Constitution, and of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and (4) because it authorizes the taking of private property for public use without just compensation paid or secured to be paid, contrary to § 9, art. 3 (Code 1906, p. l.), of our Constitution.

On the first proposition it is contended that the object of the act is concealed in the title, and falls within the condemnation of our case of Stewart v. Tennant, 52 W. Va. 559, 572, 44 S. E. 223. The title of the act is: "An Act to Amend and Re-enact Sections Eighteen and Twenty of Chapter Forty-two of the Code, Relating to Taking Land Without the Owner's Consent for Purposes of Public Utility." Before the adoption of our Code of 1868, and in a proceeding begun under Code Va. 1860, and before the statute so specifically provided, the right of a pipe line company organized for transporting carbon oil, to take land by condemnation, was upheld by this court. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Volcanic Oil & Coal Co. 5 W. Va. 382, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 389. Prior to chapter 18, Acts 1881, our statute did not as therein enumerate the public uses for which private property might be taken or damaged. Among the purposes enumerated in § 2 of that act, is, "Fifth—For companies organized for the purpose of transporting carbon oil by means of pipes or otherwise." Pipe lines for transporting natural gas are not mentioned. So far as we know there were no pipe lines then existing in this state for transporting either oil or natural gas, except the West Virginia Transportation Company, plaintiff in the case just referred to. By chapter 7, Acts 1885, companies organized for transporting natural gas were included in said § 2, and the method of procedure prescribed for taking land for public utility was the same for all companies. The law so remained until the passage of the act of 1907, now in question. By § 18 of said chapter 42, as thus amended, pipe line companies were included along with railroad companies entitled to describe as to any or all of the land proposed to be taken an estate or interest therein less than a fee. And by the amendment of § 20 thereof, the alternative method of procedure for such pipe line companies was prescribed in the three paragraphs added thereto, and which paragraphs constitute the subject of the constitutional objections already alluded to. By the first of these paragraphs it is provided that, in addition to the other procedure, such company may at its election attempt to agree with the owner as to the damages, failing in which, it shall tender him a bond with sufficient surety to secure him payment of the damages, to which bond a plan showing the route of the proposed pipe line shall be attached; and upon the acceptance of this bond the right of the applicant to enter upon the enjoyment of the easement shall be complete; if the owner refuse to accept the bond, it is provided that the same shall be presented to the circuit court or the judge thereof in vacation, after five days' written notice to the owner stating the time and place of such proposed presentation, and which shall state that, unless exceptions to the form, amount, or surety of the bond be filed within three days after presentation, said bond shall be approved by the court. The second of the added paragraphs provides that if no exception be filed thereto, the court shall approve the bond and direct the same, with the plan attached, to be filed for the benefit of both owner and applicant; but if exception be filed, the court is required to fix a day, not more than five days thereafter, for the hearing thereof, and may require evidence as to the sufficiency of the sureties and amount of the bond, and may require new surety, and a bond for a larger amount, or in a more satisfactory form; and upon the approval of the bond and filing thereof, the right of the applicant to enter as aforesaid shall be complete. The third of the added paragraphs provides: "Upon petition of either the property owner or the applicant, at any time after said bond shall have been presented and filed, five disinterested freeholders shall be appointed as in this chapter provided, to serve as commissioners to ascertain what will be a just compensation to the person entitled thereto for the easement so appropriated, and thereafter the proceedings shall be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter."

The question now recurs, Is the object of the act so concealed as to render it void for embracing more than one object in its title? We think not. The only object of the amendment of said § 18 was to classify pipe line companies along with railroads as entitled in certain cases to take "an estate or interest less than a fee." This amendment was certainly fairly covered by the title of the act. The only purpose of the amendment of § 20, evidently because the legislature thought it expedient and proper, was to provide a more speedy and summary remedy for obtaining possession of the easement than in other cases. We see nothing in this not fairly covered by the title of the act. It is certainly comprehended in the title of the act amendatory of the general law relating to the taking of land without the owners' consent for the purpose of public utility. The only change effected is in the method of procedure and in the form of security, not in the essential rights of the owner of the land. His right of trial by jury on the question of damages, and to contest before the court the right to take the land, is fully preserved. In this case the court did not approve the bond or let the applicant into possession, until all issues on the pleas filed had been fully heard on the merits, a commendable practice, when, as in this case, the right to take and the public purpose of the taking have been challenged by the owner of the land. Besides, everything is covered into the general law. The act involved in Stewart v. Tennant was a special act; its title was: "An Act Concerning the Limitation of Actions in Certain Cases." As the court says in that case, an examination of the act shows its singleness of object, and that it is not constitutionally objectionable on that ground. The remaining question decided was whether that object was sufficiently expressed in the title, and it was held not to be so expressed. We need not repeat here the reasonings in that case differentiating it from a case like this, involving an act amendatory of a general law, covering the whole subject of taking private property for public utility. The generality of the title of the act involved in Stewart v. Tennant distinguishes it from this case, and renders inapt as well that case as other authorities cited and relied upon by the plaintiff in error, namely. 1 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 123; Beverly v. Waln, 57 N. J. L. 143, 144, 30 Atl. 545; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 205; Henrico County v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 832, 6 S. E. 232; State v. Steelman, 66 N. J. L. 518, 49 Atl. 978; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 582. In the act here involved the sections of the general law so amended were inserted at large in the new act, in compliance with another provision of § 30, art. 6, of the Constitution. The cases decisive of the real question here presented are Heath v. Johnson, 36 W. Va. 782, 15 S. E. 980, and Roby v. Sheppard, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. 278. In Heath v. Johnson, the act involved was entitled "An Act to Amend 'An Act to Amend and Re-enact Section Fifty-eight of Chapter Forty-five of the Code of West Virginia.'" That act was objected to as violative of article 6 of the Constitution. This court said in that case: "We do not think this objection to the law is sound. The provision cited seems to refer rather to original acts than to those which are only amendatory; but, supposing it to apply to the latter, when the amendment in its title points not only to the chapter which is to be amended, but to the very section, it seems to us to amount to a sufficient expression of the object of the law to prevent any of the evils which the constitutional provision was intended to remedy." The first point of the syllabus in that case is: "When the title of an original act of the legislature sufficiently expresses its object in the manner required by the Constitution, an act amendatory thereof may, by its title, simply refer to the section of the original act which it is intended to amend, and this will be a sufficient compliance with § 30 of article 6 of the Constitution." Roby v. Sheppard is equally in point, as points 2 and 3 of the syllabus, and the reasons of the court, 42 W. Va. at pages 289-292, inclusive, will show. See also 12 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 777.

The next question is, Does the amending act of 1907 violate § 39, art. 6, of the Constitution, inhibiting special legislation where a general law would be proper? It seems almost a waste of time to reply to this proposition in view of what has been said on the first. It is contended, however, that, as the amendments affected only pipe line companies transporting oil and natural gas, their effect was to single out that class of corporations and legislate specially with reference to them, and to bring the act within the inhibition of the Constitution. To support this proposition, counsel cite and rely on State ex rel. Courthouse & City Hall Comrs. v. Cooley, 56 Minn. 540, 58 N. W. 150; 1 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 149, 353; Re Church, 92 N. Y. 1; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338, 348; Wallis v. Williams, 101 Tex. 395, 108 S. W. 153; Palcher v. United States (C. C.) 11 Fed. 47; Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, 36 Am. Rep. 47; Groves v. County Ct. 42 W. Va. 596, 26 S. E. 460; McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 45 L.R.A. 609, 30 S. E. 239; Violet v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 31 L.R.A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825, 23 S. E. 909; Cooley, Const. Law, 241, 243, 244; Cooley, Const. Lim. 502; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663. We think these authorities quite inapt to support the proposition. All pipe line companies carrying oil and gas as a class are included in the provisions of the statute. The statute is but an amendment of the general law, which itself covers all classes of corporations given the right of eminent domain; none are excepted. The procedure for obtaining the land or easements thereon is the same, except that pipe line companies, if they so elect, may give the bond prescribed, and if accepted by the owner, or, if not, approved by the court, they may enter immediately. There was good reason in the mind of the legislature, no doubt, for this provision, to meet exigencies and conditions peculiar to that class of public service corporations. Can it be rightfully said that such an amendment of the general law amounts to a segregation of individuals or corporations from a class to which they properly belong, so as to bring it within the constitutional mandate? We think not. An examination of the authorities cited will show, we think, that they relate to special statutes, applicable to particular persons, less than a class. There is no more reason for saying that the act in question is special legislation, because it provides for an alternative method of procedure for pipe line companies in § 20, than for saying that § 18, before the amendment, was special legislation, because, with respect to railroads, it provided that they might take an estate or interest therein less than a fee. The general law before the amendment put corporations given the power of eminent domain into several classes. Pipe line companies for carrying oil and gas were put into a class by themselves. The special provisions of the statute as amended, objected to, cover all corporations of this class. State ex rel. Courthouse & City Hall Comrs. v. Cooley, relied on, says: "A law is general, in the constitutional sense, which applies to and operates uniformly upon all members of any class of persons; . . . while a special law is one which relates and applies to particular members of a class." Substantially the same definition is given in some of the other authorities cited. In the California case a statute which prohibited baking on Sunday was held unconstitutional, because it picked out the baking business only, making it class legislation, when the law would have been as applicable to all other traders as to it. Our cases of Groves v. County Ct. and McEldowney v. Wyatt are equally inapt. The first says: "Special laws are those made for individual cases, or for less than a class requiring laws appropriate to its peculiar condition and circumstances." McEldowney v. Wyatt says: "A statute relating to persons or things as a class is general law; one relating to particular persons or things of a class is special." In our opinion the act involved is not special legislation.

Next, is the statute violative of the due process provisions of our Constitution and of the Federal Constitution? Clearly not. Notwithstanding the provision for giving bond to make entry on the land, the applicant is not permitted, without acceptance by the owner, or upon due notice to him and approval by a court having jurisdiction, to put a single foot upon the land sought to be taken; and if, as in this case, any question is made as to the right of the applicant to take, or the public purpose for which he proposes to take the land, these questions will properly be tested by the court before approval of bond or right of entry become complete. Besides, would not injunction lie under the provisions of § 20, to protect the owner? Due process does not necessarily mean process of a court. "All that is essential is that 'in some appropriate way, before some properly constituted tribunal, inquiry shall be made as to the amount of compensation; and when this is provided for, there is that due process of law which is required.'" Brannon on the 14th Amendment, 467. The authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff in error are equally decisive of this proposition. Our decisions say: "Due process of law means, as used in said section, in the due course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights, securing to every person a judicial trial before he can be deprived of life, liberty, or property." Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 564; White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583; Williams v. Freeland, 19 W. Va. 599; Griffie v. Halstead, 19 W. Va. 602; Peerce v. Adamson, 20 W. Va. 57; State v. Spon-angle, 45 W. Va. 415, 43 L.R.A. 727, 32 S. E. 283. That the statute in question, by proper proceedings, fully protects the rights of the owner, not only appears from its provisions, but has complete demonstration in the present proceeding taken under it. Defendant has been permitted to make every defense and oppose every legal obstacle in the way which could possibly be afforded him. Why, therefore, should we dwell further on this proposition?

The next constitutional argument is based on § 9, art. 3, of our Constitution, against the taking of private property without just compensation paid, or secured to be paid. It is contended that the provision of § 20, relating to the giving of bond, does not satisfy the requirements of the Constitution, "paid, or secured to be paid." Certainly a bond, if good in form, sufficient in amount, and with sufficient surety, would satisfy the requirement "secured to be paid." But it is insisted that the land itself should be made the primary security, and title and the right reserved. This would not always furnish the best security for the liberal findings of commissioners and juries in such cases. The bond provided is to serve in case the owner and applicant are unable to agree. If the bond is deficient in form, amount, or surety, ample provision is made in the statute for correcting these defects. It is furthermore insisted that the bond should not be approved or entry made until the damages have been assessed by commissioners or jury. In the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) early Virginia case of Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe & J. River R. Co. 11 Leigh, 42, 36 Am. Dec. 374, a general statute passed at the session of 1836-37 gave similar rights to railroad companies to enter upon land before condemnation and assessment of damages, and providing for injunction against the owner from interference, except in certain cases. This statute was upheld by the Virginia court. This case is cited in Spencer v. Pt. Pleasant & O. R. Co. 23 W. Va. 406. Speaking of the Constitution and with reference to the statute there involved, providing that, after the damages should be assessed, the condemning railroad might be enjoined from the use of the right of way until the damages assessed should be fully paid, the court by judge Green says, 23 W. Va. at page 412: "Indeed, had the legislature gone still further and permitted a railroad company to take possession of the land it wanted to condemn, when it first instituted its proceedings to condemn the land, before even the appointment of commissioners, without paying anything to the owner, on simply giving a bond with approved security to pay the just compensation when ascertained, it would in so doing be complying with the words of our Constitution." True he adds: "But it does seem to me that it would be violating its spirit, if the spirit of this constitutional provision is correctly set forth by Chancellor Kent in the quotation which we have made from him, and I think that the real spirit of it is correctly stated by him." This expression is obiter. Chancellor Kent was apparently speaking of constitutional provisions limited to language like the first clause of our § 9, art. 3, providing that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use, without just compensation." But with reference to the taking of such property for the purpose of internal improvements, the language of the next provision is "until just compensation shall have been paid, or secured to be paid." The expression, "secured to be paid," must be construed according to the plain import of the words, unless a different meaning clearly appears from the context. A pipe line for transporting natural gas for the public use is an "internal improvement" within the meaning of our Constitution. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Volcanic Oil & Coal Co. supra, 5 W. Va. page 388, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 389. That a statute like the one in question here is not objectionable on constitutional grounds is clear from Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe & J. River R. Co. supra. Judge Tucker (11 Leigh, at page 80), says: "It seemed to be considered by the counsel, that the condemnation must precede the execution of the work. This is, I conceive, a misconception of the law. The company have a right to proceed with their work before condemnation; and, indeed, there is no absolute obligation on them to institute the process for assessing the damages to the land, since in case of their default the owner himself may do so. It is therefore clear that the work is not to be suspended until the damages are assessed and paid; and this is rendered more undeniable by the 13th section, which, in connection with the previous sections, provides that 'in the meantime' (that is, while the process of valuation or assessment is going on) 'no injunction shall be awarded to stay the proceedings of the company in the prosecution of their works, unless,' etc. It was not then necessary that the damages should have been assessed and paid before the company proceeded to the erection of their bridges." In Old Colony R. Co. v. Framingham Water Co. 153 Mass. 561, 13 L.R.A. 332, 27 N. E. 662, it was held that the provision for compensation for land taken by water companies, precisely the same as the public statute relating to railroad companies, except that the selectmen of the town were thereby made the tribunal to determine the sufficiency of the security instead of the county commissioners, was held to be sufficient, and not violative of the Constitution. That provision of the statute was that the water company might, "upon application by either party, require the company to give security to the selectmen of the town for payment of all damages that may be awarded to them; and if, upon petition of the owner, the security appears to the selectmen to have become insufficient, they shall require the giving of further security." The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Wallace v. New Castle Northern R. Co. 138 Pa. 168, 22 Atl. 95, construing a statute from which the provisions of our act now under consideration were evidently taken, held that, after a bond had been taken with security approved, a bill in equity would not lie against a railroad company to restrain the completion of the railroad, on the ground that both the railroad company and sureties had become insolvent. And speaking of the term "security" in the Constitution of that state, that court says: "The only reasonable, and therefore the true, construction of the word 'secured' in the Constitution, is that it shall be made reasonably safe or sure that the owner of the property taken shall be able to collect the compensation for it, and the words 'sufficient sureties' in the act must be construed to mean such sureties as at the time they are taken make it reasonably certain that the owner of the property taken can collect from them 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) a just compensation." According to these authorities, there can be no question that the bond provided for in the statute fully answers the requirement of the Constitution, "secured to be paid."

The next point of error urged is that the easement or right of way proposed is without width or depth or definite description. The plan attached to the bond shows the outside boundaries of defendant's land, and fixes the right of way or easement proposed to be taken through the same by reference to a distinct line of survey, with definite termini and definite and distinct courses and distances, so that there can be no doubt or controversy as to the true location of the line of the proposed right of way or easement. The petition filed by the applicant even more definitely describes this line, and alleges that the only pipe line which petitioner proposes to lay upon said route will be 6 inches in diameter, and will be used exclusively for the transportation of natural gas. The application we think conforms strictly to the letter as well as the spirit of the statute. The plan required by the statute is one "showing the route of the proposed pipe line over said land." The plan attached to the bond in this case does that. Can more be required? We think not. The petition says the pipes will be buried under the surface of the ground to such a depth as not to interfere with the use of the land for agricultural purposes. True, the application calls for no specific width, but the proposal is for a mere right of way or easement to bury a 6-inch pipe line upon defendant's land and maintain it there. When so buried, the surface will be subject to use and occupation by the owner, except in so far as such use and occupation may interfere with petitioner's right to install and maintain the pipe line in place. After installation all that a right of way or easement of this character would call for would be right of entry and of ingress and egress to keep the line in repair. Unless a definite width should be actually taken to the exclusion of the owner of the fee, which would be unduly burdensome on both applicant and owner, no definite width could be accurately described. But it is argued that without width and depth it will be impossible to determine the damages. We think there is no difficulty confronting commissioners or juries on this score. The character of the entry and of the use and occupation of land for an easement or right of way of this character is so well understood in the country these days that we think a jury would find little difficulty, certainly not more so than in other cases, in reaching a proper estimate of the damages: not only this, but the jury could and would be enlightened by evidence on the question, and thereafter the owner of the right of way or easement would always be confined to a reasonable use, and liable to damages for abuse of his right. We think the statute clearly contemplates the taking of such a right of way or easement. Our case of Crosier v. Brown, 66 W. Va. 273, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, 66 E. E. 326, says in the first point of the syllabus, that "an easement of private way over land must have a particular definite line." That case related to a private way over another's land. It had no particular width or depth. In Lovett v. West Virginia Central Gas Co. 65 W. Va. 739, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 230, 65 S. E. 196, the gas company it seems had condemned strips 18 inches wide through two tracts of land, which, of course, might be done, but everyone knows that 18 inches would not be sufficient for ingress and egress in the work of laying and maintaining such a pipe line. The question which we have here, however, was not decided in that case. In Cincinnati Gas Transp. Co. v. Wilson, 70 W. Va. 157, 73 S. E. 306, the proposition was apparently the same as in this case, to take a mere right of way or easement less than a fee over defendant's land. The only question decided there which can have any application here was that in such cases the landowner is entitled to damages not alone for the estate or interest actually taken, but also damages to the residue, the fee in the whole tract, including therein the fee in that part of the tract covered by such right of way. We are of opinion to overrule this point of error.

The next point is that the public use of the proposed right of way or easement is not sufficiently shown to warrant the judgment complained of. This question is raised by the demurrer, by the pleas filed, as well as by some of those rejected. The cases relied upon in support of this proposition are: Valley City Salt Co. v. Brown, 7 W. Va. 198, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 397; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 812; Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 534; Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. v. Benwood Iron Works, 31 W. Va. 710, 2 L.R.A. 680, 8 S. E. 453; Fork Ridge Baptist Cemetery Asso. v. Reed, 33 W. Va. 262, 10 S. E. 405; Fallsburg Power & Mfg. Co. v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 61 L.R.A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855, 43 S. E. 194; Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410; Caretta R. Co. v. Virginia-Pocahontas Coal Co. 62 W. Va. 185, 57 S. E. 401. In substance it is said of them that they affirm the following propositions: (1) That the use which the public is to have of the property taken must be fixed and definite, and on terms and charges fixed by law; (2) that such public use must be a substantial beneficial one, obviously needful for the public, which it cannot do without, except by suffering great loss or inconvenience; (3) that the necessity for condemnation must be apparent, and that the public need must be an imperative one. These propositions are drawn mainly from the language of Judge Green in Varner v. Martin, supra. That case involved the constitutionality of an act of the legislature giving right to take the land of another for a private way. The questions involved were rather legislative than judicial. The propositions were correctly applied in that case. True it is, however, that courts may generally inquire into the question whether the property proposed to be taken is for a public use, even though the condemner be of a class of persons or corporations authorized to take land for public use. The court below properly exercised this jurisdiction in this case. It permitted issues to be made up to try this question, and by finding and adjudging that the petitioner had the right to take the property by condemnation, it necessarily decided that the use to which the right of way or easement proposed to be taken was to be devoted was a public use, giving the right to take. We do not propose to enter upon any lengthy discussion or review of the prior decisions of the court.

On the first proposition, that the public use must be fixed and definite, and on terms and charges fixed by law, we observe first, that the legislature by general law has conferred upon pipe line companies organized for transporting oil and natural gas, the right of eminent domain, and has thereby necessarily imposed upon them, as public service corporations, the right and duty of performing a public service. That right and duty is fixed as firmly as if written into the statute. Pipe lines for transporting oil must carry oil, as railroads must carry passengers and freight, at reasonable rates, if such rates are not fixed by statute. Pipe line companies organized for transporting gas must serve the people with gas, under reasonable and proper regulations, along the entire line traversed, and for reasonable rates fixed by themselves or by statute, or by contracts or ordinances of municipalities. Are not the rights of the public so fixed sufficiently definite to answer the requirements of the law? We think so. The rights of the people are thus protected in nearly every case where the public is served by public service corporations furnishing water, gas, electricity, or transportation. Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410, and Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, 70

W. Va. 83, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 602, 73 S. E. 86, recent decisions of this court, support these conclusions. Calor Oil & Gas Co. v. Franzell, 128 Ky. 715, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 456, 109 S. W. 328, as well as Olmsted v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. L. 311, are likewise in point. So, also, are the cases of Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 32 L. ed. 979, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 133, 24 L. ed. 86.

On the question of the public necessity for the use of the property, covered by the last two propositions relied on, it may be said generally, that when a public service corporation is organized to serve the public, it assumes the duties and responsibilities incident to that service and imposed upon it by law. If such corporation be a pipe line company to transport or serve the public with gas, it must of necessity have land or rights of way from the source of supply to the places of consumption. It is unnecessary to argue at this day that natural gas for light, heat, and power is of great public utility, and if the public is served there is imperious demand for rights of way or easements in that service. Where a public service corporation has a public duty to perform, what is necessary in the way of easements and other means of performing this service is largely a matter within its discretion. It is so with railroad companies, and we see no reason why the same rule should not apply to pipe line companies transporting gas. When the legislature clothed this class of companies with the power of eminent domain, we must assume that it understood the nature of the public service to be performed, and determined that there was sufficient public necessity therefor. Want of general public necessity was urged in Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, supra, and the question was there met on the authority of Lewis on Eminent Domain, by the proposition that the question was not a judicial but a legislative one; that whether necessity for taking the land exists in favor of the condemnor is largely a matter for its own determination.

But it is argued that but few persons are or will be served in West Virginia by the proposed pipe line; that most of the gas is and will be transported into Pennsylvania; that the petitioner is a corporation under the laws of Pennsylvania, and that its principal business is to produce gas and transport it into that state, and that the sovereign right of eminent domain is properly limited to the service of the people of the state where the power is invoked. While the petitioner is a foreign corporation, it avers and proves its authority to do business in this state. Having obtained authority to do business here, § 30, chap. 54, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Code 1906, confers upon it the same rights, powers, and privileges, and imposes upon it the same duties and liabilities, and subjects it to the same rules and regulations, as domestic corporations. Floyd v. National Loan & Invest. Co. 49 W. Va. 327, 54 L.R.A. 536, 87 Am. St. Rep. 805, 38 S. E. 653. Section 24, chapter 52, of the Code, provides that "such company shall, for the purpose of transporting natural gas, oils, and water, be considered and held to be a common carrier, and subject to all the duties and liabilities of such carriers under the laws of this state." The petition avers, and the evidence shows, that petitioner is serving many persons in this state with gas. True, but few at present are being served by the particular line in question, but it avers and proves its willingness to serve all persons applying, subject to its proper rules and regulations. It avers and proves that it has fixed reasonable prices and rates for such service. If the petitioner is serving the people of West Virginia with gas, and all who apply, as it avers and proves, it cannot be denied the right of eminent domain because it serves the people in another state into which its pipe lines go. There is not a particle of evidence in the case showing or tending to show that petitioner has ever neglected its duty toward the people of this state. That but few are shown to be taking gas from the particular line sought to be extended through defendant's land is of little consequence. The petitioner is seeking business. Practically the same objections were interposed to the rights of the petitioner in Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, and were met in the same way that we have met them here.

Lastly, it is urged that it was error to deny the defendant the right of trial by jury, on the question of the public need or benefit of the proposed pipe line. This the authorities hold is a judicial question, and not one of fact to be tried by a jury. Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, supra; Sisson v. Buena Vista County, 128 Iowa, 442, 70 L.R.A. 440, 104 N. W. 454.

The foregoing conclusions lead to an affirmation of the judgment, and this will be the mandate of the court.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(Division No. 1.)

PETER DE FORD, Appt.,

v.

ISAAH JOHNSON, Respt.

(— Mo. —, 158 S. W. 29.)

Husband and wife — alienation of affections — divorce — effect of statute.

1. A statute depriving the party against whom a decree of divorce is granted of all rights and claims under and by virtue of the marriage does not deprive him of a right of action for alienation of his wife's affections before the decree was granted. Same — effect of decree.

2. A decree of divorce against a man does not deprive him of the right to damages against one who alienates the affections of his wife before the divorce is granted.

(May 31, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in defendant's favor in an action brought Note. — Divorce or separation as affecting action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation.

As to conclusiveness of the decree of divorce as to the facts upon which the action for criminal conversation or alienation of affections is based, see note to Luke v. Hill, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, which covers the general question as to conclusiveness, as to third persons, of a decree of divorce, as to the facts adjudicated, as distinguished from the status established.

The present note assumes that the party bringing the action is one ordinarily entitled to maintain an action of the nature herein under discussion. (As to right of wife under modern married women's acts to sue for alienation of the affections of her husband, see note to Nolin v. Pearson, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643.)

Aside from a few decisions in which the decree of divorce is held to be res judicata as to the issues raised in the alienation or criminal conversation cases, the general rule is that a divorce does not bar an action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation, but that evidence thereof may be admitted in the latter actions. Likewise it is the majority rule that articles of separation do not bar such an action.

Divorce—in general.

The following cases support the general rule that a decree of divorce does not bar an action for previous alienation of affections or criminal conversation or seduction: Ash v. Prunier, 44 C. C. A. 675, 105 Fed. 722 (seduction); Prettyman v. Williamson, 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731 (criminal conversation and alienation of affections); Sackheim v. Miller, 136 Ill. App. 132 (alienation of affections); Postlewaite v. Postlewaite, 1 Ind. App. 473, 28 N. E. 99 (alienation of affections); Gregg v. Gregg, 37 Ind. App. 210, 75 N. E. 674 (alienation of affections); Michael v. Dunkle, 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100 (criminal conversation); Wales v. Miner, 89 Ind. 118 (criminal conversation or seduction); Wood v. Mathews, 47 Iowa, 409 (criminal conversation); Bergman v. Solomon, 143 Ky. 581, 136 S. W. 1010 (alienation of affections); Dickerman v. Graves, 6 Cush. 308, 53 Am. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to recover damages for alleged alienation of the affections of plaintiff's wife. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bird & Pope, for appellant:

A husband's right of action for alienation of affections is personal, and is not barred by a judgment of divorce.

W. 1073 (criminal conversation). In Beach v. Brown, supra, in determining the right of a wife who had obtained a divorce to maintain an action for alienation of affections, the court discussed the effect of the divorce decree in the following interesting language: "But the action in this case was brought by the respondent after she had obtained a divorce from her husband, and it is therefore urged by appellant that, if she ever had the right to bring this action, it was lost when she sought and obtained a divorce; that all rights were settled by the decree of divorce; and cases from this court are cited to sustain that contention. But we do not think that the cases cited or the law bear upon this character of rights. It could not, in the very nature of things, have been contemplated in the divorce decree. It is a damage which is peculiar to the wife, which the husband, under no rule of right, could have any interest in; and it would be a harsh rule of law that, conceding that the wife had this right during coverture, would deprive her of the right when the wrongful acts of which she complains created the necessity for and caused the action for divorce. Of course the damages could not be calculated after the time when the decree of

No proof was made as to the effect of a divorce rendered in Idaho. The Missouri statute being penal, there is no presumption that there is a similar statute in Idaho.

St. Sure v. Lindsfelt, 82 Wis. 346, 19 L.R.A. 515, 33 Am. St. Rep. 50, 52 N. W. 308.

divorce was obtained." And in Michael v. Dunkle, 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100, supra, it was said that after the discovery by the husband of his wife's infidelity it was not strange that he permitted her to obtain a divorce (obtained upon the ground of cruelty), and that he did not thereby waive or lose his right to redress for the injury done, as it would not be in the interest of good order and the public morals to permit the seducer of a wife to set up the divorce as a complete defense in such case.

So in Philpott v. Kirkpatrick, 171 Mich. 495, 137 N. W. 232, it was held that a husband was not estopped from maintaining a suit for alienation of his wife's affections by reason of having previously brought a divorce suit in which he complained of the present defendant's interference with his domestic relations, and in which he obtained a decree of divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty, it being said that the respective positions of the plaintiff in the two suits were not so inconsistent as to work an estoppel. And in Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. 636, it was held that the fact that a wife obtained a divorce from her husband, based upon his misconduct, did not of itself constitute a defense to an action by him for alienation of her affections, if, notwithstanding the misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, his wife would not have sued him for divorce if it had not been for the acts, conduct, and influence of the defendant (in the alienation action), whereby he induced her to sue for divorce.

And it has been held that a decree of divorce obtained in one jurisdiction, which is invalid in another jurisdiction, does not bar an action for criminal conversation, brought in the latter jurisdiction. Berney v. Adriance, 157 App. Div. 628, 142 N. Y. Supp. 748; C. v. D. 8 Ont. L. Rep. 308, appeal dismissed in 12 Ont. L. Rep. 24.

See also other note referred to at the beginning of the present note.

It is generally conceded that evidence of the fact that a divorce has been granted is admissible. This privilege has been granted upon various grounds, but the extent to which the record in the divorce proceeding may be introduced is a question 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon which there is a considerable conflict of authority.

Thus, it has been held that evidence that a decree of divorce was obtained by the plaintiff after the doing of the acts complained of in the action for alienation of affections is admissible in the latter action for the purpose of showing the termination or dissolution of the marriage relation. Waldron v. Waldron, 45 Fed. 315; Waldson v. Larson, 90 C. C. A. 422, 164 Fed. 548.

And it has been held that the fact that a divorce has been granted may be shown for the purpose of negating any claim that there had been, up to the time of the divorce, a reconciliation between the plaintiff and his wife. Mead v. Randall, 111 Mich. 268, 69 N. W. 506.

And in the following cases it was held that the fact that a divorce was granted subsequent to the acts complained of in the alienation or criminal conversation action may be considered in mitigation of damages, for the reason that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover any compensation for the loss of affection, services, society, etc., of his wife after she ceased to be his wife. Prettyman v. Williamson, 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731 (criminal conversation and alienation of affections); McNamara v. McAllister, 150 Iowa, 243, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 436, 130 N. W. 26, Ann. Cas. 1912 D, 463 (alienation of affections); Bergman v. Solomon, 143 Ky. 581, 136 S. W. 1010 (holding that the record of the divorce suit, showing withdrawal of the defense and admission of the charges of cruelty made by the wife, was admissible as tending to show that his feelings were not damaged to the extent alleged in his alienation of affections action); Purdy v. Robinson, 133 App. Div. 155, 117 N. Y. Supp. 295 (criminal conversation and alienation of affections).

So, in Lee v. Hammond, 114 Wis. 550, 90 N. W. 1073, it was held that both the fact that a divorce had been granted and the ground upon which it was obtained formed legitimate evidence in an action for criminal conversation.

And in Hardwick v. Hardwick, 130 Iowa, 230, 106 N. W. 639, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff's husband had instituted a suit for divorce, and that it was subsequently dismissed, was properly admitted in evidence in the action for alienation of affections, where, from statements by defendant, it was inferable that he had participated in the matter both of bringing the suit and its dismissal.

And in Sackheim v. Miller, 136 Ill. App. 132, the court held that both the bill of complaint and the decree in the divorce action, which was in favor of the wife of the plaintiff in the alienation action, were admissible in evidence in the latter action upon the ground that evidence sufficient to warrant the granting of a divorce would tend to prove that the love and affection of the plaintiff's wife were alienated by the plaintiff himself.

And the record of the divorce suit was held admissible in evidence in an action for alienation of affections in Bergman v. Solomon, 143 Ky. 581, 136 S. W. 1010, where the plaintiff in the latter action had withdrawn his answer and admitted the charges of cruelty made in the complaint in the divorce action, the court saying that such course tended to show that he was willing to get rid of his wife.

But in Sickler v. Mannix, 68 Neb. 21, 93 N. W. 1018, wherein it was contended that a divorce decree obtained by the husband upon the ground of extreme cruelty was admissible in evidence in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the divorced wife for alienation of her husband's affections, as tending to explain the reason why the husband refused to live with his wife, it was held that the divorce record was properly excluded, the then present defendant not having been a party to the divorce proceeding, the court saying that it is only where a judicial record contains an admission of one or the other of the parties to it that it is admissible in favor of a stranger, and that in the case under consideration the wife not only had not admitted the charges, but had denied and contested them. The court further said that the fact that the court found against her on the trial did not make the findings admissible in such a case.

And in Waldron v. Waldron, 45 Fed. 315, where the action was by a wife for alienating the affections of her husband during a period preceding the time of the obtaining by her of a divorce, which, acting on the status of the parties, dissolved the marriage and left each free to remarry, it was held that neither allegations in the complaint in the divorce action nor evidence taken upon the trial of that action was admissible in evidence in the alienation action as against one who was not a party to the divorce action.

And in Mead v. Randall, 111 Mich. 268, 69 N. W. 506, it was held that the bill of complaint in the divorce proceeding, being an ex parte statement of the plaintiff, not himself a competent witness, was not admissible in an action for alienation of affections and seduction.

So, in Woldson v. Larson, 90 C. C. A. 422, 164 Fed. 548, it was held that a decree of divorce obtained since the occurrence of the tort complained of in an action for alienation of affections was admissible neither for the purpose of showing the ground on which the divorce was obtained nor as proof of the fact with which the defendant in the alienation action, who was not a party to the divorce proceeding, was charged.

Separation agreements.

As before stated, the general rule is that separation agreements do not bar either an action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation; but in some cases it has been held that no right of action exists where the consortium has been voluntarily relinquished, but it seems that this fact should be considered in mitigation of damages rather than as raising a bar to an action.

Thus, it has been held that a written agreement between a husband and wife, whereby the wife assumed to release her marital rights, and in which a separation lication cannot affect property rights of the defendant in another state.

Coulter*, 29 App. Div. 85, 51 N. Y. Supp. 804.

And in Silvernall v. Westerman, 11 Luzerne, Leg. Reg. 5, where the defendant "separated" from his wife, it seems to have been assumed that the separation did not bar the bringing by him of an action of criminal conversation against her paramour. In this case the nature of the separation was not reported, but it seems to have been regarded in effect as a divorce.

And in Jenkins v. Chism, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 736, 76 S. W. 405, it was held that articles of separation under which the wife did not receive anything for her support did not bar her right of action against a third person for alienation of affections. The failure of the separation agreement to provide for the wife's support was assigned as the reason for so holding. But that the provision for support would not bar the action, but would merely affect the damages recoverable, see Metcalf v. Tiffany, 106 Mich. 504, 64 N. W. 479, wherein it was held that a separation agreement made upon a valuable consideration, which released the husband from all obligations to support and maintain the wife, merely barred recovery of damages for loss of support in an action by her for alienation of affections.

And it seems to be the present law of England that a deed of separation does not bar an action for damages for alienation of affections or criminal conversation. See Izard v. Izard, L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 45, 58 L. J. Prob. N. S. 83, 60 L. T. N. S. 399, 37 Week. Rep. 496 (holding that such is the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

If the Idaho decree had purported to affect any of defendant's rights, the courts of Missouri would not be bound to enforce that judgment.

Caulfield*, 6 East, 245; and the opinion of the House of Lords as reported in L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 46, note. Earlier English cases seemingly adopted a different view. See Weedon v. Timbrell, 5 T. R. 357; Malcomson v. Givins, L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 45, note; and Bartelot v. Hawker, 1 Peake, N. P. Cas. 7. Weadon v. Timbrell, supra, was followed, but by a divided court, in Patterson v. McGregor, 28 U. C. Q. B. 280.

But where a criminal conversation takes place after a separation agreement which was voluntarily entered into has become effective, it has been held that the agreement is a complete bar to an action based upon the criminal conversation. Fry v. Drestler, 2 Yeates, 278. A distinction was drawn in this case between separation agreements voluntarily entered into and those to which the aggrieved party did not willingly consent, it being said that in the latter case the aggrieved party was not barred from bringing an action for criminal conversation, even though the offensive acts occurred after the separation. And in Buckel v. Suss, 28 Abb. N. C. 21, 18 N. Y. Supp. 719, affirmed on opinion below in 2 Misc. 571, 21 N. Y. Supp. 907, where the action was for enticing away plaintiff's husband and depriving her of his "comfort, society, consort, aid, and assistance," the damages recoverable for which are the loss of the "society, comfort, and assistance" of the husband, it was held that a separation agreement voluntarily entered into under sanction of the court barred the action, it being said that the legal separation renounced the elements upon which she must rely to sustain her action. But this case has been questioned,—see Hendrick v. Biggar, 66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. Supp. 162, affirmed on condition of remission of damages in 151 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. Supp. 306.

G. J. C.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

December 28, 1906, the plaintiff sued the defendant in the circuit court of Jackson county for an alleged alienation of his wife's affections. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $5,500, and upon defendant's appeal to the Kansas City court of appeals the judgment was reversed for error in an instruction. 152 Mo. App. 209, 133 S. W. 393. In the opinion of the Kansas City court of appeals it is stated that the answer was a general denial. The record before us shows that on October 1, 1908, the plaintiff filed an amended petition, asking for damages in the aggregate sum of $25,000. Of these alleged damages $15,000 is denominated actual and $10,000 punitive. The court of appeals passed upon the case in January, 1911, and October 6, 1911, the defendant amended its answer in advance of the retrial nisi. The answer in this record has two strings to its bow. First we have a general denial. For a further defense the new answer thus speaks: "And for further answer to plaintiff's petition, this defendant says that during that time that Mary De Ford was the wife of the plaintiff, he was guilty of such cruel neglect and barbarous treatment of his said wife as to cause her to institute suit against him for divorce, and on the 26th day of May, 1909, Mary De Ford, the wife of the plaintiff, at their home in the city of Grangeville, in Idaho county, in the state of Idaho, instituted such suit in the district court of said county and state, against the plaintiff, Peter De Ford, for divorce, and afterward, to wit, on the 3d day of September, 1909, in said court, a decree of divorce was adjudged in favor of the said Mary De Ford and against the said Peter De Ford, the plaintiff herein, and he was adjudged the guilty party; and that by reason of said judgment and decree in said suit for divorce, the plaintiff has thereby forfeited all rights and claims under and by virtue of his marriage with the said Mary De Ford, and plaintiff is thereby barred from any claim or right of recovery in this action. Wherefore, having fully answered, this defendant asks to be discharged with its proper costs." Reply to this new answer was a general denial. The bill of exceptions filed is in abbreviated form, and was evidently so framed as to present a single issue. The bill of exceptions contains this recitation: "And said plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove all the allegations of his petition filed in the above-entitled cause. And said defendant, as a part of the cross-examination of the plaintiff himself, offered in evidence a certified copy of original complaint, summons, alias summons, and judgment in the case of Mary E. De Ford, Plaintiff, v. Peter De Ford, Defendant, in the district court of Idaho county, state of Idaho. To the introduction of which complaint, summons, alias summons, and judgment in evidence, plaintiff objected as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and of no extraterritorial effect, and no defense to the prosecution of this action, and of no binding force upon him in this action in the state of Missouri. The court: Objection overruled. To which action, order, and ruling of the court counsel for plaintiff then and there duly excepted."

The bill of exceptions then contains a full transcript of all the proceedings in the Idaho court of this divorce proceeding, from the petition to the judgment. The petition in the divorce suit was filed May 26, 1909. Proof of service of summons in the divorce case thus reads:

State of Kansas, County of Wyandotte.

James R. Pollard, being duly sworn, says: That he is a citizen of the United States over the age of twenty-one years, and a resident of Kansas City, State of Missouri, and not a party to nor in anywise interested in the action mentioned in the annexed alias summons; that he personally served the within alias summons on the defendant named in said alias summons, Peter De Ford, by delivering to and leaving with said Peter De Ford, said defendant, personally at Kansas City, state of Kansas, on the 14th day of June, 1909, a copy of said alias summons, together with a copy of the complaint in the action named in the said alias summons attached to said copy of alias summons.

James R. Pollard.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of June, 1909.

O. Q. Claffin,

Notary Public of the County of Wyandotte, State of Kansas. [Notarial Seal.]

The grounds for divorce, as stated in the petition, are: "That the said defendant for more than two years last past wilfully neglected to provide plaintiff with the common necessities of life, because of his idleness, profligacy, and dissipation. That on or about November, 1906, the defendant, disregarding the solemnity of his marriage vows, wilfully and without cause deserted and abandoned the plaintiff, and ever since has and still continues so to wilfully and without cause desert and abandon the plaintiff, and to live separate and apart from her without sufficient cause or any reason, and against her will and without her consent."

The judgment, so far as material, reads: "Whereupon witnesses on the part of the plaintiff were duly sworn and examined, and, the evidence being closed, the cause was submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and after deliberation thereon, and it appearing to the court that all material allegations of the complaint are sustained by testimony free from all legal exceptions as to its competency, admissibility, and sufficiency, and it also appearing to said court that said defendant was duly served with summons, and all and singular the law and the premises being by the court here understood and fully considered, wherefore, it is here ordered, adjudged, and decreed, and this does order, adjudge, and decree that the marriage between the said plaintiff, Mary E. De Ford, and the said defendant, Peter De Ford, be dissolved, and the same is hereby dissolved, and the said parties are, and each of them is, free and absolutely released from the bonds of matrimony and all the obligations thereof."

On his cross-examination the plaintiff admitted that he was the Peter De Ford mentioned in the divorce proceeding, and further admitted that, "about five months after said decree of divorce was granted said Mary E. De Ford, his wife, he was married to one Elder Childers in Kansas City, Wyandotte county, Kansas, the same county in which said summons in the divorce case of said Mary E. De Ford was served upon him by James R. Pollard on June 14, 1909, and that the said second wife died thereafter on October 15, 1910."

The bill of exceptions, as duly signed and allowed by the trial judge, then further recites: "At the close of the evidence on the part of plaintiff, the defendant asks the court to give the following instruction, to wit: 'The court instructs the jury that under the pleadings and the evidence in this case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant.' And said instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence having been argued by counsel and considered by the court given, but solely and entirely for the reason as stated, held, and decided by the court at the time, that the right of the plaintiff to recover herein, as made by his evidence, was lost and destroyed by reason of the fact that since the plaintiff had commenced his said action herein his wife, Mary E. De Ford, had obtained said decree of divorce from him in the district court of Idaho county, state of Idaho, as shown by the said record of said divorce proceeding introduced in evidence, and in and by said decree of divorce said Peter De Ford had been adjudged the guilty party, and that thereby he had forfeited his right to have and to further proceed with the cause of action sued for herein, to all of which finding, decision, and judgment, and each part thereof, plaintiff duly excepted. And thereupon the court gave and read said instructions to the jury, in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, said plaintiff duly excepting, and thereupon plaintiff took an involuntary nonsuit herein, with leave to file a motion herein, to set the same aside, which the court granted." After an unsuccessful motion to set aside the nonsuit, the plaintiff brings the case here by appeal.

I. Much is said in the briefs as to whether a certain statute of Missouri should be considered as effective in this case. This statute is relied upon by the defendant. It is now § 2378, Rev. Stat. 1909, and so far as applicable reads: "In all cases of divorce from the bonds of matrimony, the guilty party shall forfeit all rights and claims under and by virtue of the marriage." Plaintiff urges that the statute is penal in character, and hence there is no presumption of a similar statute in Idaho, or, in other words, that we cannot, in absence of proof the Idaho law, presume that it is the same as the Missouri law. In the view we have of the case it is a waste of energy to discuss this question. For our discussion we shall proceed upon the theory that Idaho did have such a statute as our statute, § 2378, supra. That statute has no application to a case like the one at bar. Alienation of the wife's affections is a tortious act of some third person as against the rights of the husband. The right to sue is one which must arise whilst the marital relations exist, but it is not a right which grows out of the marital relation, and is not one of the forfeited rights mentioned in the statute. The "rights and claims" referred to in this statute are rights and claims, between husband and wife, which spring up by reason of the marriage, and the statute has no reference whatever to the tortious act of a third party during the existence of the marriage relation, which tortious act gives the husband a cause of action as against such third party. To put an A B C case, if a railway company cripple and injure the wife of A, so that he is deprived of her society and aid, is the right of action a right and claim "under and by virtue of the marriage?" We think not. Neither is the cause of action stated in this petition such a claim or right. Cases cited by learned counsel for the defendant are not in point. They discuss claims and rights which really grow out of the marriage contract and marriage relation. They do not discuss the rights of a husband for the tortious acts of a third party occurring whilst the marriage relation exists. This statute has no bearing upon the case at bar. A reading of it should have been sufficient for the trial court.

II. By the petition the wrongful and tortious acts of the defendant are charged to have occurred in the years of 1905 and 1906. The divorce proceeding was in 1909. If the defendant violated the rights of the plaintiff, and if he wronged the plaintiff, such wrong was done whilst the marital relation existed. Plaintiff in the brief urges many reasons against the admission of the Idaho judgment and decree of divorce, but these we shall pass. We shall give to that judgment full credit, and permit it to have all the weight to which it is entitled. The question then arises, Does that judgment bar and foreclose the right of plaintiff in this action? To this question we answer, "No." The tort was complete before this divorce. That such an action is a tort and personal action belonging to the injured spouse is clearly shown by the case law. Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L.R.A. 553, 23 N. E. 17; Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 Ann. Cas. 658; Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. 636; Clow v. Chapman, 125 Mo. loc. cit. 105, 26 L.R.A. 412, 46 Am. St. Rep. 468, 28 S. W. 328.

That a judgment for divorce, even at the husband's fault, is not a bar to an action of this kind, is clearly shown by the authorities. In Michael v. Dunkle, 84 Ind. loc. cit. 545, 33 Am. Rep. 100, it is said: "The evidence shows, or tends strongly to show, without conflict, that before the criminal intercourse occurred the appellee and wife had finally separated, that they did not afterwards live together, and that before the commencement of this action she obtained a decree of final divorce from him; and upon these facts it is insisted that the appellee was not entitled to recover. We think otherwise. The woman was still the appellee's wife, and notwithstanding the differences which had led to the separation, which it seems was caused by his cruelty, there might have been a reconciliation between them; and indeed there is evidence that the appellee was seeking to bring this about at the time when the offenses of the appellant were committed and discovered. After this discovery, it is not strange that the appellee permitted his wife, without resistance, to obtain a divorce; but he did not thereby waive or lose his right to redress for the injury done. It would not be in the interests of good order and the public morals to permit the seducer of a wife to set up a disagreement, or even a separation, between her and the husband, as a complete defense to an action by the latter for the wrong."

In Wales v. Miner, 89 Ind. 118, the rule is well stated in the second syllabus thus: "That the plaintiff and his wife were divorced before the suit was begun is no defense to a suit for criminal conversation." In that case the wife got the divorce, and the suit was not brought until after the divorce had been granted.

In Wood v. Mathews, 47 Iowa, loc. cit. 411, that court upon this point says: "The evidence shows that after the injuries complained of, and before this action was brought, the plaintiff's wife procured a divorce from him. The court instructed that this constitutes no defense to an action for damages against the defendant for any injuries which he may have sustained prior to the time of procuring the divorce. Appellant complains of the giving of this instruction. In it there is no error. Actions of this kind, after a decree of divorce, were maintained in Dickerman v. Graves, 6 Cush. 308, 53 Am. Dec. 41, and in Ratcliff v. Wales, 1 Hill, 63."

In 21 Cyc. p. 1620, the rule, well supported by authority, is thus announced: "Where the wife's right to sue is recognized she may maintain her action, although she has subsequently obtained a divorce from her husband; and the husband may likewise recover for alienation of his wife's affections in a proper case, although she has obtained a divorce. A separation agreement between husband and wife is no defense to an action for alienating the husband's affections."

We are not without authority in this state. In Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. loc. cit. 646, this court said: "The fourth, fifth, and sixth instructions for plaintiff announce with special clearness and force the true doctrine applicable to the facts of the case, and all other cases when the same question arises. They declare the general doctrine that, although the jury may believe that plaintiff's wife obtained a divorce from him, and that she made plaintiff's misconduct ground for obtaining said divorce, yet, if the jury believe that, notwithstanding such misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, his wife would not have separated or remained apart from him, or sued him for a divorce, if it had not been for the acts, conduct, and influence of defendant toward her, and that defendant purposely and intentionally, by such acts, conduct, and influence, induced her to so separate or remain apart from plaintiff, or sue him for a divorce, then the fact that plaintiff's wife obtained such a divorce on account of plaintiff's misconduct does not, of itself, constitute any defense to this suit. That doctrine is not the doctrine announced in the third and fourth instructions given for the defendant. They assert another and a different doctrine, and we think an erroneous one. In effect, they declare, as matter of law, that if the plaintiff was addicted to habitual drunkenness for the space of one year next before the separation of the plaintiff and his wife, or the institution of her said suit for a divorce against the plaintiff, the wife of plaintiff had a just cause for said separation and for the institution of said suit for a divorce, and that the verdict should be for the defendant regardless of whether the defendant, or anyone else, advised her to do so or not. The first proposition contained in the above instruction may be, and doubtless is, correct, but the second is by no means true. The wife may have a just cause for separation or divorce, but she may elect to abide by her situation, and remain with her husband nevertheless. If she chooses to do so, no stranger has the right to intermeddle with the domestic and marital relations of husband and wife; and, if he voluntarily does so, he is amenable for the consequences." In the McPike Case there was a decree of divorce introduced in evidence which showed that the wife had procured the divorce on account of the fault of the husband. Our court declined to recognize such decree as a bar to plaintiff's action against the third party for the wrong occurring during the time of the marriage relation.

In Clow v. Chapman, 125 Mo. 101, 26 L.R.A. 412, 46 Am. St. Rep. 468, 28 S. W. 328, the suit for alienation was prosecuted by the wife after the marriage relation had been severed. This case also recognizes the doctrine that the action is one in tort, and not a right growing out of the marriage status.

The petition in this case charges that the plaintiff was forced to separate from his wife by reason of defendant's conduct. The bill of exceptions says that there was evidence tending to prove all the allegations of plaintiff's petition. As said by the Indiana court, supra, it is not strange that plaintiff made no defense to the action for divorce, grounded as it was, as indicated by the record in our statement set out. The decree of divorce was perhaps proper evidence. The plaintiff could not recover for defendant's conduct toward his wife after the divorce. Defendant was liable for all his tortious acts, if any, which occurred whilst the marriage relations existed, and the decree in divorce, even though obtained on the alleged fault of the husband, is no bar to plaintiff's action.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, to the end that it may be reinstated upon plaintiff's motion filed therein, and tried in accordance with the views herein expressed. It is so ordered.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

WHITE OAK COAL COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

KATHARINE RIVOUX, Admr., etc., of Paul Francis Rivoux, Deceased.

(— Ohio St. —, 102 N. E. 302.)

Master and servant — driver of automobile — liability of owner.

1. The owner of an automobile is not liable in an action for damages for in-

Headnotes by NEWMAN, J.

Note. — Making prima facie case of responsibility for negligence of driver of automobile by proof of defendant's ownership of car, or employment of driver.

As indicated in the title, the question under consideration is purely one of evidence. Various questions of substantive law to which it is closely related are annotated in notes referred to in the Index to L.R.A. Notes, under the title "Automobiles."

In the absence of allegations of proof that the defendant in an action to recover for an injury resulting from being run into by an automobile was the owner of the machine, there is clearly not even a presumption raised that the defendant is liable. Cullen v. Thomas, 150 App. Div. 475, 135 N. Y. Supp. 22.

Although there is some conflict upon the question, the better rule seems to be that adopted in WHITE OAK COAL Co. v. RIVOUX, to the effect that a prima facie case is not made out by showing that the defendant in an action to recover for an injury occasioned by an automobile was the owner of the machine. And this result is upheld by other courts.

Thus, in Trombley v. Stevens-Duryea Co. 206 Mass. 516, 92 N. E. 764, 2 N. C. C. A. 806, it was held that evidence connecting the defendant in an action to recover for an injury occasioned by an automobile with the ownership of the machine, by showing that the car was registered in his name, did not make out a prima facie case, but that the plaintiff must further introduce evidence of the defendant's responsibility for the driver's negligence. The court said: "The legislature might have said that whenever juries to or death of a third person caused by the negligence of an employee in the operation of the automobile, unless it is proven that the employee at the time was engaged upon his employer's business and acting within the scope of his employment.

Evidence — injury by automobile — ownership and use.

2. The facts that the automobile was owned by the defendant, and that the same was negligently operated by an employee, a registered automobile was operated on the public ways, the person, firm, or corporation named in the certificate should be liable prima facie to other travelers for accidents caused by its mismanagement. The statute, however, goes no further than to provide that, for the purposes of the issuance, transfer, and revocation of certificates, and the enforcement of the penal provisions of the act automobiles shall be identified by their register number, and their owner and owners ascertained from the certificate. The common law, therefore, controls, and there is no presumption from his mere physical possession, that the person operating the automobile was the servant or agent of the corporation. He may have hired or borrowed it, or wrongfully appropriated it to his own use, and in neither event would the defendant be charged with his misconduct."

And in Sarver v. Mitchell, 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 69, it was held in an action to recover for the death of a child which was run into by the defendant's automobile, that evidence showing his ownership of the machine was insufficient to establish that the person in charge of it was the owner's servant, or that he was engaged at the time of the accident in the owner's business.

And see also Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 10 Ann. Cas. 731, set out by the court in WHITE OAK COAL CO. v. RIVOUX.

The Washington court, however, has held in an action for an injury occasioned by an automobile, that evidence that the defendant owned the machine raises a presumption that the one who was driving it at the time was acting for the defendant. Birch v. Abercrombie, — Wash. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 133 Pac. 1020; Purdy v. Sherman, — Wash. —, 133 Pac. 440.

And this rule is approved in Kneff v. Sanford, 63 Wash. 503, 115 Pac. 1040, 2 N. C. C. A. 422.

And there is a dictum in Hornstein v. Southern Boulevard R. Co. 79 Misc. 34, 136 N. Y. Supp. 1080, that the driver of an automobile at the time an injury occurs is presumptively the owner's servant.

Where it not only appears that the defendant in an action to recover for damages done by an automobile was the owner of the machine, but also that it was in charge of his chauffeur at the time the injury occurred, it is held that such evidence raises a presumption that the chauffeur was engaged in the defendant's business and acting within the scope of his employment. Long v. Nute, 123 Mo. App. 204, 100 S. W. 511; Shamp v. Lambert, 142 Mo. App. 567, 121 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

do not make a prima facie case of negligence against the owner, unless it appears that the employee was driving the automobile with authority, express or implied, of the owner.

Master and servant — automobile — bookkeeper.

3. A bookkeeper or cashier employed in the office of a company is not presumed, from that fact alone, to have the implied authority to use or operate an automobile

S. W. 770; Marshall v. Taylor, 168 Mo. App. 240, 153 S. W. 527; Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161; Christensen v. Christiansen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 155 S. W. 993; Ludberg v. Barghoorn, — Wash. —, 131 Pac. 1165; Burger v. Taxicab Motor Co. 66 Wash. 676, 120 Pac. 519.

The court in Shamp v. Lambert, 142 Mo. App. 567, 121 S. W. 770, said: "These facts tended to prove the plaintiff received her injury through the negligence of defendant's servant while acting within the scope of his employment. And even though it does not appear that the chauffeur was present at the particular time and place in question by instruction from his master [the defendant], or perchance in the performance of his duties in conveying his master either to or from the Union station, it does appear that he was acting within the scope of his authority as defendant's chauffeur; that is to say, he was operating defendant's automobile, the very act for which he was employed. We believe this to be sufficient, prima facie at least, to shift the burden of proof upon the defendant, if the chauffeur was not acting for him at the time. The test for the prima facie responsibility of the master in such cases is not whether the particular service being performed was specially authorized, but it is whether the act which occasioned the injury was within the scope of the servant's authority in prosecuting the business for which he was employed by the master. If such is not the test, it ought to be sufficient for a prima facie showing; for how may the injured person prove more?"

In accord with the general rule in negligence cases, the burden of proof in an action to recover for an injury occasioned by an automobile is upon the plaintiff, to show that the chauffeur in charge of the machine at the time the damage was sustained was about the owner's business. Long v. Nute, 123 Mo. App. 204, 100 S. W. 511; Cullen v. Thomas, 150 App. Div. 475, 135 N. Y. Supp. 22; Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 10 Ann. Cas. 731.

And in Neff v. Brandeis, 91 Neb. 11, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933, 135 N. W. 232, it was held that, in order to sustain an action for being run down by an automobile, the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the person in charge of the machine was the defendant's servant, and was, at the time of the accident, engaged in the master's business or pleasure, with the master's knowledge and direction.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Superior Court in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover compensation for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Newman, J.:

This is an action to recover damages for the death of Paul Francis Rivoux, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the White Oak Coal Company.

Rivoux, while standing near the curb on the sidewalk on the south side of Fourth street, west of and near Sycamore street, in the city of Cincinnati, was knocked down and injured by an automobile, and died as a result of the injuries. At the time the injuries were received the White Oak Coal Company was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of West Virginia, and authorized to do business in the state of Ohio. It maintained an office and coal yards in the city of Cincinnati, and this branch of the business was in charge of one William F. Smith, known as the general sales manager of the company.

The action was begun in the superior court of Cincinnati, and the administratrix of the decedent in her petition alleged that the automobile was owned by the White Oak Coal Company, and that at the time the injuries were received by the decedent it was operated by one Charles A. Tribbey, as its employee. She alleged that the company was negligent in allowing Tribbey, who it was alleged was incompetent, to operate the automobile; that the same was not properly constructed and equipped; that Tribbey negligently operated it, and at an improper rate of speed; and that he failed to keep the automobile at a proper distance from the curb and sidewalk, and failed to stop it before it struck decedent, and in her amendment to the petition claimed that the company was negligent also in failing to have the tires of the automobile so constructed, covered, and protected as to prevent the skidding or slipping of them.

Defendant admitted its corporate existence and authority to do business in Ohio, and denied each and every other allegation contained in the petition and amendment thereto.

there was evidence introduced by plaintiff establishing the fact that Rivoux was knocked down and injured by the automobile; that he died from the injuries received; that plaintiff was the administratrix of decedent; that he left surviving him a widow and children, who would have received pecuniary benefit and assistance from him if he had lived; that the automobile in question was owned by the White Oak Coal Company, having been purchased by it for the use of a traveling salesman; that this salesman had entire charge of the storage in the garage and the repairs; that Tribbey was operating the car at the time of the accident; and that he was an employee of the company, being employed in the office as bookkeeper or general office clerk.

There was no direct evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove that Tribbey, at the time he was operating the automobile, was using it for any purpose connected with the business of the company, or that he was using the same with the company's knowledge, permission, or consent. Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that Tribbey was negligent in the operation of the car in the particulars mentioned in the petition. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, a motion to arrest the cause from the jury, and to direct a verdict for the defendant, was made and overruled.

On behalf of defendant, William F. Smith, the general sales manager of the company, who had control and management of the Cincinnati branch, and who employed Tribbey, testified that he (Tribbey) was employed as bookkeeper and cashier; that his duties were to keep the books, take off balances, render bills, and take care of the office, and that his duties were absolutely in the office. On cross-examination, Smith admitted that, in his deposition given in the case, he stated that Tribbey had full charge of the office in his (Smith's) absence.

Samuel Dickson, the general manager of the company, testified that Tribbey was cashier and bookkeeper, and had no duties to perform outside of the office of the company.

Tribbey testified that he had intended to use the automobile in the afternoon of the day of the accident on personal business; that he was to drive to Norwood to confer with a man on personal business relating to a lodge of which he was a member; that on the morning of that day he had the automobile brought to the office of the company by an employee of the garage where it was kept; that he was driving the automobile for the purpose of ascertaining whether it needed any repairs before undertaking the trip in the afternoon,—the automobile having come in the day before from a several days' trip through Indiana,—and that, while driving for that purpose, the automobile skidded and ran into and injured Rivoux. Tribbey admitted that, without permission from the company, he had used the automobile on several occasions prior to this day—on Sundays and on evenings during the week after business hours—for his own pleasure, and not in connection with any business of the company. He admitted that, when the manager of the company was not in the office, and persons would call and ask for the manager in connection with matters he (Tribbey) felt able to handle, he had stated that he was assistant manager. It appears from the evidence that Smith was in the city on the day of the accident.

At the close of all the evidence in the case, counsel for the White Oak Coal Company renewed its motion to arrest the cause from the jury, and for a verdict in its favor, which motion was overruled. A verdict was rendered for plaintiff, a motion for a new trial was presented and overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict. Error was prosecuted to the circuit court, and that court affirmed the judgment of the superior court.

This proceeding here is to reverse the judgments of the lower courts.

Newman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The liability of the White Oak Coal Company is based upon the wrongful and negligent acts of its servant. The company, however, is not liable unless the acts complained of were committed while the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. This is the test, and the authorities agree upon this principle. Lima R. Co. v. Little, 67 Ohio St. 91, 65 N. E. 861, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 424. The company, therefore, is not answerable in damages unless Tribbey, who was operating the automobile at the time of the accident, was acting for the company and in the prosecution of its business. It is averred in the petition that he was operating the automobile as an employee of the company. This was an essential and material averment. All the other material averments of the cause of action were concededly established. The sole claim of plaintiff in error is that Tribbey was not acting within the scope of his employment. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff below to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he was acting within the scope of his employment.

Defendant in error does not question the rule we have announced as to the test of liability, but insists that the question whether or not Tribbey was acting within the scope of his employment was one of fact properly left to the determination of the jury, and that there was evidence tending to establish this fact. The circuit court, in affirming the judgment of the trial court, say: "The plaintiff below, having shown that the automobile was the property of the defendant, and that Tribbey, the driver, was in defendant's employ, the burden was then placed upon defendant to show that, at the time of the accident, Tribbey was acting outside the scope of his employment in a personal enterprise." Assuming that such a presumption did arise, the "burden," so called, would not require defendant to do more than introduce evidence sufficient to countervail this presumption; it was not required to overbalance or outweigh it. Klunk v. Hocking Valley R. Co. 74 Ohio St. 125, 77 N. E. 752, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 176.

But did such a presumption arise from the facts established by plaintiff below? The ownership of the automobile was established, and it was shown that Tribbey was operating the same at the time of the accident, and that he was an employee of the company. Is it to be inferred from these facts that Tribbey was acting within the scope of his employment? It was conceded that he was an employee, but was there any evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove that he was an employee or servant employed in connection with the particular instrument which caused the death of the decedent? Not only was there no evidence in support of such a claim, but, on the contrary, it appears from the testimony of plaintiff's own witnesses that Tribbey was a cashier or bookkeeper in the office of the company, and that the care, storage, and repairs of the automobile were under the control of another employee, a traveling salesman, for whose sole use and purposes the same had been purchased. Further, there was no evidence offered on the part of plaintiff, tending to prove that Tribbey was operating the automobile, at the time of the accident, with the knowledge, consent, or authority of the company, or that he had ever so operated it.

In addition to the cases cited by defendant in error, we have examined and considered a number of other "automobile cases," and we find that in these cases, at the time of the accident, the automobile was in charge of a servant of the owner—a chauffeur in most instances—whose duty it was to operate the automobile, and who was rightly in the possession and use of the same with the consent, knowledge, and authority of the owner. In these cases the courts do hold that the establishment of these facts raises the presumption or inference that the person so in charge was acting within the scope of his employment, and it then becomes a question for the jury to determine, upon all the evidence in the case, whether or not this presumption has been overcome.

In the recently decided case of Reynolds v. Denholm, 213 Mass. 576, 100 N. E. 1006, decided February 25, 1913, to which our attention has been called by counsel for defendant in error since the submission of the case at bar, it was admitted that the defendant owned the automobile, and that, at the time of the accident, it was being operated by a chauffeur who was in the defendant's employ. It further appeared that there was evidence tending to show that the chauffeur was employed to drive the automobile for the defendant's family whenever they wanted to use it; that he slept in the house occupied by the defendant and his family, but took his meals at another place, and had his laundry done at still another place; that both his laundry and meals were paid for by defendant as part of his wages; that he was allowed or suffered by the family, without objection, to use the automobile to go to his meals and to get his laundry as he found it convenient, and while going for his laundry in the automobile he ran into and injured the plaintiff. In that case, the trial court, at the close of all the evidence, directed a verdict for the defendant. The supreme court of Massachusetts held that there was error in this, and that whether the driver was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident was a question for the jury. The case at bar presents an entirely different state of facts, and is clearly distinguishable from the Reynolds Case.

In Cunningham v. Castle, 127 App. Div. 580, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1057, the trial court charged that the fact that the automobile, at the time of the accident, was in the possession of and driven by the chauffeur, with the owner's permission, placed upon the owner the same degree of liability for the chauffeur's negligence, if any, as would have been imposed upon him if the chauffeur were then engaged in the personal business of the defendant. The reviewing court held that this charge was erroneous, and that a question of fact was presented upon the evidence, which was whether the chauffeur, at the time of the injuries complained of, was acting within the scope of his employment. But in that case it was established that the automobile, at the time of the accident, was being operated by the chauffeur with the knowledge and permission of the owner. In Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161, it appeared that the defendant was the owner of the automobile, and that the chauffeur who was operating it was in his employ. In Cooper v. Knight, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 147 S. W. 349, the operator of the automobile was employed by the defendant, and his duties were to go after and deliver automobiles, and at the time of the accident he was in the discharge of his duties. In Riley v. Roach, 168 Mich. 294, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 834, 134 N. W. 14, the automobile was in charge of the defendant's chauffeur. In Shamp v. Lambert, 142 Mo. App. 567, 121 S. W. 770, defendant's automobile at the time of the accident was in charge of his chauffeur, who was operating the automobile,—the very act for which he was employed,—and the court say: "The test for the prima facie responsibility of the master in such cases is not whether the particular service being performed was specially authorized, but it is whether the act which occasioned the injury was within the scope of the servant's authority in prosecuting the business for which he was employed by the master." In Moon v. Matthews, 227 Pa. 488, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 856, 136 Am. St. Rep. 902, 76 Atl. 219, plaintiff's evidence disclosed the fact that the automobile belonged to the defendant, and that at the time of the accident it was being operated by his regular chauffeur. "Under such circumstances," the court say, "the burden was upon the defendant to show that the chauffeur was not acting within the scope of his employment, and upon the business for which he was employed by his master. The test is whether the act was done in the prosecution of the business in which the servant was employed to assist. If it was, the master is responsible. . . . The present case as made out by the evidence of the plaintiff was sufficient to warrant a recovery. Whether or not it was overcome by the testimony offered by the defendant was for the determination of the jury."

In the case at bar, while ownership in the defendant was established, yet there was no evidence tending to show that at the time of the accident the automobile was operated by a person employed or authorized to operate the same.

The facts in all the "automobile cases" to which reference has been made are easily distinguishable from the facts in the present case; and in the other cases cited by counsel for defendant in error it appears, not only that the vehicle which caused the damage was owned by the defendant, but also that at the time of the accident the same was driven by a person who was either regularly employed for that purpose, or who was driving the same with the consent and knowledge of the owner. Hayes v. Wilkins, 194 Mass. 223, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1033, 120 Am. St. Rep. 549, 80 N. E. 449; Schulte v. Holliday, 54 Mich. 73, 19 N. W. 752; Rahn v. Singer Mfg. Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 912; Kelton v. Fifer, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 603. The rule announced in these cases is therefore not applicable to the case at bar.

There are some authorities which go to the extent of holding that where the plaintiff has suffered injury from the negligent management of a vehicle, it is sufficient prima facie evidence that the negligence is imputable to defendant, when it is shown that he is the owner of the vehicle, without even proving affirmatively that the person in charge is the defendant's servant. This doctrine seems to meet with favor in a number of Pennsylvania cases, but in the case of Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 66 Atl. 525, 10 Ann. Cas. 731, in which 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

recovery was sought against the owner of an automobile for injuries resulting to plaintiff, and where it was essential to a recovery that it be made to appear that the accident occurred while the person in charge of the automobile was using it in the course of his employment and on his master's business, and the only evidence as to that proposition was proof of ownership of the machine in the defendant, the court say: "Ownership of the machine in cases of this character is at best but a scant basis for the inference that was here sought to be derived from it. It is allowed as adequate only when the attending circumstances point to no different conclusion." In that case evidence was offered by the defendant tending to prove that, while the automobile was being operated by the chauffeur, the latter was not operating the same in any business of the master; and the court held that it was the duty of the trial court to direct a verdict for the defendant. Even in Pennsylvania, where such a rule seems to be adhered to, the presumption or inference is so slight that it is held to be the duty of the court to say whether such presumption has been overcome by the other circumstances in the case.

But this court is not in accord with the authorities which hold that a prima facie case of negligence is made against a defendant upon the mere showing that he was the owner of the negligently operated automobile. Such a rule would be unjust, and would work hardships. An automobile may be in the possession of one who wrongfully appropriates it to his own use, yet under that doctrine, if such person negligently operates it to the injury of a third person, a prima facie case of negligence would be imputed to the owner. Nor do we think that proof of the additional fact that the operator was an employee of the owner raises a presumption of negligence against him, unless it appears that the duties of the employee are in connection with the automobile, or that he was operating the same with the authority—express or implied—of the owner.

In the case at bar plaintiff wholly failed to show that the employee had any actual authority to operate the automobile at the time of the accident, and the fact that he was an employee employed in the capacity of bookkeeper would not raise the inference that here was an implied authority to operate an automobile purchased for another employee for his use and purposes, and in another department or branch of the business; and, there being no evidence in support of this essential averment of the petition, namely, that Tribbey was operating the automobile as an employee, the motion of defendant for a directed verdict in its favor, at the close of plaintiff's evidence, should have been sustained.

Plaintiff's case was not strengthened by the evidence offered on the part of defendant. The general sales manager of the company, who employed Tribbey, testified that Tribbey's duties were absolutely in the office; that he was not authorized to use the automobile; and another officer of the company testified along the same lines. Tribbey related the circumstances under which he was using the automobile at the time of the accident. He testified that he was not using it in connection with any business of the company, or in the performance of any of his duties as an employee, that the company had no knowledge of the fact that he was using it, and that on other occasions—on evenings and on Sundays—when he had used it, it was for his own personal business or pleasure, and the use was without the knowledge or consent of the company.

The suggestion is made by defendant in error that, inasmuch as Tribbey at the time of the accident was driving the automobile for the purpose of ascertaining whether it needed repairs before he used it for his own personal business, and that such an inspection might result in a benefit to his employer, he therefore was acting in the interest of the company. There is not even an intimation that this bookkeeper had any authority to inspect this automobile, so that whatever was done by him was done voluntarily. In answer to such a claim, it is necessary only to call attention to the language of the court in Lima R. Co. v. Little, 67 Ohio St. 91, at page 101, 65 N. E. 861, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 424: "A master has the right to select and choose his agents and to determine himself, and assign to the servants so selected, their respective duties, and no assumption by an employee of duties not assigned to him will bring those duties within the course or scope of his employment as defined by the master, and when an act is not within the scope of a servant's employment, it cannot be within either the express or implied authorization of the master."

For the reasons given, we conclude that defendant's motion, at the close of plaintiff's evidence, for a verdict, should have been sustained, and, this motion having been renewed at the close of all the evidence in the case, the judgments of the Circuit and Superior Courts are reversed. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and judgment is here rendered for plaintiff in error.

(June 13, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Fairfield County in defendants' favor in an action to foreclose a judgment lien on property standing in the name of Mrs. Parker for a debt of her husband. Reversed.

Statement by Wheeler, J.:

Mrs. Parker purchased, on April 12, 1890, a lot of land on Madison avenue, on May 5, 1891, a lot on Pacific street, and on January 8, 1892, a piece of land on Dewey street, all in the city of Bridgeport. The title was taken in the name of her husband, the defendant, who in the first two purchases gave back a purchase-money mortgage and note, and in the last assumed a mortgage thereon as part of the consideration.

On June 27, 1892, Mrs. Parker caused her husband to transfer the three pieces to one Wilson, in consideration of the transfer to him of another piece of property on Dewey street and the assumption of a mortgage on this property of $1,500. On June 25, 1900, Mrs. Parker caused her husband to give a note for $1,500, secured by mortgage on the Dewey street property. In June, 1906, Mrs.

Parker purchased a piece of land on North avenue in Bridgeport, and took title in the name of her husband, who assumed a mortgage of $1,500 thereon, as part consideration. All of these conveyances were duly recorded.

Mrs. Parker paid for these several pieces of property with her own funds, and always exercised control, ownership, and proprietorship over them. She never intended to give these to her husband, but placed them in his name "because of her peculiar ideas that a husband should always appear as the head of the house." Both Mr. and Mrs. Parker always regarded all of this property as belonging absolutely to Mrs. Parker.

In October, 1900, Mrs. Parker loaned her husband $1,000, and, with her knowledge and consent, he invested it in the Colonial Chemical Company, of which he was a stockholder. On February 7, 1910, the plaintiff herein brought an action against this company, and attached certain property. The plaintiff's attorney and the officer making the attachment ascertained that Mr. Parker was the owner of record of the property on Dewey street and North avenue, and, Mr. Parker having stated that he was the owner of this property, they accepted him as surety upon said officer's receipt for the return of the property attached, upon the faith of his ownership of record. Neither the plaintiff, his attorney, nor the officer had knowledge of any claim of Mrs. Parker upon the property. The though she would have been entitled to have the deed to her husband, and from him to the creditor, canceled.

In Kessler v. De Garmo, — Iowa, —, 127 N. W. 988, it was held that a wife, with whose money her husband purchased land, taking title in himself though they regarded it as her property, who allowed him to hold himself out as owner, is estopped from claiming it as against certain of his creditors, and, as the relief was granted on the ground of estoppel, the rule that all creditors may share in the proceeds, upon a fraudulent conveyance being set aside, was not applicable.

In Ford v. Blackshear Mfg. Co. — Ga. —, 79 S. E. 576, it is held that if a wife, who has an equitable title to land to which a deed is taken in the name of her husband, permits him to hold the property and use it in his business for obtaining credit, and a third person, without notice, extends credit to him on the faith that the land is his, she is estopped from asserting title as against the lien of the judgment to which the creditor's claim has been reduced, though before rendition of the judgment the husband had conveyed the land to her in recognition of her equity.

In Zehnder v. Stark, 248 Mo. 39, 154 S. W. 92, it is held that a married woman whose husband purchased land in his name with her money, who permitted title to remain in him for years without protest, during which time he contracted debts for the improvement of the land, to her knowledge, is estopped from claiming title as against such creditors, and they are entitled to equitable relief against a deed subsequently made by the husband to the wife.

In Johnson County v. Taylor, 87 Neb. 487, 127 N. W. 862, a wife was held estopped from claiming land as her separate property where she permitted her husband to hold the title thereto and the county accepted him as surety on a county depositary bond, on the strength of information given the county commissioners by the county clerk that he owned property in the county, though they were not informed as to what particular land he owned or its value.

But a married woman who has no knowledge that the title to land purchased with her funds was taken in the name of her husband, and who acted promptly when she discovered it, was not estopped from asserting her title against a creditor of the husband, whose claim arose without her knowledge and before she became aware that the title was not in her name. Southern Bank v. Nichols, 235 Mo. 401, 138 S. W. 881.

plaintiff duly recovered judgment against the company, and execution upon the judgment was returned wholly unsatisfied. Thereafter the plaintiff recovered judgment against Mr. Parker on the receipt, and duly filed a judgment lien upon the land on Dewey street, and this action is brought to foreclose the lien. In February, 1910, Mrs. Parker learned that this company was in financial troubles and that her husband was interested in it. The failure of the company and the loss of the $1,000 made her distrustful of her husband, and, apprehensive that he might engage in the future in some losing business enterprise and thereby jeopardize her real estate, and so she demanded of him its transfer to her. Mr. Parker, on March 18, 1910, through an intermediary, conveyed the property on Dewey street and North avenue to Mrs. Parker.

This was the consideration for the transfer, and not the payment of the $1,000 loan to Mr. Parker by Mrs. Parker. Mrs. Parker, at the time of this transfer, did not know that her husband had signed the receipt, nor that he had creditors other than herself and these mortgagees, and, in demanding and accepting the transfer, she acted in good faith and without an intention to defraud. In fact, at the time of the transfer to Mrs. Parker, Mr. Parker owed no debts except the $1,000, and had no visible property except said real estate, and the execution upon the judgment was returned wholly unsatisfied. The property on Dewey street is worth $1,000 above the encumbrance, and since the transfer of Mrs. Parker has realized $1,500 above the encumbrance upon the North avenue property.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For over twenty years Mrs. Parker permitted her real estate in Bridgeport to stand of record in her husband's name: mortgages thereon to be assumed by him, or made as part of the purchase price; conveyances thereof to be made, and mortgages to be placed thereon by him. As to all the world the public land records proclaimed him the owner. The plaintiff accepted him as a surety upon an officer's receipt, given in place of an attachment secured by the plaintiff upon certain property, in reliance upon his ownership of this property as disclosed by the public records and as stated by him. In fact, his wife was the owner of this property. And the question at issue is whether the transfer to her of this property, made subsequent to the contingent liability incurred by her husband as a surety, and accepted by the plaintiff in reliance upon his ownership, as disclosed by the public records and declared by him, is superior to the plaintiff's right in the property.

The plaintiff claims that Mrs. Parker is estopped from setting up her claim of ownership ahead of his claim against the surety which he has reduced to judgment, and that, as against him, the transfers to her were, in law, constructively fraudulent. The foundation of this claim must rest upon the assertion that the plaintiff was, at the inception of the suretyship, a creditor of Mr. Parker.

The liability of Mr. Parker as a surety was contingent, though the receipt was absolute in terms. Fowler v. Bishop, 31 Conn. 562.

The relation of debtor and creditor between Mr. Parker and the plaintiff arose at the moment he became a surety. This liability was, in law, as assured as though the plaintiff had then sold Mr. Parker a bill of goods or loaned him a sum of money. Debt, in the sense in which it must here be regarded, denotes "any kind of a just demand."

We have held that one who holds an unliquidated claim against another is his creditor, under the foreign attachment statute. New Haven Steam Saw-Mill Co. v. Fowler, 28 Conn. 108. So far as we are aware, the authorities generally hold the person for the payment of whose debt another has become contingently liable to be a creditor. Thus in Thompson v. Thompson, 19 Me. 244, 251, where a bond with surety was given by a guardian to secure the ward against official neglect or misconduct, it was held that the relation of debtor and creditor arose at the time of the signing of the bond, and that the obligee or those whom the bond is designed to protect might impeach any conveyance made after its date, though prior to any breach of the bond. So it was held the holder of a promissory note was a creditor of the indorser or guarantor thereon, notwithstanding the liability of an indorser or guarantor was contingent, within the provisions of the statute avoiding all gifts made to defraud creditors. Crocker v. Huntzicker, 113 Wis. 181, 88 N. W. 232. So it was held a landlord was an existing creditor of his tenant as to rent to become due under the lease, and therefore a voluntary conveyance by 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the tenant might be set aside, and the property so conveyed subjected to the landlord's claim for rent falling due after the conveyance. O'Brien v. Whigam, 9 App. Div. 113, 41 N. Y. Supp. 40. In Hanna v. Hurley, 162 Mich. 601, 605, 127 N. W. 710, it was held that an obligee on a bond given for costs might have set aside a conveyance of stock, contrary to the bulk-sales act, though the liability of a surety was contingent at the time of sale. The court said: "It is urged by appellant that George D. Hanna's liability upon the bond could not be fixed until judgment upon appeal, and therefore that the obligee in the bond was not, at the time of the sale, one of his creditors. . . . It cannot be said that George D. Hanna's liability was not fixed at the moment he signed the bond. It was fixed in amount, though contingent upon the failure of his principal to prosecute his appeal and reverse or pay the judgment."

Most of the cases where the question of contingent liability arose are those between a surety and the principal obligees upon a bond or other instrument; or between an indorser or guarantor and maker, where the one contingently liable for the debt of another has paid it, and is seeking to recover of the principal of the bond or other instrument; or the maker or guarantor of the note or other instrument. Our investigation satisfies us that the law is well settled that the liability begins when the engagement of the surety, indorser, or guarantor begins. Washington v. Norwood, 128 Ala. 383, 389, 30 So. 405; Hatfield v. Merod, 82 Ill. 113; Dudley v. Buckley, 68 W. Va. 630, 70 S. E. 377; Graeber v. Sides, 151 N. C. 596, 66 S. E. 600; Whitehouse v. Bolster, 95 Me. 458, 460, 50 Atl. 240; Fortune v. Cassidy, 140 Ill. App. 580; McLaughlin v. Bank of Potomac, 7 How. 220, 12 L. ed. 675; Van Wyck v. Seward, 18 Wend. 375. The obligation of Mr. Parker, as surety, attached when he signed the receipt; the relation of debtor and creditor, between the surety and the plaintiff, arose at that time.

We are now to inquire whether the plaintiff creditor can cause to be set aside a conveyance by his debtor to the debtor's wife of real estate, of which the real ownership was in the wife, but the legal title to which had been placed in the husband, and so appeared of record for many years, and, in reliance upon the record title and the declaration of ownership by the husband, the plaintiff had extended to him credit. The defendant wife was without intent to wrong the plaintiff, and without knowledge that her husband owed the plaintiff or any one else. The plaintiff was equally innocent. Unless he can compel the appropriate tion of this property to the payment of his debt he must lose it.

Mrs. Parker put it in the power of her husband to secure this credit on the faith of his ownership of her property. She caused the land records to declare that he owned this property. The plaintiff had the right to rely upon the title as it appeared of record. The act of the real owner in placing the record title of property in the name of another precludes her from denying his title as against one who has extended a credit in reliance upon the title which she has vested in the other. The right of the creditor arises from the act of the owner, and does not depend upon the actual title, but upon the apparent title. The true owner is barred from asserting her title against the creditor by her own act. It would be inequitable to permit the assertion of her right to the injury of the innocent creditor. She is estopped from maintaining her ownership, otherwise injustice would be done the creditor. Between the innocent owner and the innocent creditor the owner, whose act led to the wrong to the creditor, must suffer the loss.

The rule of equitable estoppel is as applicable to a married woman who has placed the title to her real estate in her husband, who has thereby obtained a credit, as though she had put the title in the name of a third party. Galbraith v. Lunsford, 87 Tenn. 89, 97, 1 L.R.A. 522, 9 S. W. 365; Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 814.

The authorities so holding are numerous. "With the knowledge and assent of Mrs. Hauk, the title to this property stood of record, from November 9, 1889, until January 13, 1891, in the name of her husband. During this period he purchased from the complainants the goods for which their judgment was obtained. Upon the strength of his apparent ownership of such property he obtained credit; and it is neither just nor equitable that she should now, as against them, be permitted to assert that this property all the while belonged to her." Hauk v. Van Ingen, 97 Ill. App. 642, 650, affirmed in 196 Ill. 20, 63 N. E. 705; Smith v. Willard, 174 Ill. 538, 66 Am. St. Rep. 313, 51 N. E. 835; Mertens v. Schlemme, 68 N. J. Eq. 544, 550, 59 Atl. 808; Warner v. Watson, 35 Fla. 402, 421, 17 So. 654; Lawrence v. Guaranty Invest. Co. 51 Kan. 222, 32 Pac. 816; McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Perkins, 135 Iowa, 64, 68, 110 N. W. 15; 16 Cyc. 773, 775; 20 Cyc. 606; Beach, Eq. Jur. § 1103; note in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 3. The enforcement of this rule does not depend upon whether there was actual fraud, although this element is often present, but upon the inequity of the wife holding out to the world her husband's ownership, and then denying it, to the prejudice of one who has extended credit upon the faith of her act.

Of a reply purporting to set up an equitable estoppel we said: "It is claimed that these averments were not sufficient because no bad faith, wilful wrong, or gross carelessness is charged. No such charges were necessary. . . . It is not his intent so much as the result of his conduct, which determines his liability." Canfield v. Gregory, 66 Conn. 9, 17, 33 Atl. 536; Galbraith v. Lunsford, 87 Tenn. 89, 1 L.R.A. 522, 9 S. W. 365; Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. §§ 803, 804, 814.

There are authorities which hold the wife's fraud the determinative element in the proof of her equitable estoppel, as, for instance, those of Texas and Missouri; but the great weight of authority is against this position and in accord with the doctrine we adopted in Canfield v. Gregory. Unless the circumstances be such as naturally to mislead another, one of the indispensable elements of an equitable estoppel is absent.

In an early case we thus stated the doctrine: "Therefore it has been holden that if the owner of goods voluntarily permit another to hold himself out to the world as being the true owner, and, for this purpose, intrust him with the exclusive possession or other indicia of title, under circumstances which would naturally tend to mislead, he shall be concluded by the sale of it to an innocent and mistaken purchaser." Baldwin v. Porter, 12 Conn. 473, 482.

In Canfield v. Gregory, 66 Conn. 9, 17, 33 Atl. 536, 537, we said: "It is true that it does not extend to acts or representations not naturally calculated to mislead, and on which others had no right to rely." Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469, 2 Nev. & P. 488, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 78; Laing v. Evans, 64 Neb. 454, 459, 90 N. W. 246.

Were the circumstances naturally calculated to mislead the plaintiff into the belief that Mr. Parker was the owner, and did he have the right to rely upon this belief?

Mr. Parker was financially interested in the chemical company; he represented that he owned this property; the plaintiff looked up the public records, and ascertained that by them, for years, he had been the owner, and that he had, for over twenty years, owned property of record in Bridgeport, assumed mortgages upon purchases, and given mortgages upon purchases. The titles were such that the most conservative investor or institution would have accepted them and loaned upon their faith. These circumstances were naturally calculated to mislead the plaintiff as they did.

The plaintiff did rely upon these titles of record, released his attachment against the chemical company, and in its stead accepted an officer's receipt with Mr. Parker as surety. It would be difficult to conceive of a stronger case of equitable estoppel. Any other holding would do violence to the faith which, time out of mind, we have given to our registry laws. With inflexible adherence we have made every title to land, so far as practicable, appear of record. We have held the record constructive notice to all the world of land titles. We have authorized reliance to be placed thereon. We have sustained contracts and conveyances made upon their faith. We cannot hold that a credit, extended in reliance upon the land records, must yield to the equitable owner of the title, without doing irreparable injury to the registry laws and going counter to our decisions.

The maintenance of our system of registry of titles is of the greatest public importance, and he who acts in reliance upon the record has behind him not only the natural equities of his position, but also the especial equity arising from the protection afforded everyone who trusts the record. Rosenbluth v. De Forest & H. Co. 85 Conn. 40, 47, 81 Atl. 955; Beach v. Osborne, 74 Conn. 405, 411, 50 Atl. 1019, 1118; Ives v. Stone, 51 Conn. 446, 456; Wheeler v. Young, 76 Conn. 44, 50, 55 Atl. 670.

The test is whether the act of the wife was naturally calculated to cause the plaintiff to extend credit to her husband. It is not, as has sometimes been suggested, whether the wife had reason to expect credit would be extended to her husband. If, however, this were the test, the facts found make it perfectly clear that she did have such reason to expect. Her purpose in placing the property in his name was "because of her peculiar ideas that a husband should always appear as the head of the house." This has but one meaning: She purposed giving him standing and financial responsibility in the community. The purpose was identical with that in Kennedy v. Lee, 72 Ga. 39, because the wife "thought it would look better" for him to hold the title to her real estate.

She is by law presumed to know that the titles of record, through all these years, would be constructive notice to all the world that her husband was their owner. She gave him by her act credit to either assume mortgages upon each of the several properties she permitted him to own, or to give mortgages thereon as part consideration for the purchase price, or to make mortgages thereon after the purchase. His title of record gave him a credit by which he procured a mortgage on the very property on Dewey street upon which the plaintiff is seeking to foreclose his lien. She loaned him $1,000, which he had, to her knowledge, lost in the company whose credit he was protecting by becoming its surety. Under these circumstances it could not be said that she could not reasonably anticipate that he might use the credit she had given him. The mere fact that she had never known that he had had any other creditors, and he, in fact, had had none, is of no consequence, and very far from a finding that she could not reasonably anticipate that he would use the credit given him by his apparent ownership.

The trial court relied for its decision upon the case of Clarke v. Black, 78 Conn. 467, 62 Atl. 757. There is a marked difference between that case and this. There the relation of debtor and creditor existed between the husband and wife, and was the consideration of the conveyance; in this case it is expressly found that this relation formed no part of the consideration of the transfer. In that case it did not appear that the creditor seeking to set aside the conveyance relied upon the husband's ownership or upon his title of record in extending him credit. And, further, the question of the wife's estoppel does not appear to have been raised. This case is governed by the principles involved in Sanford v. DeForest, 85 Conn. 694, 84 Atl. 111.

There is error; the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to render judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with this opinion.

Prentice, Ch. J., and Bennett, J., concur.

Roraback, J., dissenting:

The defendants in this action are husband and wife. Their marriage took place prior to 1890. The complaint alleges that the defendant Albert J. Parker was the owner of certain real estate located in Bridgeport; that on March 18, 1910, he pretended to convey his interest in the property to one John A. Spoffard; that on the same day Spoffard pretended to convey this property to the defendant Emma J. Parker, and that both of these transfers were fraudulent and without any consideration therefor, the same having been made in fraud of the creditor of the defendant Albert J. Parker, and to defraud the plaintiff, to whom the husband was then liable as surety upon an officer's receipt, and to avoid liability and payment of any judgment based thereon. The answer admitted that the conveyances from the husband to Spoffard and from Spoffard to the wife were made, and denied the other allegations.

The real issues between the parties were whether these conveyances from one defendant to another through John A. Spoffard were fraudulent as against creditors, and without any consideration therefor. The trial court held that they were not, and the substantial reasons of appeal are that the court erred in reaching this conclusion.

A short time previous to 1890 Emma J. Parker came to Bridgeport from Nova Scotia, bringing with her some money, part of which had been given her by her own relatives, and the remainder of which she had earned. On the 12th day of April, 1890, she bought a lot on Madison avenue in Bridgeport, and had the deed recorded in the name of her husband. On May 5, 1891, she bought a lot on Pacific street in Bridgeport, and had the deed recorded in the name of her husband. On January 8, 1892, she bought a piece of property on Burr road, which is now called Dewey street, in said Bridgeport, and had the deed recorded in the name of her husband. In all these purchases mortgages were given back, and the notes and the deeds were signed by Albert J. Parker. The money used for the purchase price of all these pieces of property, over and above the amount for which they were mortgaged, was the money which Emma J. had brought with her from Nova Scotia. On June 27, 1892, she caused her husband to transfer the three pieces of property named above to one W. S. Wilson. In return Wilson conveyed to the husband another piece of property situated on Dewey street, which is the property involved in this suit.

The wife caused Albert J. to assume a mortgage of $1,500 upon the Dewey street property mentioned in the last paragraph. On June 5, 1900, she caused her husband to give a mortgage and note for $1,500 on the Dewey street property to one Mary L. Wheeler, of New Haven, Connecticut. In June, 1906, Mrs. Parker purchased a piece of property on North avenue in Bridgeport, and had the deed recorded in her husband's name, who assumed a mortgage of $1,500 upon the same as a part of the consideration.

Mrs. Parker never intended to give her husband any of this property. She placed it in his name because of her peculiar ideas that a husband should always appear as the head of the house. Mrs. Parker always exercised control, ownership, and proprietorship over all this property. She talked with the owners of it; she arranged for the details of its purchase; she took her own money from the bank and paid for it; she arranged for all the mortgages; she arranged for the insurance; she paid the taxes and interest on the mortgages; she made all arrangements for the different sales, and she took any money resulting from the sales, and placed it in the savings bank in her own name. Her husband never had anything whatever to do with any of this property, except as ordered by his wife.

For several years after coming to Bridgeport she worked in a corset factory, she did sewing at home, and she took boarders and lodgers. The money earned in this way she put into the savings bank in her own name, in small but regular deposits, covering the years from 1890 to 1911. This money and that which she brought with her from Nova Scotia is the money which was used to purchase all of the real estate hereinbefore mentioned.

The earnings of Albert J. during these years went to the support of his own household and for the payment of provisions consumed by boarders. They always regarded the property in dispute as belonging to Mrs. Parker. She had never known that her husband owed any money or had any creditors, and in fact he had none, nor did he have any at the time of the matters involved in this suit, unless it be the plaintiff in this case. Mrs. Parker frequently loaned money to her husband, and had always received satisfactory payment. In October, 1909, Mrs. Parker advanced to her husband $1,000, which he, with her knowledge, invested in a corporation located in Bridgeport, and known as the Colonial Chemical Company. On February 7, 1910, the plaintiff brought an action against this company. On the same day the defendant Albert J., who was a stockholder in this corporation, signed as surety an officer's receipt for the return of the property specified therein, which had been attached in this action. On April 20, 1910, the justice court before which this action was brought rendered judgment therein against the company for $87 and $12.91 costs of suit. Execution upon this judgment was duly issued and returned wholly unsatisfied. The plaintiff thereafter brought suit against Parker upon his receipt, and recovered judgment against him on October 31, 1911, for $100 damages and $37.46 costs. This judgment is entirely unpaid, and an execution issued upon the same was returned unsatisfied. At the time of the signing of this receipt the attorney for Goldberg, together with the officer making the attachment, ascertained that Albert J. Parker had this property standing in his name on the Bridgeport land records. The receipt was accepted because he was the owner of record of this real estate, and neither the plaintiff, his attorney, nor the officer had knowledge of any equitable claim of his wife.

In February, 1910, Mrs. Parker learned that the Colonial Chemical Company was in trouble. She knew that her husband was interested in this concern, and she immediately consulted her attorneys at law in Bridgeport. They advised that her husband, as a stockholder, could not be held personally liable for the debts of the corporation. The financial embarrassment of the corporation and the probable loss of the $1,000 made her distrustful of the ability of her husband, and, being apprehensive lest he might engage in some future business enterprise of a losing nature and thereby jeopardize her interest in the real estate, she demanded that he transfer the legal title to her. He had offered to transfer it previously, but she had declined, saying it was not necessary. He complied with her demand, and on March 18, 1910, made the transfer, through an intermediary. At the time of the transfer Mrs. Parker did not know that her husband had signed the receipt, or that he owed any person except herself. There was no consideration for the transfer other than has been mentioned. The conveyance was asked for, given, and received, with no intention to defraud, but solely because both parties had always considered the wife as the real owner of the property, and because both parties believed that the wife was equitably entitled to receive a conveyance whenever she chose to do so.

This is an action to foreclose a judgment lien upon real estate to which Mrs. Parker, one of the defendants, holds title, and to set aside a transfer of the property upon the ground that her title was acquired by her without consideration, in fraud of her husband's creditors, and to prevent the plaintiff from collecting his judgment. The trial court has distinctly found that her title was not so acquired, and this finding is conclusive unless the subordinate facts show that this conclusion was incorrect.

The principles of some of our decisions applicable to the present case are to be found in the following cases: This court in the case of Knower v. Cadden Clothing Co. 57 Conn. 202, 221, 17 Atl. 580, said: "In all cases where the title of a vendee has been attacked because of the intent on the part of the vendor to defraud his creditors by the transfer," it should appear "that the vendee had actual knowledge of and participated in the fraud, that is, that he had an intent to commit a fraud, this to be proven as a fact." This principle was recognized in Trumbull v. Hewitt, 62 Conn.

448, 451, 26 Atl. 350. To the same effect, though more directly applicable to the present case, is the case of Clarke v. Black, 78 Conn. 467, 62 Atl. 757, where it appears that the defendant in 1886 allowed his wife to have $3,500 to assist her in purchasing and keeping a boarding house, upon an informal understanding that when she acquired by such means, a sufficient sum to build a house, it should be turned over to the defendant as his property, and that the proceeds of the business not needed for this purpose should belong to her. At the end of ten years, with the avails of her business, she bought land and built a house thereon at the expense of $6,000, and told the defendant she would convey the property to him, which she did three years later. This conveyance was made in good faith and with no intent to defraud anyone, although it left her without sufficient attachable property to satisfy the claim of her sole creditor. This court held that upon these facts the relation of debtor and creditor existed between the wife and her husband, and that such relation constituted, as a matter of law, a valuable consideration for her conveyance which prevented it from being treated as constructively fraudulent.

Other cases in this connection proceed upon the same theory. Thus in Warner Glove Co. v. Jennings, 58 Conn. 74, 82, 83, 19 Atl. 239, 240, it is stated: "A debtor on the eve of insolvency may prefer one or more of his creditors by payment of their claims, either in money or by the transfer to them of property, if such payment is made in good faith. In the absence of proceedings under the insolvent law, neither the knowledge of the creditor of his debtor's insolvency, nor the fact that such acts are calculated to place the property of the debtor beyond the reach of his creditors, can hinder them in the collection of their claims, will of themselves render such bona fide transactions void or fraudulent in law." See also State v. Martin, 77 Conn. 142, 144, 58 Atl. 745.

It does not appear that Parker was indebted when this conveyance was made to anyone other than the plaintiff. When this transfer was made to the wife she had no knowledge that her husband had signed the receipt, and did not know that he was indebted to anyone. The land in question was purchased with money belonging to Mrs. Parker. She never intended to give her husband either the money or the land; from motives that were not fraudulent she allowed the record title of the land to stand in her husband's name, but both of them regarded and treated it as belonging to the wife. The conveyance was of property which in reality belonged to her, and which in justice and equity, it was his duty to convey to her upon request.

The plaintiff, when the transfer of the land in question was made, was not a purchaser within the recording acts. The liability of Parker was not absolute, but dependent upon an uncertain event. It was small in amount, the only one in existence, and was unknown to Mrs. Parker. There is nothing to show that the wife was implicated in a fraud. She did not have any good reason to know that Parker was using her property to obtain credit, nor did she connive with him to that end. While it appears that there was a good consideration for the conveyance to Mrs. Parker from her husband, yet, if that were not so, the entire indebtedness of the husband at the time of the conveyance was the contingent and insignificant amount of $87. It does not appear that the husband was at the time either insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances, but it does appear that he was equitably bound to make the conveyance to his wife. Under such conditions the law would not say that the conveyance was void as to creditors, even if it were a voluntary one. Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. 542, 543, 7 Am. Dec. 237.

These considerations are a sufficient answer to the claim urged by the plaintiff that the defendant Mrs. Parker is estopped from asserting that she is the owner of the property in question by reason of its transfer to her by Mr. Parker. But the appellant insists that Mrs. Parker allowed her husband to secure this credit on the faith of his ownership of her property; that she caused the land records to declare that he owned this property; that the plaintiff had the right to rely upon the title as it appeared of record; and that the act of the wife in placing the record title of property in the name of her husband precludes her from denying his title as against one who has extended a credit in reliance upon the title which she vested in him. In this state we have held to the rule that, in transactions concerning real estate, parties may rely upon the title to such property as disclosed by the land records, in so far, at least, as the title may be affected by anything required to be recorded. We are here, however, not concerned with a transaction touching real estate, but with a quite different matter affecting the extension of personal credit without security. It is obvious from the manner in which estoppel may be established that there can be no fixed and settled rules of universal application to regulate it. Whether acts or admissions shall operate by way of estoppel in pais must depend upon the circumstances of the case.

Our own cases proceed upon this idea. In Canfield v. Gregory, 66 Conn. 9, 17, 33 Atl. 536, it is stated that "the modern estoppel in pais is of equitable origin, though of equal application in courts of law. It is much more than a rule of evidence. It establishes rights; it determines remedies. An equitable estoppel does not so much shut out the truth as let in the truth, and the whole truth. Its office is not to support some strict rule of law, but to show what equity and good conscience require, under the particular circumstances of the case, irrespective of what might otherwise be the legal rights of the parties."

In West Winsted Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Ford, 27 Conn. 282, 290, 71 Am. Dec. 66, this court declared: "Estoppels in pais are founded in the obligation which every man is under to speak and act according to the truth of the case, and in the policy of the law to prevent the great mischiefs resulting from uncertainty, confusion, and want of confidence in the intercourse of men, if they were permitted to deny that which they have deliberately and solemnly asserted and received as true. But the mere acts, statements, or admissions of a party, when not performed or made under seal or of record, or in some of those acts to which peculiar authority is attached by law, were not at common law considered as estoppels, and had no other weight than that of evidence, more or less important, but which might be explained or rebutted. By the recent decisions of the courts in this country and in England, a much wider scope is given to the doctrine of estoppel in pais, and it is now held and established that wherever an act is done or a settlement made by a party which cannot be contravened or contradicted without fraud, or gross misconduct which is akin to it, on his part, and injury to others whose conduct has been influenced by the act or omission, or, as was said in Middletown Bank v. Jerome, 18 Conn. 449, where a person by his acts or his words intentionally induces another to believe in the truth of a fact, and thereby change his situation, or commit his interests, the character of an estoppel will attach to what would otherwise be a mere matter of evidence, and will become binding upon a party and decisive with a jury, even in opposition to proof of a contrary nature." Whitaker v. Williams, 20 Conn. 103; Giddings v. Emerson, 24 Conn. 547; Taylor v. Ely, 25 Conn. 250, 259; Danforth v. Adams, 29 Conn. 101, 111.

In Bennet v. Strait, 63 Iowa, 620, 19 N. W. 806, it was held that a wife would not be estopped from asserting equitable title to her land as against creditors of her husband merely because title was taken in the name of her husband, and while thus held the debts were contracted. The court said that "the law of estoppel has no application from the mere fact of the husband's holding the title when the debt was contracted," and that money loaned on the faith of the apparent ownership of the land of the wife, held in the husband's name, will not prevent the wife from asserting title as against the creditor, where she did not know that her husband was engaged in any hazardous business or in any business transacted, in whose or in part, on credit, since the wife, by permitting the husband to hold the title to her land by recorded deed in his own name, will not, without other act or representation on her part, be estopped to deny the title as against a creditor who, without her knowledge, gave credit to the husband upon the faith of his ownership as it appeared of record. De Berry v. Wheeler, 128 Mo. 85, 49 Am. St. Rep. 538, 30 S. W. 338. The court in that case said it must be conceded that the wife, by permitting the record title to the land to remain in her husband's name, represented to the public that her husband was the owner of it. Yet in this alone no one could be defrauded. The fraud and consequent estoppel would only exist when she knew, or, from all the circumstances, ought to have known, that others relying upon what she permitted the record to tell them were dealing, or might deal, with the husband in such a manner as to cause them to alter their previous condition.

The case of Marston v. Dresen, 85 Wis. 530, 55 N. W. 896, touches upon the question before us. It appears that a wife intrusted her separate property to her husband to invest and manage in his own name, he to transfer it to her when she so desired. While it stood in his name he entered into business, and bought merchandise of persons who knew from the records that the property was in his name, and who relied upon his apparent ownership of it in giving him credit. It was conveyed by the husband to the wife while he was still solvent. In the opinion the court said that it not having been put in the husband's name for the purpose of giving him credit, and no representations having been made, and the wife not having known that credit was given him on the faith of such apparent title, she was not estopped to claim it as her own. See also Biocchi v. Casey-Swasey Co. 91 Tex. 259, 66 Am. St. Rep. 875, 42 S. W. 963, 966, 969; Blake v. Meadows, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Romeo v. Martucci, 72 Conn. 504, 509, 510, 47 L.R.A. 601, 77 Am. St. Rep. 327, 45 Atl. 1, 3, this court said: "There is no question of fraud on the part of the owner; the good faith of his conduct is neither directly or indirectly impugned. The sole claim is that he has 'voluntarily permitted another to hold himself out to the world as being the true owner, and for this purpose intrusted him with the exclusive possession or other indicia of title, under circumstances which would naturally tend to mislead.' The cases where the real owner has been estopped by having clothed the possessor with indicia of title for such purposes and under such circumstances are many; but 'all these cases proceed upon the ground that the owner has deliberately assumed a false position, and a character inconsistent with that of owner, which, if changed, would result in fraud and damage.'" See also Tracy v. Lincoln, 145 Mass. 357, 14 N. E. 122; Stiff v. Ashton, 155 Mass. 130, 29 N. E. 203; Lincoln v. Gay, 164 Mass. 537, 540, 49 Am. St. Rep. 480, 42 N. E. 95.

When Parker signed the officer's receipt in February, 1910 (which was the basis of this action), there was nothing upon the land records of the town of Bridgeport to show that this constituted any encumbrance upon Mrs. Parker's land. No lien, whatever, upon this property, could occur in consequence of Parker's contingent liability upon the officer's receipt without the concurrence of a number of uncertain events, to wit, a judgment against the Colonial Chemical Company, its failure and inability to pay the same, an action and judgment against Parker, and the filing of a judgment lien upon Mrs. Parker's property, which was not done until January, 1912. The record discloses that Mrs. Parker had obtained a conveyance of her property which was recorded in March, 1910, nearly two years before the plaintiff's lien appeared on record. It is the purpose of our system of registry that the apparent owner of record shall be considered as the true owner (so far as subsequent purchasers, without notice to the contrary, are concerned), notwithstanding any unrecorded previous liens or alienations. From the natural equity of Mrs. Parker, and also from the special equity arising from the protections afforded by the prior record of her title, it is manifest that the plaintiff should not receive any aid or support from our system and policy relating to the registry of title to real estate. He who avers an estoppel, either by pleading or evidence, must establish by proofs, positive or circumstantial, every fact that essentially enters into the character of such a claim. It is to be considered that the doctrine of estoppel is an exception to the general rule for the prevention of fraud, and is not to be extended beyond the reasons on which it is founded. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 204; Com. v. Moltz, 10 Pa. 527, 51 Am. Dec. 499, 504. Instead of there being an affirmative finding in favor of the appellant upon the question of knowledge and the negligence of Mrs. Parker in allowing the title to her property to stand in her husband's name, the record shows to the contrary. She did not allow her property to stand in her husband's name that he might thereby obtain credit. It appears that she had no good reason to suspect that, by allowing the title to her property to stand in her husband's name, it would be used as the basis of a credit, or that money would be borrowed, or an obligation taken, upon the faith of it. Mr. Parker had never engaged in any business undertaking or commercial enterprise which required credit. For nearly twenty years the wife had always had the absolute control of the property herself; and she had, upon all occasions, let her business acquaintances know of it. The record does not disclose that Mrs. Parker had any knowledge, directly or indirectly, concerning the attitude which Goldberg had taken toward her property. Neither does it appear that there was any duty on her part to make inquiry in this direction. Under these circumstances, to hold that what was done by Mrs. Parker amounted to fraud or culpable negligence would be a misapplication of the principles on which estoppel in pais is based.

In my opinion the trial court did not err in rendering judgment for the defendants.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

LUCY D. W. MAYS, Appt.,

v.

NEW AMSTERDAM CASUALTY COMPANY.

(40 App. D. C. 249.)

Insurance — accident — statement as to rejection — meaning.

1. A printed statement in an application for accident insurance making the applicant assert that no application made by him for insurance had been declined, and no accident, disease, or health policy had been canceled or renewal refused, does not include life policies, where the word "policy" is uniformly used elsewhere in the application as referring to accident or health policies.

Evidence — accident insurance — examining physician.

2. The calling, in an action on an accident insurance policy, of a physician who attended insured shortly after his injury, does not render admissible evidence of another physician who made an examination of him at a different time, where the statute prohibits the disclosure by a physician without consent of any information confidential in its nature, acquired in attending a patient in a professional capacity, and necessary to enable him to act in that capacity.

Insurance — statement of sound health — meaning.

3. A statement by an applicant for accident insurance, that he is in sound condition, cannot be said to be untrue as matter of law, unless he had an ailment of a character so well defined as appreciably to affect his health.

(April 7, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The question did not call for an answer as to other than accident or health insurance, so that the insured's failure, if there was such, to disclose that he had been declined for life insurance, did not constitute a breach of warranty.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from a judgment upon a directed verdict for the defendant, New Amsterdam Casualty Company, in the supreme court of the District in an action upon an accident and disability policy of insurance issued by the defendant to George W. Mays, —the plaintiff herein, Lucy D. W. Mays, being his wife and the beneficiary under said policy.

In 1901 Mr. Mays, through Thomas A. Weeden, then agent for the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, made an application for life insurance in that company, and, upon an examination indicating diabetes, his application was rejected. The Pacific Mutual also wrote accident and health insurance, and it is in evidence that a policy covering accidents only was issued by this company to Mr. Mays December 20, 1901. This policy was renewed annually until December 20, 1904, when it expired. On August 18, 1903, the company also issued to Mr. Mays a health insurance policy, which was thereafter annually renewed until Mr. Weeden gave up his agency with the Pacific Mutual and became the agent of the defendant company, when, owing to his friendly relations with Mr. Mays, he, according to his testimony, induced Mr. Mays "to change his accident policy in the Pacific Mutual to the defendant company," the date of the present policy being September 27, 1906. On January 7, 1910, Mr. Mays was accidentally injured by having his shin cut in attempting to board a street car, which injury resulted in his death on the 20th of that month. The policy was in force at the time of his death, all premiums having been paid regularly.

Indorsed on the policy and made a part thereof is a schedule of "Statements made by the assured." Under the terms of the policy these statements are made on acceptance thereof and warranted to be true. They are in printed form, the assured doing no more than to supply the information which it is their object to elicit from him. We here reproduce statements 10 to 14, inclusive:

"Statement 10. My income per week from the above occupation exceeds the gross amount of weekly indemnity under all policies carried by me, except as follows: $135—$145 per month.

"Statement 11. I have no accident, disease, or illness insurance issued by this or any other stock company, assessment, or fraternal association, except as follows: $5,000 Aetna expires December.

"Statement 12. If, during the period of this policy, I take other accident, disease, or illness insurance, providing weekly indemnity which together with that provided by this policy shall be in excess of my weekly earnings from the above occupation, I agree to report the same to this company.

"Statement 13. No application ever made by me for insurance has been declined, and no accident, disease, or illness policy issued to me has been cancelled or renewal refused, except as follows: No exceptions.

"Statement 14. I have never made claim nor received indemnity for any accident, disease, or illness, except as follows: $125—Travellers Ins. Co. about 1890."

The court, being of the opinion that the failure of Mr. Mays to mention in statement 13 the rejection of his application for life insurance by the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, in 1901, constituted such a false statement as to void the policy, directed a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff reserving an exception. In approaching the consideration of the question whether Mr. Mays furnished the company all the information concerning prior insurance called for by its printed schedule, we must have in mind the humane and well established rule that "if the policy is so drawn as to require interpretation and to be fairly susceptible of two different constructions, the one will be adopted that is most favorable to the insured." Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019. "The rule is," said the court in McMaster v. New York L. Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 25, 40, 46 L. ed. 64, 73, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, "that if policies of insurance contain inconsistent provisions or are so framed as to be fairly open to construction, that view should be adopted, if possible, which will sustain rather than forfeit the contract." Where statements are printed by the company and submitted to the applicant for the purpose of eliciting from him all facts thought by the company to be material, those statements should be free from ambiguity. It would be a harsh and unjust rule, indeed, that would void a policy where under one interpretation of such a statement the response of the applicant was reasonable and proper, because under another interpretation his answer was not sufficiently comprehensive. Such statements should not require interpretation. Their language should be so direct and simple as to be easily understood, and not open to doubt or conjecture. Especially is this true in a policy where it is claimed that a misstatement, material or otherwise, is fatal to the validity of that policy. The authorities to which we will now refer fully sustain this view.

Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. v. Dobler, 70 C. C. A. 134, 137 Fed. 550, was an action on a life insurance policy. One of the defenses was that the insured had not truthfully answered the question: "Have you any other assurance?" The application also contained the question: "Have you now any insurance on your life? If so, where, when taken, for what amounts, and what kinds of policies?" It appeared that at the time these questions were answered the applicant had one accident policy for $5,000 and another for $1,000, and it was contended that the failure to so state amounted to a breach of warranty. The company's agent knew of this accident insurance, and informed the insured that accident insurance was not called for by the question: "Have you any other assurance?" The circuit court of appeals said: "It seems to us reasonably clear that the first of these questions does not call for a disclosure of any insurance except that which is known as life insurance. In the ordinary understanding or usage, there is a well defined distinction between life insurance and accident insurance. . . . We think that the most that can be claimed in behalf of the plaintiff in error for the questions so propounded to the applicant was that they were so worded as to leave it uncertain whether they called for a disclosure of the accident insurance which he carried at that time. If the insurance company in its printed application employed ambiguous terms or words of doubtful import, it cannot complain if they were construed as they were by the appellant, or if the agent so advised him as to their meaning." The court ruled that the second question, while more comprehensive than the first, must be construed with the first, and that, when so construed, its evident purpose was to inquire whether the applicant had fully answered the previous question, and that its purport was, "Have you now answered as to all life insurance that you carry?"

In Dineen v. General Acci. Ins. Co. 126 App. Div. 167, 110 N. Y. Supp. 344, an action upon an accident and health insurance policy, the words, "no application ever made by me for insurance has ever been declined, and no accident or health policy issued to me has been canceled or renewal refused, except as herein stated," were interpreted by the appellate division of the supreme court. It will be observed that this language is almost identical with the wording of the statement which we are called upon to interpret in the present case. The court said: "There is no question in the application which specifically calls upon the plaintiff to disclose whether he has ever been rejected by a life insurance company. The general statement is made that no application for insurance has been declined. This statement follows the declaration that the applicant has no accident insurance, and precedes one in the same clause that no such policy has been canceled or renewal refused, and the plaintiff might well have inferred that the inquiries were directed solely to accident or health insurance. . . . An insurance company which is making every statement, whether material or otherwise, a warranty, must be held to a very strict rule when it is endeavoring to avoid payment on its insurance contract because of answers to inquiries or declarations which it has framed. They must be so plain or intelligible that any applicant can readily comprehend them. If any ambiguity exists, the construction will obtain most favorable to the insured (citing cases). The defendant might easily have extended its statements to include the rejection by a life insurance company, and then the warranty, if false, might have avoided the policy. It cannot, however, by an uncertain phrase dependent upon an interpretation favorable to itself, deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of a policy for which he has paid and honestly believed was in full force. Literally construed, if the plaintiff's application for a fire insurance policy had been declined, the policy in suit would be void from its inception."

In Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 38 L.R.A. 33, 19 C. C. A. 286, 37 U. S. App. 692, 72 Fed. 413, it was held that certificates in the Knights of Pythias and the Royal Arcanum Mutual Aid Associations were not within the description "policy of life insurance in any other company." So, too, it has been held that there is such a difference between mutual aid associations and insurance companies, that statutory provisions affecting insurance companies do not embrace such associations, and this, notwithstanding one of the prominent characteristics of such associations is the obligation to pay a fixed sum as insurance upon the death of a member. Dickinson v. Ancient Order, U. W. 159 Pa. 258, 28 Atl. 293. Again, in Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Chamberlain, 132 U. S. 304, 311, 33 L. ed. 341, 344, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87, where the question was asked an applicant for life insurance whether he had "any other insurance on his life," it was held that the purport of the word "insurance" in the question was not "so absolutely certain as, in an action upon the policy, to preclude proof as to what kind of life insurance the contracting parties had in mind when that question was answered."

we find that under statement 10 the insured was required to state whether the weekly income received by him from his occupation exceeded the gross amount of weekly indemnity under all policies carried by him. Clearly "all policies," as used in this statement, did not include life insurance policies, for weekly indemnities are not paid under such policies. In other words, "all policies," as used in this statement, excluded life policies. Statement 11 also applies exclusively to accident, disease, and illness insurance. Statement 12 emphasizes and makes still more certain the character of information desired in the preceding statements, for there the applicant agrees, if during the life of the policy he takes out "other accident, disease, or illness insurance," etc., to report same to the company. In statement 13 the applicant represents that no application made by him for insurance has been declined, and no accident, disease or illness policy issued to him has been canceled or renewal refused. Statement 14 concerns indemnity received by the insured for any accident, disease, or illness. It thus appears that under no possible construction can any of said statements be said to relate to life insurance, unless it be the first clause of statement 13. But that clause does not stand alone, nor should the language of the statement be construed without reference to the context, since its phraseology is such as to raise a doubt as to its meaning. Having in mind the preceding statements, and the one following it, we think the assured was justified in assuming that he was not expected or required to state that he had been declined for life insurance. Indeed, the very language of the statement lends cogency to this view. The first clause requires the assured to certify that an application has not been declined, while the second clause goes a step farther and requires a declaration that no such policy, that is, "no accident, disease, or illness policy" issued to him "has been canceled or renewal refused." In other words, the first clause relates to an unsuccessful attempt to obtain accident, disease, or illness insurance, while the second relates to the cancellation or refusal to renew such insurance. We think the statement may be interpreted as though it read: "No application ever made by me for accident, disease, or illness insurance has been declined, and no policy issued to me for such insurance has been canceled or renewal refused." That this was the interpretation placed upon the statement by the company's own agent is very clear from his testimony in this case. He was asked whether, at the time he wrote this policy, he had forgotten that

Mr. Mays had once been rejected, and replied: "I can't say that I had forgotten. It was a different form of insurance. . . . The former was for life insurance, and this is for accident insurance, a different proposition. . . . It was a different form of insurance that he was applying for (the present application), and the questions I asked him were with reference to that portion of the application, and he answered them." The company's agent, who was presumably familiar with the scope of these questions, not understanding them to embrace life insurance, it is not strange that the assured adopted the same view. Moreover, the very company that declined to write a life policy for Mr. Mays, subsequently issued to him a health policy, which was several times renewed. This circumstance, the ambiguity of statement 13, and the interpretation apparently placed upon that statement by the agent of the defendant, tended to lead the assured to believe that his answer was sufficiently comprehensive. We conclude that if information concerning a prior rejection for life insurance was desired by the defendant, it should have framed its statement to that end.

The plaintiff produced as a witness a physician who attended Mr. Mays shortly after his injury. Subsequently, over the objection and exception of the plaintiff, a physician was permitted to testify for the defendant that he had treated Mr. Mays prior to his injury; that he was then suffering from boils about his neck and shoulders, and that an examination of his urine indicated diabetes. We think this was error. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co. 112 U. S. 250, 253, 254, 28 L. ed. 708-710, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 119; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Lear, 31 App. D. C. 184; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Morgan, 35 App. D. C. 195. In the latter case, where, as here, it was alleged that the calling of a physician by the plaintiff amounted to a waiver of the right to object to the evidence of another physician who made an examination at a different time, Mr. Justice Van Orsdel, speaking for this court, said: "We understand the rule in relation to the admission of evidence of this character under statutes similar to ours, to be that waiver of the right can only be claimed where the party testifies to the result of a particular examination, in which case the opposing party may call the physician who made the examination to corroborate or deny the statements made by the party; or where two or more physicians in consultation examine into the physical condition of the party, when, if one of the physicians is called by such 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) party to testify to the results of the examination, another physician present and taking part in the examination may be called by the opposing party to testify in relation thereto. But if the physician whose evidence is sought to be introduced by the opposing party made his examination at a different time from that testified to by the physician introduced, and the party has not testified to the results of such examination, the evidence is inadmissible."

Section 1073 of the Code [31 Stat. at L. 1358, chap. 854] prohibits the disclosure by a physician in this jurisdiction, without the consent of the person afflicted or his legal representatives, except in certain criminal cases, of "any information confidential in its nature, which he shall have acquired in attending a patient in a professional capacity, and which was necessary to enable him to act in that capacity." Nothing can be much more confidential than an examination of a patient by a physician, and nothing can be much more necessary, in our view, to enable the physician to act intelligently. To hold that the nature of the particular illness, and not the relationship of physician and patient, is to determine the applicability of the provisions of § 1073, is practically to emasculate it, and set up a rule dependent upon the views of the particular judge who presides at the trial.

There was some evidence tending to show that Mr. Mays had received medical or surgical attention within the period of five years preceding the date of the policy in suit, and the defendant insists that this evidence established a breach of warranty, and hence justified the court in directing a verdict. Statement 17 in said schedule requires a declaration on the part of the applicant that he has not received medical or surgical attention during such period, but this statement must receive a reasonable interpretation. Moulton v. American L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 335, 28 L. ed. 447, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466. In Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co. 112 U. S. 250, 28 L. ed. 708, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 119, it was held that the question in an application for life insurance, whether the applicant had ever had the disease "of affection of the liver," meant an affection of that organ which amounted to disease, and did not refer to every instance of slight or accidental disorders or ailments affecting the liver which left no trace of injury to health, and were unattended by substantial injury, inconvenience, or prolonged suffering. So, too, in Hubbard v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 40 C. C. A. 665, 100 Fed. 719, it was held that the word "consulted," as used in a similar question, did not relate to the opinion of a physician concerning a slight and temporary indisposition leaving no impress upon the mind. In the present case, the testimony upon this point was conflicting. A physician testified for the defendant to the effect that he treated Mr. Mays "sometime between 1900 and 1905; probably in 1903." In cross-examination this witness fixed the time as "in 1901 or before 1901 and 1903; does not recall date." Plaintiff's testimony tended to show that Mr. Mays did not consult this physician at that time. It was therefore for the jury to determine, under proper instructions from the court, whether Mr. Mays's answer to statement 17 was a fair and true one, within the meaning of that statement.

To the further contention of the defendant that Mr. Mays was not "in sound condition, mentally and physically," within the meaning of statement 16, at the time the policy was issued to him, it is sufficient to say that, under the evidence, the question was for the jury to determine. Healy v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 37 App. D. C. 240. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the assured was in good health at that time and subsequently; that he did not miss a day from his work on account of illness. While the physical examination of the assured in 1901 for life insurance indicated diabetes, the evidence was conflicting as to how long that condition continued. A physician testifying for the defendant as to the condition of the assured at the time of the accident "was unable to tell with any degree of certainty length of time of existence of diabetic condition; would not tell whether it had commenced within last six months or weeks; could not say that on September 27, 1909 (the date of the last renewal of the policy) he had diabetes." Statement 16 does not require the assured to declare his belief that he has had no symptoms of disease, hence if he has no ailment amounting to disease,—that is, an ailment of a character so well defined as appreciably to affect his health,—it cannot be said that he is not in sound physical condition, within the popular meaning of that term. A different ruling would make possible the voiding of almost every similar policy issued. The ordinary person is not a medical expert, and, unless he suffers some pain or annoyance, is not usually conscious of bodily ills. Inasmuch as these policies are written without medical examination on the part of the company, it is apparent, we think, that the assured is not expected to do more than to state his honest belief that he is "in sound condition," physically; that is, that he is not suffering to an appreciable degree with any bodily ill. Of course, if he is affected to an appreciable degree with any physical ailment, he cannot honestly and truthfully state that he is in sound physical condition. If there is room for doubt, the jury should determine the question.

The judgment is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

HIRAM C. McNEIL et al., Appts.,

v.

ROY S. GARY.

Covenant — restriction — right to enforce.

1. A purchaser of a lot in a tract of land opened for residence purposes, the deeds to each of which contain covenants as to the character of building to be placed on the lot, may enforce such covenant against the purchaser of another lot.

Same — breach — stable.

2. The erection on the river of a lot of a stable for use in a drayage, express, and plumbing business is a violation of a covenant in a deed of a city lot that not more than one dwelling house shall be erected on the lot, which shall cost not less than a specified amount, and not to be used for manufacturing, mechanical, or business purposes of any kind.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree in the supreme court of the District, sustaining the demurrer to appellants' bill, and dismissing the same.

The facts, as they appear from the bill, are substantially as follows: B. Francis Saul and others became the owners of a part of a tract of land known as "Maple Grove" in the District of Columbia, which they caused to be subdivided into blocks and lots, and denominated the same "Saul's Addition to the city of Washington." On the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

16th day of April, 1908, they caused a plan of said subdivision to be duly recorded in the office of the surveyor of the District. Appellants Hiram C. and Sarah H. McNeil are joint owners of lot numbered 47 in said subdivision, which they purchased of the grantees of the original owners of said subdivision. The appellant Adam Steinmetz is the owner of lot 41 in said subdivision, which was conveyed to him on April 10, 1909, by said original owners. These two lots are improved by comfortable dwelling houses. The appellee Roy S. Gary, is the owner of lot 45 in said subdivision, which lot she purchased on October 14, 1909, from said original owners.

This subdivision is one of the most desirable in the District for residential purposes, and the great majority of the lots therein have been sold and are now used exclusively for such purposes, the houses costing from $3,500 to more than $20,000. Each deed from said original owners, B. Francis Saul and others, conveying a lot in said subdivision, contained the following covenants:

"And the party of the second part (the grantee) by accepting these presents and in consideration of the above grant, doth hereby covenant, promise, and agree, for herself (himself or themselves), her (his or their) heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to and with the said parties of the first part (the grantors), their heirs and assigns, as follows:

"First. That not more than one dwelling house shall be erected on said lot, and that no apartment house nor flats of any description shall be erected on the same.

"Second. That such building shall not cost less than $3,500 to build, and shall not be used for manufacturing, mechanical, or business purposes of any kind whatsoever, but solely for dwelling purposes."

These covenants were to remain in force for a term of twenty years from January 1, 1906. The appellee, of course, had notice of these covenants, for not only were they inserted in her deed from Saul and others, but she was required, when she purchased her lot, to sign an agreement of similar import. On the front of appellee's lot is a dwelling house valued at not less than $3,500, and there is being erected on the rear of her lot, and within 150 feet of the residence of one of the appellants, a one-story and loft frame stable about 34 feet long and 30 feet wide, containing five stalls for horses and a large space for wagons and carriages. This structure, when completed, is to be used in a drayage or express business and plumbing business now conducted by appellee or her husband. The bill avers that the operation of this stable, as well as its proposed use, will constitute a violation of said covenants and agreement, and will be in violation of the general plan or scheme of improvement in said subdivision. It is also averred that the proposed use of said stable will constitute a nuisance.

In the view we take of the case, the averment that the proposed use of said stable will constitute a nuisance may be treated as surplusage. Since all deeds from Saul and others to lots in this subdivision contained the same restrictive covenants, it is apparent, we think, that those covenants were intended to inure, and did in fact inure, to the benefit of the several purchasers of said lots and subsequent owners thereof. As suggested in the bill, these restrictions were designed to carry out the general scheme of improvement of this subdivision. Each purchaser bought his lot with notice of this scheme, and, of course, with knowledge that every other purchaser would be influenced by it. In other words, the common understanding evidenced by the restrictive covenants induced each purchase. Under such circumstances, it is plain that one owner has a standing in equity to compel another to comply with the terms of his grant. "Equity enforces contracts and covenants in regard to property, entered into between prior grantors and grantees, in regard to the use of property, especially if common property or property descending from a common source, against subsequent owners effected with actual and constructive notice of such contracts or covenants." Trudeau v. Field, 69 Vt. 446, 450, 38 Atl. 162; Allen v. Barrett, 213 Mass. 36, 99 N. E. 575; Hano v. Bigelow, 155 Mass. 341, 29 N. E. 628.

Coming to the merits, we proceed to determine whether the erection of this stable is prohibited by the restrictive covenants affecting this subdivision. It must be remembered that this is a proceeding in equity, where forms give way to substance, and where intent, gleaned from the language of the instrument and the circumstances surrounding the transaction, must govern. While doubts must be resolved in favor of natural rights and the free use of property, they must be founded on reason. Thus, in Clement v. Putnam, 68 Vt. 285, 35 Atl. 181, A owned a lot the surface of which was some 8 feet below the sidewalk, and conveyed the southerly end of this lot to B, covenanting never to erect any "structure or building" on the part of the lot not conveyed, within 4 feet of the portion conveyed. B erected a building on his lot, and subsequently A conveyed the balance of the lot to C, subject to the condition in B's deed. C thereupon erected a building within 4 feet of B's line, and was proposing to fill up the space between the two buildings with earth to the level of the sidewalk. This was held not permissible. The court said: "The fair construction of the deed is, that from the lowest level to which it applies, the space shall be kept vacant, and not that it shall not be filled in a certain manner; and hence an earth filling may well be deemed a structure within the meaning of the deed. Any other construction would frustrate the manifest intention of the parties to the instrument. In Brigham v. H. G. Mulock Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185, it was held that the erection of a double house under one roof constituted a violation of a covenant forbidding more than one building to be erected on one lot for dwelling purposes. See also: St. Andrew's Lutheran Church's Appeal, 67 Pa. 512; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632; Kraft v. Welch, 112 Iowa, 695, 84 N. W. 908; Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765, 11 Cyc. 1077, 1078.

It is admitted that the subdivision here involved is very desirable for residence purposes, and that all the lots that have been sold are now used exclusively for such purposes. Having these circumstances in mind, what is the reasonable construction to be placed upon the restrictive covenants before us? Each grantee of said original holders covenanted, first, that not more than one dwelling house would be erected on his lot, and that no apartment house or flat of any description would be erected; and, second, that such building should not cost less than $3,500, and should not be used for manufacturing, mechanical, or business purposes of any kind, but solely for dwelling purposes. It is not disputed that had the appellee erected a bungalow on the back of her lot, and then attempted to devote that structure to any business purpose, or specifically to the purpose to which she now proposes to devote the structure she is now erecting, she would be subject to the restraining hand of the court; in other words, that her act would be in violation of said covenants. This, of course, inevitably follows from the language of the covenants, and, we think, as clearly demonstrates the weakness of appellee's position. Those who purchased lots in this subdivision were not so much concerned about the possibility that some dwelling house might be devoted to a business purpose, as they were that the subdivision should be exclusively devoted to dwelling purposes. To assume that such purchasers for a moment supposed that these covenants might be construed to mean that stores, moving picture shows, garages, and structures of like character, might be erected on those lots, if erected as such, is entirely to disregard the scheme under which this subdivision was to be developed, and is to convict the purchasers of those lots of a lack of intelligence. In the first place, the provision that not more than one dwelling house shall be erected on a lot was intended to exclude the erection of other structures. This is made manifest by the second clause of the first covenant that no apartment nor flat shall be erected. The parties evidently feared that an apartment house or flat might be regarded as a dwelling house within the meaning of the preceding clause, and hence expressly excepted it from said class. The first restriction in the second covenant, that no such building—that is, no such dwelling house—shall cost less than $3,500, emphasizes what was apparently in the minds of the parties, that this subdivision should be devoted to a good class of dwellings. The next clause prevents, in terms, the use of any dwelling house for manufacturing, mechanical or business purposes of any kind. It seems to us that no one purchasing one of these lots and accepting a deed containing these covenants could reasonably fail to understand that he could not do in one way what he was forbidden to do in another; in other words, that the provision that no more than one dwelling house should be erected on a lot, coupled with the provisions that it should cost not less than $3,500, and not be used for any other purpose, meant that this subdivision should be devoted to dwelling, and not business, purposes. The result, and not the manner of achieving it, is material. Unless these covenants are to be given this construction, they become a mere jumble of words and their obvious intent is frustrated. We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The decree will be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed and remanded.

Van Orsdel, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion and judgment of the court. Restrictions of this nature placed upon the use of real estate are to be strictly construed against the grantor, and liberally in favor of the grantee. Granting to defendant the strict construction of the covenant in the deed which the law accords to him, it amounts to nothing more than that he may only erect one dwelling house, of value not less than $3,500, and he may not use the house for anything but dwelling purposes. With this, and the further limitation as to apartment houses and flats the restriction is complete.

It is averred in the bill that all purchasers of lots in said addition from the original owners thereof signed an agreement containing the following provision: "The purchaser, in accepting and signing this paper, agrees that not more than one dwelling house shall be erected on said lot; that no apartment house nor flats of any description shall be erected on same; that such dwelling shall cost not less than $3,500 to build, and it shall not be used for manufacturing, mechanical, or business purposes of any kind; that it shall not be rented, leased, sold, transferred, or conveyed unto or in trust for any negro or colored person; that these covenants shall be effective and remain in force for the term of twenty (20) years from January 1, 1906, and no longer.

Reading the agreement in connection with the covenant in the deed, no other reasonable conclusion can be reached than that it was intended to make this addition a community of detached houses, not constructed in rows or solid blocks, as is too common in this city. The restriction cannot be extended to other buildings, without reading into it something manifestly not intended by the parties, and adopting a rule of construction the converse of that to which defendant is entitled. It will not do to hold that only the dwelling house described in the restriction may be erected on the lot, to the exclusion of all other buildings essential to the profitable and convenient use of the lot. It must be interpreted as excluding only other dwellings, flats, or apartments. In other words, the owner of a lot in this addition can erect any building on his lot consistent with the building regulations of the District, except flats, apartments, and more than one dwelling house. He is not limited in the use of his lot, as held by the court, merely to a dwelling house of the prescribed value, to the exclusion of any other buildings whatsoever. It has been held in Riverbank Improv. Co. v. Bancroft, 209 Mass. 217, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730, 95 N. E. 216, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 450, that a covenant in a deed providing that "no stable of any kind, private or otherwise, shall be erected or maintained on any portions of said land," will not prevent the erection of a garage. While the garage was prohibited upon another ground, on this point the court said: "Accordingly it must be held that the building is not a stable within the meaning of the restriction. And this is so even if, as argued by the plaintiffs, a garage is as objectionable as a stable." It has also been held that a covenant that not more than one house shall be erected on a lot did not prevent the erection of a stable on the rear of the lot. Hime v. Lovegrove, 11 Ont. L. Rep. 252.

The cases cited and quoted in the opinion

all apply the proper construction to covenants of this sort, read nothing into the restrictions not clearly expressed therein, and might well be cited as authority in support of my contention in this case. Likewise, all averments in the bill, relative to the general scheme in mind when the addition was laid out and the restriction made, are of no importance, since the covenant, being clear and unambiguous, must stand or fall upon its face.

The decree, for these reasons, should be affirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

NATHANIEL GREEN, Appt.,
v.

UNITED STATES.

(40 App. D. C. 426.)

Criminal law — crime with death penalty — right to accept plea of guilty.

Where by statute the jury are authorized to inflict a death penalty for a crime which otherwise would be punishable by imprisonment, the court has no authority to receive a plea of guilty, and thereby withdraw the case from the jury.

(May 14, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court upon a verdict finding him guilty of rape, with death penalty. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. MacDonald and Benjamin L. Gaskins, for appellant:

The courts had no discretion to refuse to accept a plea tendered by the accused when charged with a felony, at common law.

Van Orsdel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant Nathaniel Green, defendant below, was indicted for the crime of rape in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. On arraignment, defendant pleaded guilty, which plea was refused by the court, and he was tried by a jury as upon a plea of not guilty. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, with the death penalty. The court accordingly sentenced the defendant to be executed. Exception was taken to the refusal of the court to accept a plea of guilty, which is the only question presented for review.

Section 808 of the District Code [31 Stat. at L. 1322, chap. 854] provides: "Whoever has carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will, or carnally knows and abuses a female child under sixteen years of age, shall be imprisoned for not less than five nor more than thirty years: Provided, That in any case of rape the jury may add to their verdict, if it be guilty, the words 'with the death penalty,' in which case the punishment shall be death by hanging: provided further, That if the jury fail to agree as to the punishment, the verdict of guilty shall be received, and the punishment shall be imprisonment as provided in this section."

Much has been said at bar and in an exceptionally able brief by counsel for defendant of the right of a defendant to plead guilty in a capital case when there is no statutory provision to the contrary, and thus avoid an issue for trial by jury. It is unnecessary to determine whether a defendant, in the absence of a law to the contrary, has the right to enter a plea of guilty in a criminal proceeding. Where the statute permits the plea of guilty, and such a plea is accepted and entered by the court in a criminal case, it is the highest kind of conviction of which the case admits. In that instance, there is nothing left for the court but to award judgment. In this case, however, we are confronted by a statutory provision which we think in effect forbids the acceptance of a plea of guilty for the crime of rape in this District. Section 808, supra, specifically provides that "in any case of rape" the jury may impose the death penalty. As further evidence of the intention of Congress that all such cases shall be tried to a jury, the second proviso imposes the smaller punishment upon a verdict of guilty where the jury are unable to agree 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) as to the imposition of the death penalty. The statute, in other words, admits of one of three different verdicts,—guilty, without assessment of the death penalty, in which case the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment in his discretion of from five to thirty years; guilty, with the death penalty, when the court must pass judgment of death by hanging; and guilty with division of opinion in the jury as to the imposition of the death penalty, in which case the court shall pass judgment as in the first instance; but in all cases the court must have the verdict of the jury upon which to base its judgment.

In Indiana, where the statute in capital cases prescribes the punishment of death or imprisonment, in the discretion of the jury, it has been held that a defendant in a capital case must be tried by jury, and if a plea of guilty is entered, a jury must still try the issues to determine the degree of punishment. Wartner v. State, 102 Ind. 51, 1 N. E. 65, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 178. The difference between the Indiana statute and the one under consideration is that there the whole question of punishment is left to the jury, while here the question of punishment is with the court, except in such cases as the jury may assess the death penalty. It logically follows that to determine those cases, each case must, of necessity, be submitted to a jury. The court is therefore without power to accept a plea of guilty upon an indictment charging rape in this District.

Statutes depriving a defendant of the right to plead guilty, where the alternative punishment of death or imprisonment is left to the discretion of the jury, are upheld upon the theory that he cannot be prejudiced, in that the constitutional safeguard of a trial by jury is accorded him. Under the present statute, however, when defendant was deprived of the right to plead guilty, it became possible, as it does in all cases of rape in this District, for the jury to impose the death penalty, whereas could he have pleaded guilty, the court could have imposed only the punishment of imprisonment. The imposition of this limitation upon a person charged with crime is within the power of Congress, and deprives a defendant of no constitutional right. If a plea of guilty may be accepted under the present statute, it places it within the power of defendants, in just such cases as the jury would be likely to assess the higher punishment, to escape such punishment by entering a plea of guilty, thereby nullifying the whole intent of Congress.

The absurdities to which the contention of counsel for defendant would lead are well expressed in the opinion of the learned trial judge, as follows: "The contention of the defendant is that there was no issue to be submitted to the jury, inasmuch as his plea admitted his guilt; that hence there could be no verdict and consequently no addition of the death penalty. His construction of the statute is that the legislature said to him, 'If you will plead guilty, you shall be imprisoned only; if you plead not guilty and are found guilty by the jury, you may be hanged;' that, faced with this alternative, he plead guilty and is entitled to the milder punishment. Is that a construction that can properly and legally be placed upon the statute? Is it legitimate to suppose that the legislature has put a penalty upon pleading not guilty? Would a legislature have a constitutional right to penalize an accused person for pleading not guilty? Suppose the legislature should say, 'The punishment of this crime shall be imprisonment only, if the accused will confess his guilt in open court, but if he will not confess, and insists upon the government proving its case against him, then, in case he is convicted, he shall be hanged.' Would such an act be constitutional? Could any court in such circumstances ever have any assurance that a plea of guilty was a voluntary plea? If a judge should say to the accused, 'If you will plead guilty, I will give you a lighter sentence than I shall give you if you plead not guilty, and are convicted,' what would be the result? Any sentence passed upon a plea of guilty thus obtained would be set aside. Can we then suppose that the legislature intended to do such a thing? Nobody doubts the right and power of the legislature to require the guilt of the accused to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury, even if he pleads guilty. The only question is whether it has exercised that power in the case of this statute. If we say that it has not,—if we hold that it has offered the accused a reward for pleading guilty, or threatened him with severer punishment if he shall require the case to be proved against him,—then we must hold that the provision is unconstitutional and void as violating the clause of the Federal Constitution in the 6th Article of Amendment, which guarantees that 'in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury.' For how can one be said to be left in the free enjoyment of a jury trial when the statute subjects him to a severer punishment on being found guilty by a jury than when he is adjudged guilty on his own plea?"

The judgment is affirmed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF GAINESVILLE, Appt.,

v.

GAINESVILLE GAS & ELECTRIC POWER COMPANY.

(— Fla. —, 62 So. 919.)

Mandamus — to compel performance of public service.

1. The policy of the law is to require by mandatory process the performance by public utility corporations of their duties to the public.

Electricity — duty to furnish.

2. A corporation engaged in furnishing electricity to a municipality or its inhabitants and using public streets or exercising other franchises or privileges in doing so is thereby performing services of a public nature, within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of this state, and such a corporation is subject to lawful governmental regulations to enforce its duties to the public it undertakes to serve.

Public service — compulsory performance — necessity of contract.

3. An express contract is not essential to establish reciprocal rights between a public service company and the public it undertakes to serve. Such rights arise by implication of law.

Same — duty to render.

4. Where a public utility company uses franchises and assumes the duty imposed by law to render a reasonably adequate service during the time its rights and duty may lawfully continue, such duty may be enforced by appropriate legal procedure, where no adequate excuse for nonperformance is appropriately shown.

Same — confiscatory governmental regulations — effect.

5. Allegations that governmental regulations are in effect confiscatory and unduly arbitrary and burdensome to a public service company do not justify the company in arbitrarily discontinuing the public service, for the company has adequate remedies by due course of law to protect itself against the enforcement of illegal governmental regulations.

Headnotes by WHITFIELD, J.

Note. — Right of electric supply company, in absence of contract, to discontinue service generally.

As indicated in the title, this note does not include the question of the right of an electric supply company to discontinue its service to particular individuals as distinguished from the public generally or the business as a whole.

GAINESVILLE v. GAINESVILLE GAS & ELECTRIC POWER Co. seems to be the only case which has passed squarely upon the exact question thus presented, but a similar question has arisen in connection with Same — compensation — equal protection of laws.

6. While it is the duty of a public service company to observe all lawful municipal regulations, the company has a right to a reasonable compensation for the public service it renders and to the equal protection of the laws in every department of the government.

Same — illegal regulation — effect.

7. Illegal municipal regulations are not binding; but persons and corporations cannot be permitted to arbitrarily assume to remedy an alleged wrong by refusing to render a public service voluntarily undertaken.

Party — compelling public service.

8. The municipality is a proper party in proceedings to require a public service company to continue the performance of its public service in a reasonably adequate manner for the benefit of the city and its inhabitants.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Gainesville obtained an injunction restraining the Gas & Electric Company "from closing down or discontinuing its public service business" of furnishing electricity to the city and its inhabitants. A demurrer to the bill of complaint was interposed. This appeal is from an order "that the injunction be and the same is dissolved, with the right of the complainant to amend the bill in ten days from this date, or the bill may be dismissed without prejudice to such other action as the complainant may be advised is proper." The question to be determined is whether there was error in dissolving the injunction.

The bill of complaint alleges, in effect: That the municipality has all the usual powers of cities in this state, and is authorized "to provide for the lighting of the streets of said city, and to provide for the lighting of the said city by gas and other illuminating material, and to do and perform all such other acts as shall seem necessary and best adapted to the improvement and general interest of said city, or as shall be necessary for the health, convenience, and safety of its citizens." That a charter was granted by the state to the defendant as a corporation, authorizing the corporation to exist for 99 years, and, among other things, to engage in the business of manufacturing, generating, and selling electric current for lighting and power purposes; such business to be engaged in in the city of Gainesville. That thereafter the company erected "and constructed within the corporate limits of said city of Gainesville an electric lighting and power plant, and by and with the permission of said city aforesaid, erected and constructed its poles and wire for the distribution of electric current over and along a large number of the streets of said city, and from that date until the present time has been continuously engaged in the manufacture and sale of electricity for illuminating and power purposes. That during all that time and to this date the said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company have been continuously furnishing electricity to said city for the lighting of the streets, public places, and public buildings of said city, and are now furnishing electricity therefor; and that during all of said time it has furnished electricity to the inhabitants of said city who desired to procure the same, and who paid therefor, and that complied with the rules and regulations of such company; and that continuously from the time when said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company began the manufacture, generation, and sale of such electricity it has sought to increase the number of consumers of its products among the inhabitants of said city, and to induce them to abandon other systems and methods of illumination, and to become consumers of its electric products; and that at the present time there are about six hundred sixty (660) dwellings, stores, and other buildings within said city which are supplied by it with electricity as the only means of illumination. That, in addition thereto, said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company have been furnishing and selling electric motors for the furnishing of power for the operation of manufacturing plants and ginneries, and has equipped and supplied it its motors to cotton gins in said town which it is estimated will gin during the coming season in the aggregate about 1,000 bales of cotton.

"That there is also located in said city the University of the State of Florida, a state institution of learning, which now consists of two dormitories with the aggregate of one hundred fifty-six (156) bedrooms, four academic buildings completed and in use, two others that will shortly be completed and ready for use, at which university there will be in the coming scholastic year, beginning with the month of September, an attendance of from three hundred fifty to four hundred students from about forty-four counties of this state. That in some of the academic buildings electricity is a necessity for the operation of machinery and appliances used in the course of study pursued therein, and in all thereof it is the sole and only means of illumination. That the said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company has been supplying said University of Florida with electricity for illumination and power purposes since the location and construction thereof within said city, and that all the buildings thereon have been constructed solely for the use of electricity for the illumination thereof, and that the said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company has been receiving from said university between two hundred and two hundred and fifty dollars per month in payment for the electric current it has furnished therefor." That said company is the only "person, firm, or corporation in the said city of Gainesville engaged in the manufacture, generation, and sale of electricity. That it has acquired and holds a valuable easement from said city in the permission granted it to use and in the use of the streets of said city wherein it has erected its poles and placed its wires for the purpose of conveying and by means of which it conveys its electric current, and that as a corporation authorized by the state of Florida to engage in the business of supplying a public utility it is the duty of said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company to continue to supply electric current as aforesaid to said city and those of its inhabitants who are consumers thereof, and that it is without power or authority to cease and discontinue such service to the said city, or such of its inhabitants who are consumers thereof, and that said city of Gainesville will be without ability to light the streets, or to properly protect the lives and property of its inhabitants. That such of its inhabitants who are consumers of electric current will be without adequate means for the illumination of their homes and places of business. That the producers of cotton who rely upon the ginning thereof by the ginneries located in said city will be obliged to haul their products for long distances to reach other ginneries, and that the operation of the university of the state, the giving of its course of study, and the opportunity properly to pursue the same, will be greatly impaired and retarded in the event the said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company shall cease the manufacture and sale of electricity as it has announced its intention so to do, and that neither the said city of Gainesville, nor the other consumers of electricity among its inhabitants as aforesaid, can be adequately compensated in damages in the event of the wrongful discontinuance of the manufacture and sale of electricity by the said Gainesville Gas & Electric Power Company, and that your orator is without adequate remedy at law in the premises." "That the company has published its intention to discontinue the public service it has undertaken to perform."

The policy of the law is to require by mandatory process the performance by public utility corporations of their duties to the public. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 57 Fla. 533, text 539, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 48 So. 639.

A corporation engaged in furnishing electricity to a municipality or its inhabitants, and using public streets or exercising other franchises or privileges in doing so, is thereby performing services of a public nature, within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of this state; and such a corporation is subject to lawful governmental regulations to enforce its duties to the public it undertakes to serve. Such a corporation is manifestly a "public service" or "public utility" corporation, and is subject to the rules of law applicable to corporations or companies engaged in performing or rendering service of a public nature. See 1 Wyman, Pub. Ser. Cor. § 113.

As the gas and electric company had received and accepted from the state a corporate charter authorizing it to engage in the business of manufacturing, generating, and selling electric current for lighting and power purposes to the municipality and its inhabitants, and had, by and with the permission of the city, constructed its plant, using the streets of the city for its poles and wire by means of which the public service of furnishing electric current to the city and its inhabitants for lighting and power purposes was performed, for which the company was entitled under the Constitution and laws of this state to receive a reasonable compensation in return for service rendered, the company assumed the duty imposed by implication of law to render a reasonably adequate service during the time its rights and duty may lawfully continue, and such duty may be enforced where no adequate excuse for nonperformance is appropriately shown. See Zanesville Gaslight Co. v. Zanesville, 47 Ohio St. 35, 23 N. E. 60. An express contract is not essential to establish reciprocal rights between a public service company and the public it undertakes to serve. Such rights arise by implication of law. See State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 53 Fla. 650, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 320, 44 So. 213, 12 Ann. Cas. 359.

The defense undertaken to be shown when the injunction was dissolved is in substance that the ordinances passed by the city regulating the company's service and compensation are in effect confiscatory and unduly arbitrary, and burdensome to the company. This is not a sufficient reason for a discontinuance of the public service. While it is the duty of the company to observe all lawful municipal regulations, the company has a right to receive a reasonable compensation for the public service it renders to the city and its inhabitants, and to the equal protection of the laws in every department of the government. If the regulations imposed by the city are in law and in fact illegal for any reason, the company has its complete and adequate remedy by appropriate proceedings; but the company, being engaged in rendering a public service, must continue to do so in a reasonably adequate manner until relieved of its duty by due process of law. Illegal municipal regulations are not binding; but persons and corporations cannot be permitted to arbitrarily assume to remedy an alleged wrong by refusing to render a public service voluntarily undertaken. The service to the public must be performed, and 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the law will, upon proper proceedings, enforce the right to reasonable compensation for service rendered. An ordinary action at law would not afford an adequate remedy to the public. Under the liberal rules of procedure recognized in this state, the company may, by cross bill or other appropriate steps, secure a determination and enforcement of its right to reasonable compensation and to equal protection of the laws.

The municipality is a proper party in proceedings to require the public service company to continue the performance of its public service in a reasonably adequate manner for the benefit of the city and its inhabitants. Since it clearly appears that the company is actually enjoying franchises and has undertaken to render public service, it is not essential that the particular terms and limitations under which the service is being rendered should be alleged in proceedings to enforce a continuance of the public service actually engaged in; there being nothing to indicate that the rights of the company had expired or had been lawfully surrendered or forfeited, but inferences of a continuing right and duty being fairly deducible from the proceedings.

While the public service must be performed in a reasonably adequate manner, unlawful regulations as to rates should not be enforced. The court may, on a proper showing, enjoin illegal regulations of the rates to be charged; the duty of the company being to render the service undertaken, and its right being to charge a reasonable compensation for service rendered.

The decree dissolving the injunction is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to retain the bill of complaint for the purposes of appropriate injunction orders, with leave to the defendant company, by cross bill or other procedure, to test the validity of the municipal regulations of which it complains.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FRANK STARR.

(— C. C. A. —, 206 Fed. 157.)

Master and servant — supplying borrowed ladders — liability for accident.

1. A telephone company which furnishes ladders to men engaged in installing wires in a city is responsible for the condition of those borrowed by the men by direction of its foreman when its own supply gives out. Same — ladder — simple appliance.

2. Ladders of more than ordinary length furnished by a telephone company for the use of its employees who are engaged in installing wires in a city are not simple appliances within the rule which relieves the master from responsibility for the condition of such appliances.

Same — absence of inspection — effect.

3. A master who furnishes to an employee, without inspection, a ladder of unusual length for use in the employment, is responsible for injury to the employee through the breaking of the ladder because of a defect which reasonable inspection would have disclosed.

Trial — jury — assumption of risk.

4. The jury must determine whether or not the defect in a ladder furnished an employee for use in his employment, which caused an injury to the employee, was so obvious that the employee assumed the risk.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern Division of the Western District of Washington to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gilbert, Circuit Judge, and Wolverton and Dietrich, District Judges.

Messrs. Pillsbury, Madison, & Sutro and Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, for plaintiff in error:

The two pieces of ladder were secured by McCartney and Filer. These men, as well as Smith, the so-called foreman, were fellow servants of the plaintiff below.

The distinction is well recognized between those cases where the master undertakes to furnish the appliances and those where the servants secure them for themselves.

Wolverton, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, who was plaintiff below, while engaged in cleating a cable through which were carried telephone wires to the side wall of a building in Seattle, Washington, fell from near the top of a ladder to the pavement below, a distance of from 20 to 25 feet, and was severely injured. Starr was in the employ of the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company at the time, to perform the service in which he was then engaged. The immediate cause of the accident was a defective round in the ladder, being the second from the top, which gave way. The round consisted of a board from 2½ to 3 inches in width by about three-quarters of an inch in thickness, which was sawed across the grain. With the weight of Starr upon it, it split out with the grain diagonally across the piece. For the injury thus sustained Starr sues to recover damages. The action is based upon the negligence of the company in furnishing the plaintiff with a defective and unsafe ladder upon which to perform his work, and in failing to properly inspect such ladder, or to exercise reasonable care and precaution in the selection of the same for plaintiff's use. For the particular work in hand a long extension ladder had been brought from the company's supply, and, finding that other ladders were needed, at the direction of George E. Smith, the foreman, two short ladders were picked up in the vicinity, one by Filer and another by McCartney, two men also working with plaintiff, there being six men working at the time. It being made known to Smith that another long ladder was needed, he directed the men to splice the two short ladders picked up by Filer and McCartney. This was done by Starr, the plaintiff, and McCartney, and no defect developed in the splicing. The ladders were spliced the day before the accident occurred.

The following is in effect a brief résumé of the testimony so far as deemed pertinent for application of the proper legal principles which control the case:

George E. Smith, who was foreman of the gang that was at work at the time for the defendant company, testified that a majority of the ladders was supplied by the telephone company; that as a general thing he got the ladders, that is, when they were telephone ladders; that it was not always possible to get a sufficient number of ladders from the telephone company, and in that emergency if he (Smith) was around he always told the men to borrow them,—to get them. As respects the ladder in controversy, he further says that it consisted of two pieces; that he knew where the top piece came from,—it was borrowed by Filer a couple of days before the accident; that Filer used the top piece for a while in putting up terminal boxes for connecting wires with the cable, these boxes being from 7 to 8 feet from the ground, and the ladder about 6 feet long; that the ladder was weatherbeaten, the sides being dressed and the boards or crosspieces rough, and the whole ladder was of fir. He further testified that crossgrained sticks are not usually used for rounds of ladders; that he was at the place of the accident substantially every day, and saw the ladders in use during the time before the accident; that he had a conversation with the men, in the presence of Starr, concerning the ladders; that they wanted a longer ladder to get up on the building with, and he told them to splice the two short ladders together and use them; that he did not observe any crossgrained round in the shorter ladder of the two, such condition not being apparent, and he did not think it would be apparent without a special inspection of the round; that he made no inspection of either of the ladders. On cross-examination he further testified that whenever the men were stringing a cable he was always right there.

Thomas McCartney testified that he was working with Starr at the time; that the extension ladder was furnished by the company; that it was the understanding that the company should furnish the ladder; that it did not always provide a sufficient number of ladders for the use of the men, and when the company failed in that respect the men "used to have to rustle around the alleys and get them;" that this was done by the order of the foreman; that he thought Filer borrowed the short ladder, that being the topmost piece of the spliced ladder, and he (the witness) borrowed the longer piece; that the rounds were nailed to the side pieces of the ladder, not notched in; that he did not observe any crossgrained rounds in the ladder,—they were not apparent to a person with ordinary use of the ladder,—and that the use of a crossgrained piece would not be safe; that the men asked the foreman for some ladders to do the work; that the foreman replied that the men would have to rustle for them, and then, after the ladders were procured, he directed them to be spliced.

R. D. McMellon testified that George Smith was the foreman in charge at the time; that the company was supposed to furnish ladders, though it did not always furnish them; that when the job required a large number of ladders the foreman directed the men to borrow them, and this they did; he heard Smith tell two of the boys to splice the two ladders together; that the ladder in question was unpainted and roughly finished; that he examined the rung of the ladder at the time, and it was broken,—that is, split "kind of crossways," and the larger piece was hanging down,—that was after the accident; that the condition of the board before the accident would have been observable if one had made a close inspection of it.

On cross-examination he testified:

Q. Now, how close an inspection would it have required to see that this rung which broke was crossgrained?

A. Well, I imagine it would have taken a careful examination of it before the accident.

Q. How do you mean; how careful?

A. Well, if a man got right down and probably examined the wood real carefully and close he could have noticed it.

Q. Suppose Smith had examined it to determine whether it was crossgrained or not, what would he have had to have done; would he have had to scrape the timber?

A. I think not.

Q. He wouldn't had to have done that!

A. No.

Q. Would he have had to use a magnifying glass?

A. I wouldn't judge he would have.

Q. You mean to say Smith could have seen it with his naked eye, if he had just taken the ladder in his hand and looked at it?

A. I think he could, yes; if he had looked at it closely.

Q. How long would it have taken him to do that?

A. I shouldn't judge it would have taken very long.

Q. Could he have done it in an instant?

A. No; I think not.

Q. He wouldn't have had to cut into the grain, or anything of that kind?

A. It wouldn't have taken him very long to examine the one rung.

Q. He wouldn't have had to scrape the timber, or cut into it at all?

A. I think not. I don't know. He might have.

Other witnesses—Werner and Dalton—testified along the same line.

The plaintiff testified that he noticed Filer working on the ladder, and that he didn't examine it in particular.

He was asked:

Did such observation as you gave to the ladders, or either of them, disclose any danger about them?

A. No, sir; I thought they was perfectly safe.

And in other respects he testified in like manner as the foregoing witnesses. He also said that Smith, the foreman, could not have told the rung was crossgrained by just glancing at it: "If he had got right down close, and been looking for a crossgrain, he would have found it."

He was asked:

Now, explain that; you think he could have told—you think Smith could have told—so as to have kept you off the ladder, if he had gotten down close to it, and looked at it closer?

A. He could; yes. The same as one of those others were crossgrained and he didn't know it.

The only witness called by the defendant was Filer, who testified in effect that he borrowed the short ladder, and that he considered it rather frail.

At the close of the testimony the defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor, which was denied. Judgment was for plaintiff, and the telephone company prosecutes a writ of error.

It is first contended by counsel for the company that the rule which imposes liability upon an employer who furnishes unsafe appliances has no application here, because the company did not furnish the appliance, but the same was selected by the plaintiff and his fellow servants.

We cannot agree with counsel in this statement as to who furnished the ladders. The strong tendency, if not the great weight of the testimony, is to the effect that the company was to furnish the ladders with which the men were to do their work in adjusting the cable. It was only when the company failed to furnish the requisite number of ladders from its supply that the men were required to get them elsewhere in the vicinity for their use; and this they did generally at the direction of the foreman. The very ladders which were conjoined were procured from the neighborhood by the direction of the foreman, and the splicing was done also at his direction; he designating what ladders should be joined. True, the company did not furnish these specific ladders out of its stock; but it did direct, through its foreman, how they should be procured, and, when procured, it directed their use and the specific manner in which they should be used. In such a case it is far from accurate to say that the company did not furnish the ladders. In legal effect just the contrary is true, for it did furnish them through the direction of the foreman how to obtain them. The situation is no different than if the foreman himself had gone out and got the ladders and turned them over to the men and directed them to use them. The act was the act of the company, for the men's employment and their engagement in the work contemplated that the company should furnish the ladders. The men did not engage to furnish any such tools, instrumentalities, or conveniences. This is a sufficient answer to the contention, without the citation of authorities; it being mainly one of fact. To say the least, the evidence was more than ample to carry the case to the jury upon the hypothesis that the company, and not the men, was to furnish the ladders, and upon the further proposition that the company did in fact furnish the ladders in use by the men, and upon which Starr was working at the time of his fall.

Counsel next insist that a ladder is a simple appliance,—that is, of a class with the ordinary carpenter's or mechanic's tools,—and that accidents occasioned by the use of such simple appliances are not actionable. Many authorities are cited in support of this proposition, but their application is not apparent, when the nature of the work in which these men were engaged and the kind of ladders required for their service are taken into account. The company was engaged in constructing a telephone system, or a part of it, throughout the city of Seattle, which required the stretching of wires, and cables carrying wires, by adjusting them upon poles and buildings where convenient at a considerable height from the ground. This required the use of ladders not of the ordinary kind, such as stepladders and short contrivances used about the house or by mechanics about their general work, but ladders of more than the ordinary length, and extension ladders calculated to reach high positions, which could be used with safety by men doing that character of work. These are the kind of appliances, and not the simple or ordinary kind, that the company was supposed to furnish for the use of the men engaged in the particular work in hand. And it was the attempt to supply a long ladder, one of unusual length, that led to the accident complained of. So it is not apparent that the doctrine sought to be invoked has application here.

But let us consider the subject from another direction. The master is charged with the duty of observing reasonable care and precaution in furnishing to his employees reasonably safe tools and implements with which to do their work. The duty is not absolute to provide reasonably safe tools and implements, for he is not an insurer on that score, but to exercise reasonable care and forethought in providing such tools and implements as are reasonably suitable and safe for the work. When he has done this, he has discharged his bounden duty to his servants and employees. This duty imposes upon the master the responsibility of inspecting these instrumentalities to determine their safety, and here again he may be excused for a failure to discover defects, if he has been reasonably careful and diligent in making the inspection; but he is not to be excused in failure to make any inspection at all. If a tool or appliance is defective, and the defect is discoverable upon a careful scrutiny and examination, such as a reasonably prudent and careful man would make under like circumstances, the master would be at fault in furnishing such a tool or appliance to his workmen, and his failure to inspect could not help him. It would injure him, rather, as he would be guilty of a neglect of duty. If, however, the defect was latent in character, and not ordinarily discoverable by reasonable inspection, then he could not be held accountable. The duty to make the inspection, however, would remain, though, if the defect was of that character that a reasonable inspection would not disclose it, there could, of course, be no liability for failing to inspect.

The workman assumes those risks of danger which are ordinarily incident to the work in which he is engaged, and those which are open and obvious to the senses, and which are known to him, if he continues in the occupation. He assumes none that may arise from latent defects in appliances not apparent from casual observation, which appliances it is the duty of the master to furnish, and to exercise reasonable care with reference to their selection.

The common tools doctrine is but an adjunct of the doctrine of the assumption of risk. If the tools are so simple that their mechanism, structure, and defects, if they have any, are as obvious to the workman as to the master, then and upon this account he assumes the risks attending the use of them. As is said in Vanderpool v. Partidge, 79 Neb. 165, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 668, 112 N. W. 318: "The reason for the rule [the common tools rule] is that any defect in such simple tools or appliances would be as obvious to the servant as to the master."

But the rule can have no application where the appliance is of such character as that it cannot be classified as a simple tool or implement in mechanical use. In such a case the ordinary rule applies that the workman assumes such risks only as are open and obvious while pursuing his work, and he assumes no risks that are not apparent to the senses in that way. It is not incumbent upon him to make an inspection to determine the safety of implements and appliances furnished him in the course of his employment by the master. That is the duty of the master, not of the workman.

These principles are discussed and applied in the following cases of more or less analogy to the present: Ohio & P. Milk Co. v. Fehl, 109 C. C. A. 640, 187 Fed. 792; Williams v. Garbutt Lumber Co. 132 Ga. 221, 64 S. E. 65; Jones v. Pacific Mills, 176 Mass. 354, 57 N. E. 663, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 63; Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 61 Hun, 619, 39 N. Y. S. R. 674, 15 N. Y. Supp. 400; Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. 98 Me. 353, 64 L.R.A. 551, 57 Atl. 85, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 563.

The conclusion of the court in the latter case is peculiarly applicable here. It is as follows: "And we think it was fairly open to the jury to find that the defective condition of the round might have been discovered had it been suitably inspected; not, perhaps, by such an inspection as would naturally be given to it by the workman 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon it, whose duty it was to work, not to inspect, and who might lawfully rely upon the presumption that the master had performed its duty, but by such an inspection on the part of the master as reasonably would be necessary to make sure that an appliance upon which the servant was to risk his life or limb every time he used it was reasonably safe."

These considerations lead to the conclusion that the real question was one of assumption of risk on the part of Starr in the use of this ladder, and that the evidence adduced developed a cause proper to be submitted to the jury, and not one for the court to determine as matter of law.

Likewise the question whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence under the evidence was one for the jury, and not for the court.

Lastly, it is insisted that plaintiff failed to prove his cause of action. What has been said already is sufficient to indicate that the proofs offered were quite sufficient upon which to submit the cause to the jury.

Affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

HENRY F. WALTERS et al., Appts.,

v.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(120 Md. 644, 88 Atl. 47.)

Evidence — general issue — altering street grade — admissibility of ordinance.

1. An ordinance authorizing the construction of a bridge approach in a public street is admissible under the general issue in an action to hold the municipality and the railroad company constructing the bridge liable for injuries thereby caused to the property of an abutting owner.

Highway — change of grade — taking property — joint liability.

2. A municipal corporation and a railroad company which jointly undertake to elevate the grade of a street so as to abolish a grade crossing of the railroad track are both liable in case the improvement is a taking of the property rights of abutting owners.

Eminent domain — construction of bridge approach — cutting off access — right to compensation.

3. The construction of a bridge approach in a public street for the purpose of abolishing a grade crossing of railroad tracks, in such a manner as to cut off the access of an abutting owner from the lower portion of his building to the street, and to shut off the light and air therefrom, is a taking within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring compensation to be made for property taken for public use.

Appeal — joint defendant — establishing individual liability.

4. Upon the direction of a verdict in favor of both defendants in an action against a city and a railroad company for damages to abutting property by the construction of an approach to abolish a grade crossing of the railroad tracks, the appellate court, in reversing the judgment, cannot place the entire liability on one defendant — the exclusion of the other.

Contract — as to liability for injury to property — effect on owner.

5. An abutting property owner whose property is injured by the construction of a bridge approach to carry a street over a railroad is not bound by the provisions of a municipal ordinance attempting to fix the liability for injuries as between the municipality and the railroad company, so as to prevent his recovery against both.

(May 8, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' property through the change of the grade of a highway. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward L. Ward and Edward M. Hammond, for appellants:

Governmental agencies are liable for private property actually taken by them, and by taking is meant an entry upon and an appropriation thereof.

If the erection of this bridge was for the benefit of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company primarily, instead of for the benefit of the city, then the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is liable to the appellants for damages to their property.

If the Hamburg street bridge has been so located as to inevitably cause injury to the appellants because it is constructed at a place totally unsuited for it, and because it is calculated to occasion injury like the one complained of, then the mayor and city council of Baltimore and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company are liable.

4 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1681.

Mr. Duncan K. Brent, also for appellees.

Stockbridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1905 an ordinance was passed by the mayor and city council of Baltimore creating a commission to confer with representatives of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company for the general purpose of abolishing numerous grade crossings of highways of the city in South Baltimore by the tracks of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. The object to be accomplished was one of mutual benefit to the public at large and to the railroad company. Numerous conferences appear to have been held between the members of this commission and persons representing the railroad, and the results of these conferences were embodied in an ordinance of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, No. 387, approved on the 16th day of August, 1909. The ordinance was usually long, and dealt with a number of distinct subjects. The preamble recited that "it has become imperative that certain crossings at the grade of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in South Baltimore should be abolished, and . . . in connection with the abolishing of said grade crossings, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company desires to make certain improvements to and relocations of its lines of railroad in and near the city of Baltimore." The ordinance then proceeds to grant the consent of the mayor and city council to the construction of the lines of railroad so desired, in accordance with the terms embodied in the ordinance, provided the obligations imposed upon the railroad company should be assented to by that company, and the work executed in accordance with it. By § 2, Hamburg street, Lee street, Cross street, and Stockholm street were named as being streets where bridges were to be constructed so as to carry the city traffic above the grade of the railroad tracks; all the cost of the work to be met as provided in the ordinance, and the physical work done under the supervision of and subject to the approval of the city engineer. In § 7, parts of thirty-eight streets were named to be closed by the city to public traffic, which was, upon the completion of all the work, to be concentrated upon the four streets named in § 2, and carried on those streets above the grade of the railroad tracks. In § 3, detailed provision was made as to the construction of the bridge upon Hamburg street, which was to be constructed at the expense of the railroad company, and to have an elevation at the point where the bridge proper began of 32.60 feet; later on in the same section it was provided that "the approaches to said bridges shall be constructed upon a location to be fixed and provided by the city of Baltimore at its own cost, and said city shall make all changes in the established street grades which may be necessary for the construction of said bridges and approaches, and bear all expense of widening or changing any streets and acquiring any land, easements, and rights necessary for the construction of said approaches." The cost of building these approaches and paving them was to be met by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and after construction the city was required by the ordinance to maintain all the approaches to said bridges and the paving and sidewalks upon said approaches. By § 3½, provision was made for what is said to be a change and reestablishment of grade of parts of Hamburg street, the intent of which was to make provision for a gradient approach to the bridge at the east building line of Howard street. It did not, however, propose to extend this gradient for the entire width of the street, or the entire width of the space between the curbs, but provided for its construction from a point 37 feet north of the south building line of Hamburg street, thus leaving the northern part of the street, both sidewalk and roadway, at the same level as it had theretofore existed, but the south portion of said street was to rise by an incline from the east curb line of Sharp street to an elevation of 32.60 feet at the east building line of Howard street. This approach was to have a roadway 25 feet in width, and a sidewalk 10 feet in width, thus bringing it almost in contact with buildings erected upon the building line on the south side of Hamburg street. The effect of such construction was, according to the amount of the elevation of the approach at any particular point, to seriously interfere with, or practically shut off, all access to buildings having a front on the south side of Hamburg street between Sharp and Howard streets. It inevitably also inflicted serious damage upon the light and air, certainly so far as the first floor was concerned, of all of such buildings, and accordingly there was inserted in the ordinance, as § 18, the following: "Section 18. And be it further ordained that, in order to provide absolutely and in all events for compensation for the damages that will be sustained by the owners of property injuriously affected by the changes in grade herein provided for under § 3½, the mayor and city council of Baltimore hereby obligate itself to urge the legislature of Maryland, at its next session, in January, 1910, to pass an act authorizing the mayor and city council of Baltimore to compensate said property owners for the damage actually sustained by them by reason of such changes in grade, and, conditioned upon the passage of such act, the mayor and city council of Baltimore guarantee to each such owner compensation for the damages so sustained."

In order to comply with the provisions of this section, there was presented to and passed by the general assembly of 1910, chap. 621, as follows: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland that the mayor and city council of Baltimore be and it is hereby authorized and empowered to authorize and direct the commissioners for opening streets under such system of procedure, including reasonable notice to the property holders and the right of appeal by either the property holders or the mayor and city council of Baltimore to the Baltimore city court and the court of appeals of Maryland, as it may prescribe, to ascertain and award to the owners of property in the city of Baltimore injuriously affected by the changes in grade provided for by § 3½ of ordinance No. 387 of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, approved August 16, 1909, and commonly known as the 'Grade Crossing Ordinance,' such damages, if any, as they may find to have been actually sustained by and directly caused to said property by reason of such changes in grade, and at the same time to assess against the same such benefits as they may find to have accrued to said owner by reason thereof: Provided, however, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed as imposing any duty or obligation upon the mayor and city council of Baltimore, except in the event that said property holders are judicially declared to be disentitled to recover such compensation or damages from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company; and provided further that in the event of the exercise at any time by the mayor and city council of Baltimore of the authority hereby conferred, then nothing in this act contained shall be construed as depriving the mayor and city council of Baltimore of any right it may lawfully have to demand, enforce, and receive reimbursement from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company to the full extent of any compensation it may make, or damage it may pay, in the premises."

These preliminary legal steps having been taken, the actual construction of the bridge and the necessary approaches was carried out in conformity therewith, with the following result, so far as these plaintiffs were concerned: Henry Walters and Annie D. Walters were the owners of a lot on the south side of Hamburg street, at the corner of Plum alley, about midway between Sharp and Howard streets. For the construction of the eastern approach in front of their premises, a bow window which projected slightly beyond the building line of the street was removed, thus leaving a large opening in the front wall of their building; in front of the doorway, and distant 12 inches from it, was placed a large concrete pillar, one of the numerous similar supports for the foot and roadway, and the footway passed the front door and first floor windows, with an intervening space of but 3 inches, between 4 and 5 feet above the level of the first floor of the premises. The relation of the abutment and the improvements of the plaintiffs' lot will be best understood from the accompanying diagram:

The effect of this structure was to effectually bar all ingress to and egress from the premises, unless by means of a ladder from the second floor window to the newly constructed footway. The light and air was shut off from the first floor of the premises, thereby rendering that portion of the dwelling damp and uninhabitable. To recover for the damages thus inflicted the present suit has been brought by the owners against the mayor and city council of Baltimore and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Both of the defendants admit the damage, but each insists that the other is liable. At the trial of the case in the Baltimore city court, the court granted instructions directing a verdict for both of the defendants, upon the theory apparently that what had been done amounted, so far as the city was concerned, merely to a change of grade, and that a change of grade by a municipal corporation of one of its highways is damnum absque injuria, for which it cannot be compelled to make compensation to an abutting owner; and that, as to the defendant the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, the act done was not only with the consent, but by the authority, of the municipal corporation, approved by the legislature, and therefore there had been no invasion of the plaintiffs' rights by the railroad company for which it was required to make compensation.

There are one or two minor questions of pleading raised by the record, upon which it is not necessary to pass at this point, since they are all involved in the larger question raised by the granting of the prayers of the two defendants.

The first exception was to the admission by the trial court in evidence of the ordinance No. 387, approved August 16, 1909, and which was offered in evidence by the railroad company. This ordinance had been set up by the pleas as a special defense. demurrers to which had been filed and sustained. The exact ground upon which they were so sustained does not appear from the record. It may have been because of the fact that the matters thus specially pleading amounted to the general issue. The suit was in the nature of an action of trespass for the damage caused by such trespass. If the act which was complained of was one done by lawful authority, then the party doing it had not committed a trespass, and the plea of non cul. was amply sufficient, and the evidence so objected to was therefore admissible as tending to sustain the general issue plea which had been filed, and the ruling of the lower court in admitting the ordinance in evidence was entirely correct.

The declaration, as originally filed, alleged that the abutment or approach had been "erected and constructed upon and against the improvements and the lot of ground owned by the plaintiffs;" that is, that there had been an actual physical invasion of their property. Upon the conclusion of the evidence the declaration was amended by the striking out of this language. By the second count of the amended declaration, however, it was alleged "that the plaintiffs have been deprived of the use, enjoyment, and possession of the said lot of ground and the improvements thereon, and deprived of the use and enjoyment of said Hamburg street and the south sidewalk thereof." That there has been any physical invasion of the land of the plaintiff in this case is not claimed.

The real question is whether the structure erected, and which is the occasion of this suit, is such an invasion of the rights of the plaintiff as to amount to a taking of their property within the meaning of the Constitution, or whether the injury amounts merely to a consequential damage, for which there may or may not be a right of action. If it was the former, then the act was one which even the municipal corporation had no right to do without making due compensation, and amounted to a tort for the commission of which the city was liable to the plaintiffs for the damage inflicted on them, whether the actual work was done by the city or by its authority. That is to say, if the invasion of the rights of the plaintiffs amounted to a taking, as regards these plaintiffs, both the city and the railroad company were tortfeasors, and both liable for the injury done.

If the city was liable, it could not evade its liability by delegating to another the doing of the tortious act. The ordinance by which the city gave to the railroad company the right to build apparently recognized this when, in § 18, it assumed an obligation on the part of the mayor and city council, to urge the passage of an act by the legislature authorizing the mayor and city council to compensate abutting property owners for the damage sustained by them, and conditionally guarantying them such compensation. There is some apparent conflict in the authorities with regard to whether acts such as are here complained of amount to an invasion or taking, or are merely in the nature of consequential damages.

This is the result in part of special statutes in different states. No fairer statement can be made than that in the case of Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 146, 43 Am. Rep. 146, where it is said that, "while the legislature may regulate the uses of the street as a street, it has . . . no power to authorize a structure thereon which is subversive of and repugnant to the uses of the street as an open street. Whether a particular structure authorized by the legislature is consistent or inconsistent with the uses of the street as a street must be largely a question of fact, depending upon the nature and character of the structure authorized."

This suggests as the first pertinent inquiry the question, What are the rights of an abutting owner in a street? Primarily, of course, comes the right to its use as a thoroughfare in common with all others, and for any infringement upon this which he suffers in common with all other members of the community he has no right of action. Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. v. Webster, 81 Md. 535, 32 Atl. 186.

And, even when he suffers some additional inconvenience, as where there is a change of grade of the streets made by the municipal corporation, as a result of which he is more or less inconvenienced, he is still without any remedy as against the municipal corporation; damage of this character being regarded as damnum absque injuria. Peddicord's Case, 34 Md. 463; Green v. City & Suburban R. Co. 78 Md. 304, 44 Am. St. Rep. 288, 28 Atl. 626. It is upon this familiar principle that the city claims exemption from liability in the present case; and, if there is nothing more than a change in the grade of Hamburg street, the position is sound.

But the owners of lots abutting upon public streets have easements or rights in the street which are valuable, and are in addition to those which they have with the general public. This is recognized in our statute law, which confers upon the city of Baltimore the power for laying out and closing up streets by providing for compensation to such owners upon the closing of an adjacent street.

So, in Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 405, 24 L.R.A. 403, 29 Atl. 608, where an alley was attempted to be closed, thus taking from other abutting owners their means of ingress to and egress from their property through the alley to the public street, it was held that the right was a valuable one, and could not be taken for public use without compensation, and a fortiori not for private use. And in Townsend v. Epstein, 93 Md. 537, 52 L.R.A. 409, 86 Am. St. Rep. 441, 49 Atl. 629, the same rule was followed where the interference was with regard to light and air.

In the case of De Lauder v. Baltimore County, 94 Md. 1, 50 Atl. 427, the county commissioners had reconstructed a county road, and in so doing elevated it some 5 feet at a point where a private right of way of the plaintiff connected with the highway, and for the protection of passing traffic placed a guard rail along the side of the reconstructed road. After reviewing many of the prior decisions, including most of those already referred to, Judge Pearce, speaking for this court, said: "The injury inflicted upon Mrs. De Lauder is not the rendering the use of her right of way inconvenient or expensive, but it is the destruction of its use, and its destruction is a taking in as just a sense as the appropriation of a gravel bank for the repair of a public road would be a taking."

And the same doctrine has been distinctly recognized in numerous other cases, both in Maryland and elsewhere. Thus, in Webb v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 114 Md. 216, 79 Atl. 193, it was said: "The primary purpose" of a street, "and the obligation of the municipal authorities [is] to preserve the beneficial enjoyment of the streets by the abutting landowners as a constituent part of the general public." Again, in Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 77 Md. 377, 20 L.R.A. 126, 26 Atl. 515: "The control of the city over the streets is attended with the duty of preserving them for their legitimate purposes." The mayor and city council cannot divest themselves of this trust. In the case of Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 157, 14 L.R.A. 133, 28 N. E. 640, it was declared that owners of lots abutting on city streets were entitled to the benefit of the street for access, and cannot be deprived thereof without compensation. In this case a solid embankment had been built along a street in Buffalo, and in consonance with the doctrine stated it was said: "The public cannot justly demand such an appropriation of a street by a municipality in aid of a railroad enterprise." In Vanderlip v. Grand Rapids, 73 Mich. 522, 3 L.R.A. 247, 16 Am. St. Rep. 597, 41 N. W. 677, a street was being regraded and raised about 30 feet, practically burying the dwelling of the plaintiff, and the city sought to evade liability for the damage caused by reason of its right to regrade. The work was being done by the city itself, but its act was held to be a taking of the property, one which would be arrested by injunction until due compensation had been made. The rule was again emphasized in Egerer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 108, 14 L.R.A. 381, 29 N. E. 95, where it was held that an abutting owner cannot be deprived of the street affording him access to his premises, unless there is left for his use and enjoyment other suitable means of access, or just compensation is paid him for the deprivation of the same. In Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 43, and Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 187, the principle is very concisely given that "the right" of an "abutting" owner to the use of a street "is as much property as the lot itself, and the legislature has as little power to take away one as the other."

In § 1325 of 3 McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, that author deals with the subject of the right of access to a street by an abutting owner, and says: This right also "includes a certain convenience in the use of his property with respect to the rest of the world, such as the opportunity for a man's customers to come to his place of business without reasonable hindrance or interruption. . . . This . . . is held to be a proprietary right, an easement in the street attached to the estate or ownership of property abutting on a street or alley, and property which cannot be appropriated to the use of the public without compensation."

In view of the authorities to which reference has been made in part, and the injury to the property of the plaintiffs being such as already indicated, it follows that, the construction of the abutment or approach complained of in this case amounting to a taking of property of the plaintiffs which neither the mayor and city council could do or authorize to be done without making just compensation therefor to the owner, that so far as the present plaintiffs were concerned, both defendants were joint tortfeasors, and therefore both liable to the plaintiffs, and the rulings of the court below on the prayers withdrawing the case from the jury erroneous.

In the oral arguments and the briefs of the defendants in this case, it was virtually conceded that the plaintiffs had been damaged, but the contention was that what had been done did not amount to a taking, as there had been no physical invasion of the plaintiffs' lot, and the damage which had been suffered was consequential in character. As already indicated, this court cannot agree with that view. But it was further urged that, by reason of the ordinance, the liability was not a joint one, and that by its decision this court should place the entire liability upon one or the other of the defendants, and absolve the other. This it is impossible to do in the present case, for a number of reasons. The defendants were sued jointly, and the verdict as rendered was a joint verdict as to both defendants. If now it was erroneous as to either, it is necessary to reverse the entire judgment and remand the case. East Baltimore Lumber Co. v. K'Nesett Israel Aushe S'Phard Congregation, 100 Md. 689, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

62 Atl. 575; Richardson v. Kent County, — Md. —, 87 Atl. 747, decided April 8, 1913. As already pointed out, as to these plaintiffs both of the defendants were tortfeasors, and therefore these plaintiffs are entitled to recover against either or both. The plaintiffs were no parties to the ordinance, if it is to be regarded in the light of a contract, and cannot therefore be limited in their right of recovery to only one of the two joint tortfeasors. What may be the respective liabilities of the city and the railroad company inter sese, resulting from any undertakings or agreements between them, is a matter in which these plaintiffs have no concern, and which it is not necessary now to decide.

This is not a case such as arose in Gardiner v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 9 Cush. 1, where the railroad alone was sued, there having been an agreement made between the company and the city of Boston for the raising of Tremont street to avoid a grade crossing, and the railroad was held to be primarily liable for damages occasioned thereby. In the present case both the city and the company are parties defendant; both are liable to the plaintiffs, whatever may be their respective liability as to each other, as the result of the passage of the ordinance and the subsequent act of the legislature.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded for a new trial; costs to be paid by the appellees.

desiring to adopt a child should file the petition for adoption in the county of his residence, and the county court of another county should refuse to receive and file the same, yet, the statute being enacted for the benefit of the child, in a case where the facts are that all the interested parties appeared before the county court of another county, and agreed on the one side to relinquish the child, and consented to its adoption on condition that it should have the full rights of heirship as if born in wedlock, and on the other to adopt and make it an heir, and the child is surrendered to the custody of, and remains in the family of, the adopting parent until the death of that parent, which occurred while the child was of tender years, the collateral heirs of the deceased adopting parent are estopped to deny the validity of the adoption proceedings and that the child is entitled to inherit.

As shown in the note referred to in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.), and by the later cases on the question, although an attempted adoption is invalid for failure to follow the statutory requirements, it may still be given force and effect as a contract by virtue of which the infant may assert a valid claim to the interest in the estate of the proposed adopting parents to which he would have been entitled had the proceeding been effective. Anderson v. Blakesly, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 210, following Chehak v. Battles, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130, an Iowa case. And to same effect see MILLIGAN v. McLAUGHLIN, citing the note in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130.

And ineffective adoption proceedings in themselves, or when accompanied by a sufficiently definite promise to leave all or a certain part of the adopting parents' property to the adopted children upon the death of the parents, may amount to a contract which, although made for the children by a third person, when fully performed by the children, may be enforced against the heirs of the adopting parents. Although the statutory requirements necessary to a legal adoption are not performed, but the adopting parents take the child to their home and thereafter care for and treat her as their child, and rear her in the belief that she is their child, equity will decree an adoption and its resultant rights, since to do otherwise would result in palpable injustice. Although no order of adoption is made, and the child is not legally adopted, yet, where she was received in the family under an agreement by her father, who was the sole surviving parent, by which he transferred the right to her custody, control, and services, and the consideration named for the transfer was a covenant to adopt the child, and to support, educate, and maintain her, equity will specifically enforce the contract after full performance by the child, to the extent, at least, of securing to the child the share of the adopting parents' property to which she was entitled under

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action in partition. A question of title arose in the case, the solution of which depends upon whether or not certain proceedings seeking to adopt Clarence Brother McLaughlin in the county court of Custer county were valid and effectual, or, if ineffectual, whether there was a contract of adoption which will be specifically enforced.

The record shows that on October 3, 1906, Mary McLaughlin filed a petition in the county court of Custer county, setting forth that "she resides in Logan county, Nebraska," and that Brother McLaughlin "is a minor male child under the age of fourteen years, to wit, of the age of two years on the 23d day of April next; that they do hereby declare that they (and each of us) do freely and voluntarily adopt said child as their own, upon the terms and conditions following, to wit: They intend hereby to make it an heir of themselves, with the right to inherit from them the same as it might do if it was their own child; and that they do hereby bestow upon said minor child equal rights, privileges, and immunities of children born to us (or either of us) in lawful wedlock." The prayer was in the usual form. The petition was signed and sworn to by Mary McLaughlin alone. On the same day Martin McLaughlin and Eva McLaughlin, the parents of the child, filed their signed relinquishment and consent to the adoption, setting forth therein that they and the child reside in Custer county, Nebraska; that they are the parents of the child; "that Mary E. McLaughlin, residing at Arnold, in the county of Logan, state of Nebraska, desire (s) to adopt said child," "granting to said minor child . . . full heirship, with all the rights of a child born in lawful wedlock;" and relinquished their right to the custody of the child and right to its services "to the end that said child shall be fully adopted by the said Mary E. McLaughlin, upon the terms and conditions above set out: and we hereby fully consent to such adoption. And each party waives the issuance and service of notice, and asks that the cause be immediately heard and determined."

The record of the county court recites that on the same day the matter came on for hearing, "the said petitioners and the said minor child being present in court in person. And also Martin McLaughlin and Eva McLaughlin, parents of said minor child, whose consent is filed." The court the agreement. Middleworth v. Ordway, 191 N. Y. 404, 84 N. E. 291.

So, where in consideration of a woman who was the mother of an illegitimate child marrying him, the man agrees to adopt the child, and the marriage is performed and the parties live together for many years as husband and wife, during which the child lives with them as their child and is treated by them as such, the agreement will be specifically enforced to the extent of permitting the child to inherit from the husband, although the agreement was never carried out by a valid adoption. Martin v. Martin, 250 Mo. 539, 157 S. W. 575.

And an oral agreement to adopt a child and leave her a designated share of his property may be specifically enforced where, for eighteen years, the child, in reliance 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

thereon, lived with the promisor, and rendered him valuable services, although it is impossible to establish a valid adoption. Peterson v. Bauer, 83 Neb. 405, 119 N. W. 764.

Where there is no agreement to leave the infant a share in the adopted parents' estate on his death, separate from and independent of the adoption, but the purpose of the parties is merely to effect the adoption, there being no agreement as to property other than that implied by the adoption, if the adoption does not have the effect of conferring upon the child the right of inheritance to the property of the adopting parents in a foreign state, equity will not imply or enforce such an agreement for the benefit of the child. Hood v. McGehee, 189 Fed. 205, affirmed in 117 C. C. A. 664, 199 Fed. 989.

A. G. S.

then finds that the statements of the petition are true, that Mary McLaughlin is a proper and suitable person to adopt the child, and that it is for the best interest of the child that it should be so adopted. A decree was then entered in conformity with these findings.

Mary McLaughlin was the wife of Wilson McLaughlin. She died intestate in Logan county on the 11th day of March, 1908, leaving no children born of her body. The family home of Wilson and Mary McLaughlin was, at all times material to this controversy, in Logan county, and they never lived in Custer county. Martin, the father of the child, at this time was living in Logan county, and working for his brother Wilson McLaughlin. Eva McLaughlin, his wife, the mother of the child, was a resident of Custer county, and the child was with his mother. All the parties interested were present in court at the hearing. It is also shown that Wilson McLaughlin consented to the adoption, paid for making out the papers, intended to sign and offered to sign the petition for adoption while before the court, but that his counsel said it was unnecessary for him to do so. After these proceedings the child was taken to the home in Logan county, and lived in the family until the death of Mary McLaughlin, and to the time of the trial of this case in district court.

In this action brothers and sisters of Mary McLaughlin are claiming the land as her heirs. The guardian ad litem of Clarence Brother McLaughlin intervened and filed a petition claiming an interest in the land for him as the adopted son of Mary McLaughlin. He also set up a contract for his adoption and to make him her heir, and asked that if the court found the adoption proceedings were invalid, such contract should be specifically enforced, and the boy decreed to have the same interest in the property as if he had been the natural heir of Mary McLaughlin. The district court held that the adoption proceedings were void, and that the county court of Custer county was without jurisdiction. It also refused to specifically enforce the alleged contract, and quieted the title of plaintiffs.

The provisions of the Code affecting the determination of the questions presented are § 798: "A married man, not lawfully separated from his wife, cannot adopt a minor child without the consent of his wife; nor can a married woman, not thus separated from her husband, without his consent: Provided the husband or wife, not consenting, is capable of giving such consent." § 800: "Any person or persons, desiring to adopt a minor child, shall file in the county court of the county where the person desiring to adopt said child resides a petition stating that he freely and voluntarily adopts said minor child, which petition shall be signed and sworn to by the person so desiring to adopt. Said petition may state the terms and conditions on which said adoption is desired to be made."

The plaintiffs contend that the adoption proceedings are void for the reasons: (1) That no formal consent of Wilson McLaughlin was given to the adoption of the child by his wife; (2) that Mrs. McLaughlin was not a resident of Custer county.

Appellant urges that the consent of Wilson McLaughlin is sufficiently shown by the record and by facts in evidence; and that the appearance of the adopting parents with all the other interested parties was sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the county court of Custer county. Appellant also contends that the provision of the statute conferring jurisdiction upon the county court where the person desiring to adopt the child resides is directory only. He argues that though an ordinary civil action must be brought in the county in which the defendant resides or may be summoned, if he enters a voluntary appearance in an action brought in another county, the court of that county would acquire jurisdiction; and further, that, in any event, Mary McLaughlin was at least a temporary resident of Custer county, and this is all that is required. He further has pleaded a full performance, on the part of the surrendering parents and the child, of the contract of adoption and to make the child the heir of Mary McLaughlin, and maintains that the collateral heirs may not deny the validity of the adoption proceedings or the right of the child to take as an heir.

An examination of cases in other states shows that there are two classes of decisions upon such questions; one based upon the view that, since statutes of adoption were unknown at common law, the powers conferred upon probate or county courts are of such a limited and special nature that all proceedings must be strictly construed, no presumptions will be indulged in, that nothing can be shown outside of the record to supply omissions therein, and that the statutory requirements must be strictly followed in all respects in order to confer jurisdiction. The other class, while adhering to the view that statutory requirements as to jurisdiction must be complied with, take a more liberal view, and hold that in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon them in adoption proceedings, they are courts of general jurisdiction in that regard, and the same presumption with respect to the regularity of their proceedings applies as in other courts.

Under the doctrine announced by this court in Ferguson v. Herr, 64 Neb. 659, 90 N. W. 625, 94 N. W. 542, the latter principle of construction has been adopted in this state, and the decree of a probate court in adoption proceedings "has all the force and effect of a judgment, being subject to collateral attack only for want of jurisdiction."

No written consent to the adoption of the child by his wife was signed by Wilson McLaughlin, but he was present in court at the hearing of the petition, and made no attempt to oppose or contest the granting of the same. The statute does not require the consent of the husband to be in writing. Considering the whole record, the petition, the recital of the proceedings, the findings, and the decree, and construing them together in connection with the presumptions of regularity, we think it is sufficiently established that the consent of the husband was granted at the time of the adoption proceedings. Re McKeag, 141 Cal. 403, 99 Am. St. Rep. 80, 74 Pac. 1039; Bland v. Gollaher, — Tenn. —, 48 S. W. 320.

Were the proceedings absolutely void and subject to attack by anyone for the reason that Custer county was not the county in which the petitioner resided? One of the leading cases on this question is Wolf's Appeal, 10 Sadler (Pa.) 139, 22 W. N. C. 93, 13 Atl. 760. The Pennsylvania statute of adoption is similar to that of Nebraska in the respect that the petition must be presented to a court "in the county where he or she 'may be resident.'"

A petition was filed by a person who alleged he was a resident of California, and "is now a temporary resident of the county in which the proceedings were had." Upon the objection that the court acquired no jurisdiction, it was held that the word "resident" included both a permanent and a temporary resident, and that the petition was sufficient to confer jurisdiction. As we shall see later, the proceedings were also upheld on other grounds. See also Van Matre v. Sankey, 148 Ill. 536, 23 L.R.A. 665, 39 Am. St. Rep. 126, 36 N. E. 628, involving the validity of the same adoption proceedings.

In other states, however, adhering to the strict-construction rule, residence in the county is held to be a jurisdictional fact. The question is discussed at length in a monographic note to Van Matre v. Sankey, in 39 Am. St. Rep. 210. The absurdity of applying the rule of strict construction to a code which expressly provides that the common-law rule of strict construction shall not apply to its provisions, is pointed out, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and it is said: "The statutes frequently require the child to be adopted, and the persons adopting it, or both, to be residents of the county where the proceeding takes place. It is doubtful whether the want of such residence, as a matter of fact, is such an irregularity as to avoid the proceedings. So far as the order or other writing is concerned, any statement therein from which it can be reasonably inferred that the parties are residents of the county is sufficient, and if the adopting parent should falsely state himself to be a resident, both he and his personal representative will be estopped from controverting the statement for the purpose of annulling the adoption. Re Williams, 102 Cal. 70, 41 Am. St. Rep. 163, 36 Pac. 407; People ex rel. Burns v. Bloedel (Super. Buff.) 42 N. Y. S. R. 453, 16 N. Y. Supp. 837; Abney v. De Loach, 84 Ala. 393, 4 So. 757." In the same note (39 Am. St. Rep. 219) we find the following on the question of estoppel: "If a person resorts to a court for the purpose of obtaining, and does there obtain, a decree or judgment, though it is void as against his adversary, yet if the latter accepts and acts upon it, he at whose instance it is obtained is estopped from asserting its invalidity for the purpose of seeking some advantage to himself, or of subjecting the innocent party to some loss or punishment. . . . If the adopting parent conducts such proceedings, and procures an order or agreement of adoption, and takes the child into his family, where it assumes the place and duties of his child, we think the courts will not permit him to subsequently urge that his proceedings were void. Nor, indeed, up to the present time has any adopting parent ever undertaken to do so, but in several cases, after his death, persons connected with him by ties of consanguinity have tried to claim his estate, and incidentally to assert that the order of adoption procured and respected by him was void."

It seems apparent that the object of the statute, permitting a person desiring to adopt a child to present his petition to the county court of his residence, is primarily for the benefit of the child, so that if, in after years, his right to inherit should be questioned, he would be furnished a record within the county of his adoptive parents' residence, to which he might readily refer to ascertain his status and what his rights of heirship by adoption were. The evil to be guarded against was apparently the contingency of an adoption being made in one county, the residence of the adopting parents of the child being in another state or county perhaps hundreds or thousands of miles removed. In such case, if the adopted child were ignorant of the facts, he might be deprived of his lawful inheritance for want of the record evidence necessary to substantiate his claim. Taking this view of the statute, we think it was not designed to be used as a sword to cut down the rights of the child, but its intention was beneficent, and its purpose was to protect him against other claimants by furnishing him accessible proof of his adoption. In this case, all the parties appeared before the county court of Custer county: the parents relinquished the child; and Mrs. McLaughlin adopted it as her heir in as solemn a manner as she could do so. She took the care and custody of the child: took it to her home in Logan county and treated and considered it as her own until the time of her death. During her lifetime she made no attempt to repudiate the obligation which she had entered into, but ratified and confirmed the contract of adoption. The surrendering parents performed to the full extent on their part, and are interposing no objections to the adoption proceedings and no claim to the child. We think no court would, under the facts before us, have permitted Mrs. McLaughlin, during her lifetime, to deny that the child in her possession had been adopted and had the rights of a lawful heir, and her collateral heirs are equally estopped. As was said in Wolf's Appeal, supra: "They are not here in the interest nor on behalf of the innocent subject of adoption, but decidedly against the same. They are either strangers to the adoption proceedings, and therefore have no standing in court, or they are privies in blood or in law, and stand in the shoes of Samuel Sankey, through and under whom they claim." It is also said in the opinion that many cases were cited where decrees had been set aside for or in the interest of the adopted child, but none were cited where such decrees were revoked, where the revocation would be against the innocent child. See also Re Williams, and Re McKeag, supra. Even if the county court of Custer county had not acquired jurisdiction, we think the facts proved as to what occurred at the time all parties met in the county court are sufficient to justify a holding that the child is entitled to the specific performance of the agreement to make him the heir of Mary McLaughlin, under the rules laid down in Kofka v. Rosicky, 41 Neb. 328, 25 L.R.A. 207, 43 Am. St. Rep. 685, 59 N. W. 788; Pemberton v. Pemberton, 76 Neb. 669, 107 N. W. 996; Peterson v. Bauer, 83 Neb. 405, 119 N. W. 764; Wispin v. Wendeln, 85 Neb. 172, 122 N. W. 852; Johnson v. Riseberg, 90 Neb. 217, 133 N. W. 183. The same 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) view is taken in Iowa and in some other states. Note to Chehak v. Battles, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1130, and cases cited in note.

Controversies over the validity of adoption proceedings are not infrequent. It is to be regretted that where the statutes are so plain, the requirements so simple, and the consequences may be so momentous, more care is not exercised by the county courts, and more attention paid to detail by counsel. Though we are of the opinion that the county court of another county than that in which the adopting parents reside should refuse to receive and file a petition for adoption, under the facts in this case, we are of opinion that the collateral heirs of Mrs. McLaughlin are estopped to deny the validity of the adoption proceedings; that the proceedings taken on the day of the hearing, the relinquishment upon conditions, and the delivery of the child, together with the other facts in evidence, constituted a completed contract for adoption and heirship, and that the intervenor is entitled to inherit as the heir of Mary McLaughlin.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore reversed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF ANA-MOOSE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(— C. C. A. —, 206 Fed. 374.)

Criminal law — statute — persons affected.

1. A penal statute which creates a new crime and prescribes a punishment for it must clearly state the persons and acts denounced.

Headnotes by SANBORN, Circuit Judge.

Note. — Intoxicating liquor: criminal liability of collector of draft attached to bill of lading of liquor.

The position taken in FIRST NAT. BANK v. UNITED STATES is supported by Danciger v. Stone, 188 Fed. 510, apparently the only other case in point, where the court, in answer to a contention that certain liquor dealers were not entitled to the protection of the interstate commerce clause, because upon interstate shipments they forwarded sight drafts on the consignees with bills of lading attached, to local banks at the point of consignment, held that the premise of the contention was unfounded.

A person who, or an act which, is not, by the expressed terms or plain meaning of the law, clearly within the class of persons or within the class of acts it denounces, will not sustain a conviction under it.

Statute — construction — general following particular words.

2. The rule that, where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or of acts, the general words should be construed to apply to persons or acts of the same general nature or class as those enumerated, is especially applicable to statutes defining crimes and regulating their punishment.

Same — construction by executive.

3. It is an established rule of the national courts that the contemporaneous construction given to an act of Congress by the executive officers charged with its enforcement, though not controlling, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, nor unless it is clear that their interpretation was erroneous.

Intoxicating liquor — collection of draft — penalty.

4. The collection by a bank of a sight draft for the purchase price of liquor transported in interstate commerce, and the delivery to the consignee of a bill of lading attached to the draft, the possession of which bill was necessary to enable the consignee to obtain a delivery of the liquor, does not subject the bank to a fine under § 239 of the Penal Code (act March 4, 1909, chap. 321, 35 Stat. at L. 1136, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1662).

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of North Dakota to review a judgment convicting defendant of collecting a draft attached to a bill of lading for intoxicating liquors in violation of statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

for the reason that the banks did not, in collecting the drafts and delivering the bills of lading to the consignee, violate the statute under consideration.

The opinion in the FIRST NAT. BANK CASE sufficiently refers to the remarks of Judges Smith and Hough in United States Exp. Co. v. Friedman, 112 C. C. 219, 191 Fed. 673, and United States v. 87 Barrels, 180 Fed. 215.

It may be of interest to note that it has been held that a statute limiting the transporting or carrying of intoxicating liquors by any express or railway company, or any common carrier, or person, or anyone as the agent or employee thereof, only applies to common carriers and those engaged 46 L.R.A. Messrs. George R. Robbins and George A. Bangs, for plaintiff in error:

In construing penal statutes, it is the province of the legislative department to prescribe punishment for forbidden acts; the court has no power to impose a punishment not prescribed by the legislature, and it is always safe and wise to impose no punishment until the court can say that the legislature has in fact, as well as in intent, prescribed the same.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The First National Bank of Anamoose complains that it was convicted and fined under § 239 of the Penal Code [35 Stat. at L. 1136, chap. 321, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1662] upon these conceded facts: One Meyers, a resident of Anamoose, in North Dakota, ordered a case of beer of the Hamm Brewing Company, a corporation of 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Minnesota. The brewing company accepted the order at St. Paul, shipped the beer thence to Anamoose via the "Soo" Railway Company, and received a bill of lading from that company under an agreement that the company would not deliver the beer to Meyers until he presented the bill of lading to its agent at Anamoose. The brewing company then attached a sight draft on Meyers for the purchase price of the beer to the bill of lading, and sent them to the bank at Anamoose, which agreed with the vendor to collect the draft from Meyers, and to deliver the bill of lading to him so as to enable him to receive the shipment of beer from the railroad company, and thereby to complete the sale and delivery of the beer. Section 239 of the Penal Code reads in this way: "Any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person who, in connection with the transportation of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one state, territory, or district of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof, into any other state, territory, or district of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any state, territory, or district of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof, shall collect the purchase price or any part thereof, before, on, or after delivery, from the consignee, or from any other person, or shall in any manner act as the agent of the buyer or seller of any such liquor, for the purpose of buying or selling or completing the sale thereof, saving only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same, shall be fined not more than five thousand dollars."

Counsel for the bank contend that the facts of the case did not bring it, or its act, within any of the classes of persons or acts which this statute subjects to fine for collecting the price of liquor. The attorneys for the government, on the other hand, insist that the statute subjects to punishment all persons and all corporations that collect the purchase price of liquor transported in interstate commerce, or that act as agents of vendor or vendee in the buying or selling thereof; and this interpretation of the law was sustained in an elaborate opinion by the learned judge below, which may be found in 190 Fed. 336.

The statute, however, does not read, as it seems as though it naturally would have read if such had been the intention of Congress, that every person who, in connection with the transportation thereof in interstate commerce, should collect the purchase price of interstate liquor, or who should act as the agent of the buyer or seller for the purpose of buying, selling, or completing the sale thereof, should be fined thereunder. By the terms it contains it does not embrace within its denunciation all persons, but expressly limits its condemnation to "any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or other person" who, in connection with the interstate transportation, collects or acts as agent. And, if the contention of counsel for the government were to prevail, the words "railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or other," in the law, would become futile, and the statute would be made to read "any person who," etc., in violation of the maxim that "all the words of a law must have effect, rather than that part should perish by construction." St. Louis v. Lane, 110 Mo. 254, 258, 19 S. W. 533; Knox County v. Morton, 15 C. C. A. 671, 675, 32 U. S. App. 513, 68 Fed. 787, 790; Wrightman v. Boone County, 31 C. C. A. 570, 572, 60 U. S. App. 100, 88 Fed. 435, 437; Robert J. Boyd Paving & Contracting Co. v. Ward 28 C. C. A. 667, 674, 55 U. S. App. 730, 85 Fed. 27, 34.

The statute creates and denounces a new offense. A penal statute which creates a new crime and prescribes its punishment must clearly state the persons and acts denounced. A person who, or an act which, is not, by the expressed terms of the law, clearly within the class of persons, or within the class of acts, it denounces, will not sustain a conviction thereunder. One ought not to be punished for a new offense unless he and his act fall plainly within the class of persons or the class of acts condemned by the statute. An act which is not clearly an offense by the expressed will of the legislative department before it was done may not be lawfully or justly made so by construction after it is committed, either by the interpolation of expressions, or by the expunging of some of its words by the judiciary. Ex post facto construction is as vicious as ex post facto legislation. "To determine that a case is within the intention of a statute, its language must authorize us to say so. It would be dangerous, indeed, to carry the principle that a case which is within the reason or mischief of a statute is within its provisions so far as to punish a crime not enumerated in the statute, because it is of equal atrocity, or of kindred character, with those which are enumerated." "The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words . . . in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest." United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 96, 5 L. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) ed. 37, 42; United States v. 99 Diamonds, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, 72 C. C. A. 9, 12, 130 Fed. 961, 964, and cases there cited.

The apparent and natural meaning of the terms of a statute is always to be preferred to any curious or hidden signification reached by the reflection and ingenious reasoning of unusually strong and acute minds. And unless at the time this bank was charged with the violation of this statute, this act of Congress clearly expressed to a man of ordinary ability and intelligence the meaning that the collection by a bank of a sight draft for the purchase price of liquor that had been transported in interstate commerce, and the delivery to the purchaser of the bill of lading therefor attached to the draft, subjected that bank to the fine which the statute prescribed, the defendant below ought not to be, and must not be, punished by this fine. We confess that the first reading of this law did not suggest to our minds that a bank which made such a collection would thereby subject itself to the punishment specified in the act. It is evident that the law failed to suggest such a thought to the mind of Judge Smith, who, in writing the opinion of this court in United States Exp. Co. v. Friedman, 112 C. C. A. 219, 181 Fed. 673, 681, spoke of this § 239 as prohibiting "common carriers from collecting the purchase price of liquors on interstate shipments, or from in any way acting as agent of the buyer or seller of such liquors, except in the transportation and delivery of the same, under a penalty of a fine of not over $5,000," or of Judge Hough, who, in his opinion in United States v. 87 Barrels, (D. C.) 180 Fed. 215, 216, said: "Section 239 renders it criminal for any common carrier transporting or delivering liquor after interstate or international transportation, to 'collect the purchase price or any part thereof,' or 'in any manner act as the agent of the buyer or seller of any such liquor, for the purpose of buying or selling or completing the sale thereof, saving only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same.'"

In January, 1910, Judge Campbell, of the eastern district of Oklahoma, in a considered opinion, decided that such a collection by a bank did not subject it to the fine imposed by this law. Danciger v. Stone (C. C.) 188 Fed. 510, 512. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States, the heads of the executive departments of the government to which the enforcement of this law was intrusted, were of the same opinion. The Attorney General, speaking of the statute, said: "The act does not apply to banks collecting drafts with bill of lading attached, where the shipment is made to a real consignee upon an order sent by him and filled by shipment from the dealer's place of business. The collection of a draft for the purchase price of a commodity in that manner is the usual and ordinary method of carrying on business, and is not connected with the transportation of the property, within the meaning of the statute under consideration." 29 Ops. Atty. Gen. 58, 62.

Indeed, although this statute was enacted on March 4, 1909, no one except the United States attorney for North Dakota seems to have discovered that it was intended to subject banks collecting such drafts to punishment by fine, until the opinion of the court below to that effect was formed and expressed in June, 1911. The act for which this bank has been convicted and fined was done on March 15, 1911. If the concession were made that it was the intention of the Congress to include banks among those liable to fines for such acts as that committed by the defendant below, how, in view of these opinions of judges and executive officers, can the conclusion that this intention was not clearly expressed by the statute be escaped? It is only when a penal statute clearly and plainly subjects parties and acts to its denunciation that they may be lawfully punished thereunder. If it is doubtful whether or not it includes them, they ought to be, and must be, exempt from criminal prosecution thereunder. And it is the intention expressed in the statute, and that alone, to which courts may give effect. They may not assume or presume purposes and intentions that the terms used in the statute do not indicate, and then by construction practically enact or expunge provisions, to accomplish such supposed intentions. United States v. 99 Diamonds, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 185, 72 C. C. A. 9, 12, 139 Fed. 961, 964. Conceding that by study, reflection, and ingenious reasoning, unusually acute and able minds may discover and convince themselves of a construction of this statute and an intention of its makers which would include this bank and the collection of the draft with which it is charged in its denunciation, still it is certain that that construction and intention are so curious and recondite that the staff failed to express them to the minds of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Attorney General, and of Judge Campbell, after a careful study of the law for the purpose of its official interpretation. It fails to manifest such a meaning and intention to our minds, and we cannot hold that it so clearly or plainly expressed them to bankers and persons unlearned in the law 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) that they may be lawfully condemned thereunder.

And in our opinion the reason why the Secretary, the Attorney General, Judge Campbell, and the defendant below failed to find in this statute any intention of the Congress, or any expression of any intention, to condemn the collection by banks of sight drafts for liquor transported in interstate commerce and the delivery of bills of lading therefor to consignees to enable them to obtain possession of the liquor, is that they did not exist. The history of the times and of the proceedings in Congress which led up to the enactment of this statute has convinced that the mischief at which it was leveled was not the collection of sight drafts by banks or ordinary collectors for the purchase price of liquors, although bills of lading were attached thereto and delivered upon the collection, and that it was the collection by carriers or their agents, of the purchase price for c. o. d. shipments of liquor into prohibition states, whereby they became virtually the agents of the liquor dealers in selling their liquors. This mischief existed only in the states wherein the manufacture and sale of liquor was prohibited, for it was only in those states that such c. o. d. shipments evaded the spirit of the state laws. The collection by banks of sight drafts and the delivery of bills of lading attached thereto was, and long had been, a common and universal method of collection of the purchase price of liquors and other articles throughout the entire nation. This is a general law applicable in every state of the Union, and it is incredible that the Congress intended, without mentioning or referring to it in the statute, to strike down this method of collection for the sale of liquors transported in interstate commerce in all the states, in the large majority of which the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors were not prohibited.

To our minds, the natural and manifest meaning of the declaration in this law, that "any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person who, in connection with the transportation," etc., shall collect the purchase price, or act as the agent of the buyer or seller, shall be fined, excludes banks, ordinary collectors, and all persons who are not members of the general class of carriers. This interpretation finds support in the fact that the contrary construction expunges the words "railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other," and makes the statute read "any person who," etc.; and in the rule which is especially applicable to statutes defining crimes and regulating their punishment, that where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or acts, the general words should be construed to apply to persons or acts of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. Thus, where a statute imposed a forfeiture for forbidden acts, of the goods of any "owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person," it was held that the words "other person" did not include a stranger to the goods, but was limited to "someone of the same general class as those described by the words with which it is associated." United States v. 1150½ Pounds of Celluloid, 27 C. Rep. 756, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 649. It is well said at page 1120, 36 Cyc., that "the particular words are presumed to describe certain species, and the general words to be used for the purpose of including other species of the same genus. The rule is based on the obvious reason that, if the legislature had intended the general words to be used in their unrestricted sense, they would have made no mention of the particular classes. The words 'other' or 'any other' following an enumeration of particular classes are therefore to be read as 'other such like,' and to include only others of like kind or character."

This is the interpretation of this act of Congress which was given to it by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Attorney General, who were charged with the duty of executing it, and it is an established rule of the national courts that the contemporaneous construction given to an act of Congress by those charged with its execution, though not controlling, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, nor unless it is clear that their construction was wrong. Edward v. Darby, 12 Wheat. 206, 210, 6 L. ed. 603, 604; United States v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 763, 24 L. ed. 588, 589; United States v. Johnston, 124 U. S. 236, 253, 31 L. ed. 389, 396, 9 Sup. Ct. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Because the reasons in support of the construction given to § 239 of the Penal Code by the Secretary and the Attorney General are in our opinion more cogent and persuasive than those against it; because it is not clear that their interpretation was erroneous, but it seems to us to give to this act of Congress its true meaning; because the bank and the act for which it has been fined are not specified in the statute, nor included within the classes of persons or acts denounced by it, nor within other classes of their kind; and because the statute is a new law creating a new offense and prescribing its punishment, and it fails plainly or clearly to express any denunciation of the collection by a bank or any other collector of its class, of a sight draft for the purchase price of liquor transported in interstate commerce and the delivery of a bill of lading attached to the draft to the consignee, to enable him to get possession of the liquor,—our minds have been forced to the conclusion that the acts charged against the bank in the second count of the indictment in this case, upon which it was convicted, constituted no offense, and that the judgment below must be reversed, with directions to the court below to discharge the bank.

Triebler, District Judge, dissenting:

After giving the questions involved the most diligent consideration, I find myself unable to concur in the conclusions reached by the majority, as, in my opinion, they are in conflict with the letter as well as the spirit of the statute. In view of the far-reaching effect of this decision, which substantially nullifies the provisions of this act of Congress by opening the doors to the introduction of liquors in localities where the sale thereof is prohibited by law, and permits the collection of the purchase money at the time and place of delivery, I deem it my duty to state briefly my reasons for the dissent.

The history of the entire liquor legislation, as affected by the interstate commerce clause of the national Constitution, the mischief existing and sought to be remedied by this act, are fully set out in the opinion of the learned trial judge in this case (190 Fed. 336) and therefore need not be restated.

I concur with the majority opinion that "A penal statute which creates a new crime and prescribes its punishment for it must clearly state the persons and acts denounced. A person who, or an act which, is not by the expressed terms of the law clearly within the class of persons and within the class of acts it denounces, will not sustain a conviction under it."

But it is equally well settled that penal laws are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 628, 33 L. ed. 1080, 1083, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; United States v. Corbett, 215 U. S. 233, 242, 54 L. ed. 173, 175, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81; United States v. Union Supply Co. 215 U. S. 50, 55, 54 L. ed. 87, 88, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 15. And this rule specially applies when the statute is enacted for the public good, and to suppress a public wrong. Taylor v. United States, 3 How. 197, 210, 11 L. ed. 559, 564; United States v. Stowell, 133 U. S. 1, 12, 33 L. ed. 555, 558, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; Johnson v. Southern P. Co. 196 U. S. 1, 10, 49 L. ed. 363, 368, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 412.

In my opinion the statute clearly includes not only all common carriers and their employees, but "any other person" who, "in connection with the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce, shall collect the purchase price thereof before, on, or after delivery, from the consignee or from any other person," regardless of the fact that he is not an employee of the carrier. It is a well known fact that shipments of all kinds of merchandise, cotton, grain, lumber, raw material, as well as manufactured articles, which are sold for cash upon delivery, are shipped by the method employed in this case, i. e., either naming no specific consignee, but requiring the delivery to be made to the order of the shipper, or that the bill of lading specifically requires its production and surrender by the consignee before the property can be delivered. In such cases a draft is usually drawn for the purchase money and the bill of lading attached thereto, to be delivered upon payment of the draft. The effect of such shipments differs in nowise from those usually referred to as c. o. d., as the purchaser can in neither event obtain the goods shipped without first paying the purchase price. It is to be noted that the statute itself does not use the expression "c. o. d.," and draws no such distinction as stated in the opinion of the majority. For that matter, such shipments are frequently spoken of as c. o. d. shipments. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, 191 U. S. 441, 446, 48 L. ed. 254, 256, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151. As liquor shipments made in this manner to prohibition localities from other states practically nullified the prohibition laws of those states, as had been determined by the Supreme Court in a number of cases (American Exp. Co. v. Iowa, 196 U. S. 133, 49 L. ed. 417, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182; Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 214 U. S. 218, 53 L. ed. 972, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633), efforts were made to induce Congress to enact some legislation which would prevent violations of the prohibition laws of the states by these methods. To accomplish this object, a number of bills were introduced; but, as the act now involved is the Senate bill prepared by the committee to whom all Senate bills on that subject had been referred, it is only necessary to refer to the Senate proceedings seeking to accomplish this object. Among these bills was one known as the "Bacon bill," and the part of that bill which refers to the subject now in controversy was § 2 of that bill. That part of it bearing on this subject is worded as follows: "That whenever any spirituous, intoxicating, and malt liquors of any kind shall be or become a part of a foreign or interstate commerce, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company, express company, or other carrier, or any officer, employee, or agent thereof, engaged in or in connection with the transportation of such liquors of any kind from one state or territory or district into another state or territory or district," etc.

The "Brantley bill," although it had been introduced in the House, was before the subcommittee which finally drafted the bill as enacted, and which is known as the "Knox bill," provided "that any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or other person who shall, in connection with the transportation of spirituous, vinous, malt, and intoxicating liquors of all kinds from one state or territory into another state or territory, collect on, before, or after delivery from the consignee or other person the purchase price or any part thereof of such liquors, or who shall in any manner act as the agent of the consignor or seller of such liquors, for the purpose of selling or completing the sale thereof," etc.

The subcommittee had a number of public hearings on these bills, and finally adopted the bill which is now § 239 of the Penal Code, practically adopting the language used in the Brantley bill.

It would be unreasonable to presume that the members of that subcommittee, composed of some of the ablest lawyers of the Senate, were not familiar with the practice of collecting for the goods by draft with bill of lading attached, as hereinbefore set forth, so general in the commerce of the country, and that that practice was, in effect, a c. o. d. shipment, as had been held several years before in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, supra; and if the intention of this act was to make the bill effective, it was just as important to prohibit such shipments as those made c. o. d. with directions to the carrier to collect the purchase price before delivery. But, even assuming that the subcommittee was not familiar with that custom, their attention was expressly called to it by a letter from Robert Norris, secretary of the Kansas State Temperance Union, which was filed with the committee, and appears on page 113 of the committee's report. In that letter Mr. Norris says: "Intoxicating liquors are shipped into Kansas under interstate commerce just as though there were no prohibitory laws in the state. The money is either sent with the order or is collected by some agency in the state. A sight draft is usually sent to the bank, and the bank collects the money for the liquor house. The express companies no longer handle c. o. d. liquors but send them express charges prepaid, and a sight draft to the bank. . . . Since the express companies refuse to handle the c. o. d. liquors, there is not much complaint of shipping in fictitious names, but express agents that are inclined to violate the law have a means of handling bills of lading and collecting for liquors where the express charges are prepaid that is very hard to detect. Agents have informed me in various parts of the state that they have been offered by liquor houses a commission of 50 cents to $1.50 for handling the liquors through the express office, and oftentimes this temptation to make money causes them to yield, and they deliver it to any parties who will pay the charges that may be against the person to whom it is sent. . . . Of all phases of the prohibitory law this interstate commerce feature is the hardest to control, even to keep it within the bounds of interstate commerce law. The keeper of a 'blind tiger,' or a 'bootlegger,' or a druggist who may violate the provisions of his permit, are very easily caught as compared with the persons who overreach the bounds of the law in the shipment of liquor."

If the construction placed upon this statute by the majority opinion is correct, then nothing has been accomplished by the enactment of this statute, for the brewer or liquor dealer can make a large number of shipments to his agent or the person who is willing to engage in the sale of liquors or beer, some in boxes containing dozens of bottles, others in jugs or single bottles, taking separate bills of lading for each, attach a separate draft for the purchase price of each package of the liquor or beer covered by each bill of lading, all drawn on one person who, after having paid the drafts, would receive these bills of lading and deliver them with an order to the carrier indorsed thereon to any person who would purchase the quantity covered by any one bill of lading, and thus the mischief which the statute clearly intended to remedy can be continued without fear of being punished, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for he could justly claim that he is not "a person connected with any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier."

It is true, as stated by the majority of this court, that courts "may not assume or presume purposes and intentions that the terms used in the statute do not indicate, and then by construction practically enact or expunge provisions to accomplish such supposed intentions." But, on the other hand, it is equally true that it is the duty of the courts to give effect to every word found in the statute. Bend v. Hoyt, 13 Pet 263, 10 L. ed. 154; Lawrence v. Allen, 7 How. 785, 12 L. ed. 914; Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112, 25 L. ed. 782; Montclair Twp. v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 27 L. ed. 431, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391. As stated by Judge Sanborn, delivering the opinion of this court in Stevens v. Nave-McCord Mercantile Co. 80 C. C. A. 25, 29, 150 Fed. 71, 75:

"Cardinal rules for the construction of a statute are that the intention of the legislative body which enacted it should be ascertained and given effect, if possible, regardless of technical rules of construction and the dry words of the enactment; that that intention must be deduced not from a part but from the entire law; that the object which the enacting body sought to attain and the evils which it was endeavoring to remedy may always be considered for the purpose of ascertaining its intention; that the statute must be given a rational, sensible construction; and that, if this be consonant with its terms, it must have an interpretation which will advance the remedy and repress the wrong."

The effect of the majority opinion is to practically eliminate the words "any other person," unless Lord Tenterden's rule of ejusdem generis, which is invoked by the plaintiff in error, governs the construction of this statute. In my opinion it does not. United States v. Meacall, 215 U. S. 26, 32, 54 L. ed. 77, 79, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 19, is directly in point on this proposition. In that case the statute under which the prosecution was had provided "that if any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other persons shall make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoices," etc.

The defendant, who had been indicted for a violation of this statute, was neither the owner, importer, consignee, or their agent, but was an assistant weigher of the United States in the customs service at the port of New York, and engaged in the performance of his duties as such assistant weigher when the fraud was perpetrated on the government. Lord Tenterden's rule was invoked on behalf of the defendant, and the claim set up that the general term "other person," should be read as referring to someone similar to those named, whereas the defendant was not an owner, importer, consignee, or agent, or of like class with either; he was not making or attempting to make an entry. The circuit court sustained this contention, but, upon writ of error, the Supreme Court reversed this ruling, and held that the words "other person" included all persons, although having a different relation to the importation than the owner, consignee, or agent. Mr. Justice Brewer, who delivered the unanimous opinion of the court, said: "Congress was broadening the scope of the legislation and meaning to reach other persons having something to do in respect to the entry beyond that which was done by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, or else the term 'other person' was a meaningless addition. Now the defendant was a person other than the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, by whose act the United States was deprived of a portion of its lawful duties. His act comes within the letter of the statute as well as within its purpose, and the intent of Congress in the legislation is the ultimate matter to be determined."

The court, in discussing the effect of Lord Tenterden's rule, cited and adopted the rule laid down in National Bank v. Ripley, 161 Mo. 126, 61 S. W. 587: "But this is only a rule of construction to aid us in arriving at the real legislative intent. It is not a cast-iron rule; it does not override all other rules of construction, and it is never applied to defeat the real purpose of the statute, as that purpose must be gathered from the whole instrument. . . . Whilst it is aimed to preserve a meaning for the particular words, it is not intended to render meaningless the general words. Therefore, where the particular words exhaust the class, the general words must be construed as embracing something outside of that class. If the particular words exhaust the genus, there is nothing ejusdem generis left, and in such case we must give to the general words a meaning outside of the class indicated by the particular words, or we must say that they are meaningless, and thereby sacrifice the general to preserve the particular words. In that case the rule would defeat its own purpose."

There are many other cases in which the words "any other" were similarly construed. Reg. v. Payne, L. R. 1 C. C. 27, where the statute made it a felony to facilitate the escape of a prisoner by conveying to the prison "any mask, dress, or other disguise, or any letter, or any other article or thing," it was held to include a crowbar. In Hil- ton's Appeal, 116 Pa. 358, 9 Atl. 342, the statute authorized every lessee of any colliery, mining land, manufactory, or other premises to mortgage his lease or term, and it was held that the statute was not restricted to leases of the same or like nature as colliery, mining, or manufactory leases. In Grissell v. Housatonic R. Co. 54 Conn. 467, 1 Am. St. Rep. 138, 9 Atl. 137, the statute made railways liable for fires to buildings or other property, and it was held that the words "or other property" should not be confined to subjects ejusdem generis. To the same effect are Harlow v. Tufts, 4 Cush. 453; Phoenix Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Hazen, 118 Mass. 350; Archer v. People's Sav. Bank, 88 Ala. 254, 7 So. 53; Holcomb v. Van Zyl, — Mich. —, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 607, 140 N. W. 521; and this is especially true if the particular words, as is the case in this statute, exhaust a whole genus, in which case the general words must refer to some larger genus. Fenwick v. Schmaltz, L. R. 3 C. P. 315, 37 L. J. C. P. N. S. 78 18 L. T. N. S. 27, 16 Week. Rep. 481.

Applying this rule, it is clear to my mind that the intention of Congress was to cover such a transaction as is involved in the instant case. If the construction placed upon that act by the majority is correct, and that was the intention of Congress, it would have adopted the language found in § 2 of the "Bacon bill," which did not use the words "or any other person," but in lieu thereof used the words "or any officer, employee, or agent thereof," clearly indicating that the law was intended to apply only to the carriers, their officers, employees, and agents.

The majority also lay stress upon the construction placed upon this statute by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General. While it is true that the contemporaneous construction given to an act of Congress by those charged with its execution is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, nor unless it is clear that the construction was wrong, such interpretation is not controlling, and is never conclusive upon the courts. Hemmer v. United States, 204 Fed. 905, decided by this court on April 25, 1913, where Judge Sanborn, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A decision of a question of law by the officers of the Land Department, or by any officer of any other executive department, is never conclusive upon the courts. . . . And it is the function and duty of the officers of the judicial department of a government, which they may not lawfully renounce, to exercise their own independent judgments, guided only by the established legal principles and the recognized canons of interpretation, in the construction of its statutes, and to adjudge their just and true interpretation, even though the officers of an executive department have construed them otherwise." A large number of authorities are cited by the learned judge to sustain that conclusion.

It must not be overlooked that these departmental officers, including the Attorney General, determine these questions in most instances, and did in this, without the assistance of argument from lawyers or other persons learned in the law. How much aid is derived from such arguments and briefs is well known to every judge on the bench. There can be no better illustration of this than the fact that frequently the judges of the Supreme Court call for rearguments in order to assist them in reaching a correct determination of important principles of law. And it has been well said that "a strong bar makes a strong bench."

Neither in United States Exp. Co. v. Friedman, 112 C. C. A. 219, 191 Fed. 673, nor in United States v. 87 Barrels, (D. C.) 180 Fed. 215, was this question before the court, and what was there said was clearly obiter so far as it affects the principle now in issue.

The act is also attacked as being unconstitutional, for it is alleged that the courts have uniformly held that liquors are an article of commerce, and the effect of this act is to deprive the owners of their property in violation of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. But the statute does not prohibit commerce in liquors; it only regulates the transportation thereof. United States ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & H. R. Co. 213 U. S. 366, 410, 53 L. ed. 836, 849, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527, goes much further than is necessary to sustain this act.

In view of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Lottery Case (Champion v. Ames) 188 U. S. 321, 358, 47 L. ed. 492, 502, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, 58, 55 L. ed. 364, 368, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364; and Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, it is no longer open to contention that the powers of Congress in matters of interstate commerce have the quality of police regulations. As stated in Hoke v. United States, after reviewing the former decisions of the court: "The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over 'transportation among the several states,' that the power is complete in itself, and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations."

That under the police power every government has the right to regulate or prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquors is no longer open to controversy. License Cases, 5 How. 504, 576, 12 L. ed. 256, 288; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201, 206, 28 L. ed. 629, 697, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 8, 97; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 16, 32 L. ed. 346, 348, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 668, 31 L. ed. 205, 212, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273.

In my opinion the judgment of the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

OKLAHOMA COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

THOMAS MONAGHAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(— Okla. —, 134 Pac. 77.)

Continuance — discretion.

1. The granting or refusal of a continuance in a criminal case is largely a matter of discretion of the trial court, and this court will not reverse the trial court on the question of a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the court, unless it is shown that there has been an abuse of discretion.

Robbery — what constitutes.

2. To constitute "robbery," as distinguished from "larceny from the person"

Headnotes by DOYLE, J.

Note. — What force is sufficient to constitute robbery.

I. Actual force.

a. Generally, 1150.

b. Snatching.

1. Where there is resistance, 1150.

2. Where there is no resistance, 1150.

3. When property is attached to the person so as to afford resistance, 1151.

c. When the taking is without the knowledge of the person robbed, 1151.

II. Constructive force.

a. Demand with overwhelming numbers or demonstrations of force, 1151.

b. Threats of prosecution, 1153.

III. Force employed as a means of escape or to prevent a recapture of property taken without force, 1153.

IV. Decisions under special statutes, 1153.

there must be force, violence, or intimidation in the taking. Therefore, where there is no evidence tending to show that the defendant obtained or retained the personal property alleged to have been taken by force and violence or by putting in fear, the crime is grand larceny, and not robbery, and a verdict of guilty of robbery in the first degree is contrary to law and the evidence.

Same — snatching property.

3. Merely snatching the property from the person of another, without violence or putting in fear, is not robbery, except where there is some injury or violence to the person of the owner, or where the property snatched is so attached to the person or clothes of the owner as to afford resistance.

The earlier cases considering the question under annotation will be found in a note to Jones v. Com. 57 L.R.A. 432. As in that note, cases where the question of the sufficiency of the force is not decided, except by the fact that convictions of robbery were had, are excluded.

The decisions collected herein are in accord with the decisions in their respective jurisdictions found in the earlier note, except as to Georgia cases involving the snatching of property from another without his knowledge, as noted infra, VI.

I. Actual force.

a. Generally.

To constitute robbery, there must be actual violence, or such demonstration or threats as will create a reasonable apprehension of bodily injury if the victim resists. State v. Donohue, — N. J. —, 50 Atl. 12.

The degree of force is immaterial so long as it is sufficient to compel one to part with his property. State v. Parsons, 44 Wash. 299, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 566, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 87 Pac. 349, 12 Ann. Cas. 61.

The element of force is present where one is knocked down by two men who come up from behind, and his pocketbook is squeezed out of his hand. People v. Ortega, 7 Cal. App. 480, 94 Pac. 869.

And in Story v. State, — Ga. App. —, 77 S. E. 914, it was held to be robbery by force, and not by intimidation, where the evidence showed that without warning accused simultaneously grabbed prosecuting witness's money and struck him a blow on the head, and attempted to run.

b. Snatching.

1. Where there is resistance.

Where accused, who was endeavoring stealthily to take money from prosecutor's pocket, was caught by the latter while his hand was in the pocket, and a struggle ensued, accused endeavoring to get the money and prosecutor to prevent him, and the money was finally taken violently by inflicting physical injuries, the offense was 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — force and violence.

4. The force and violence which is essential to the crime of robbery must be concomitant with the taking of property from the person of another.

Trial — questions of law and fact.

5. The jury are bound to take the law from the court, and questions of fact are to be decided by the jury. The charge of the court must not invade the province of the jury, and should not extend beyond a plain statement of the law applicable to the case. Philosophic disquisition on the "presumption of innocence" or dissertation upon the nature of evidence, should always be omitted.

(August 14, 1913.)

robbery, and not larceny from the person. (Carter v. State, 3 Ga. App. 477, 60 S. E. 216. The court distinguished the case at bar from Fanning v. State, 66 Ga. 167, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 561 (cited in the earlier note), stating that in the latter case the force used to keep possession of the property was after accused had surreptitiously taken it from the prosecutor's pocket.

And the offense was robbery where accused threw one hand around prosecuting witness, who was vomiting and in a measure helpless, and thrust his other hand into his pocket and jerked out his pocketbook, the prosecutor protesting, but, because of the fit of vomiting, being unable to prevent the act. Williams v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 361, 123 Am. St. Rep. 884, 102 S. W. 1134.

And also where a tray of rings was grabbed from the counter and the thief was pursued through the store, the struggle to escape at the door was concomitant with the taking, and the offense was robbery. Tiller v. State, 32 Ohio C. C. 704. The court stated that the taking of the property from the prosecuting witness, or from his presence and under his control, was not effected until these various acts of violence were completed, for the reason that accused did not succeed in his attempt to possess himself of the property until after all these facts of violence occurred.

2. Where there is no resistance.

In State v. Paisley, 36 Mont. 237, 92 Pac. 566, it was said that if the force used was only such as was necessary to take the property from the person of another without resistance, it was not sufficient to constitute robbery, as otherwise there would be no distinction between robbery and larceny from the person.

The Kentucky cases are in harmony with the earlier decisions in that jurisdiction in considering the fact of snatching evidence of force, and so snatching and running away with a bill, from one who was holding it in his hand to have it changed into small money, was held robbery, in Stockton v. Com. 125 Ky. 268, 101 S. W. 298.

And the offense was robbery where a re-

ERROR to the District Court for Craig County to review a judgment convicting defendant of robbery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. L. Rider for plaintiff in error.

Mr. C. J. Davenport, Assistant Attorney General, with Messrs. Charles West, Attorney General, and Smith C. Matson, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

Where the evidence is not before the court, a judgment will not be reversed on account of instructions given by the trial court, if, upon any supposable state of facts, the instructions would be proper.

Rasberry v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep.

quest of 10 cents with which to buy beer was made of prosecutor, and upon his taking money out of his pocket accused suddenly snatched and wrenched it from him and fled. Brown v. Com. 135 Ky. 635, 135 Am. St. Rep. 471, 117 S. W. 281, 21 Ann. Cas. 672.

3. When property is attached to the person so as to afford resistance.

If the article is so attached to the person or clothes as to create resistance, however slight, the taking is robbery. And so force sufficient to jerk a stud loose from the shirt was held to warrant a conviction of robbery. People v. Campbell, 234 Ill. 391, 123 Am. St. Rep. 107, 84 N. E. 1035, 14 Ann. Cas. 186.

And also where a watch attached to prosecutor's clothing by a chain was snatched with sufficient force to break the chain. Perry v. Com. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 512, 85 S. W. 732.

And where the force used in snatching a purse which was attached to a chain wound around the owner's finger was sufficient to break the chain and injure the finger. Smith v. State, 117 Ga. 320, 97 Am. St. Rep. 165, 43 S. E. 736.

But the cutting of a rope which held a jug to the horn of a saddle, and carrying it away, was held in Bowlin v. State, 72 Ark. 530, 81 S. W. 838, not to constitute robbery. The court cited as authority Routt v. State, 61 Ark. 594, 34 S. W. 262, cited in the earlier note, which was a case of snatching money from another's hand. Though the court seems to think the case at bar was analogous to the case followed, it would seem rather to be more analogous to cases involving the snatching of property attached to the person, and therefore to amount to robbery.

c. When the taking is without knowledge of the person robbed.

Stealthily putting one's hand in the pocket of another and pulling out his pocket-book before the latter is aware of what is being done is not robbery. Pihb v. Com. 33 Fv. L. Ren. 726, 112 S. W. 401; Jones 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

614, 103 Pac. 865, 112 Pac. 759; Lee v. State, 7 Okla. 565, 54 Pac. 792.

Doyle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is prosecuted from a conviction had in the district court of Craig county, in which the defendant was found guilty of robbery in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary at McAlester for a term of ten years. The judgment and sentence was rendered and entered on the 17th day of June, 1912. The appeal was perfected by filing in this court December 11, 1912, a petition in error with case made

v. Com. 115 Ky. 592, 103 Am. St. Rep. 340, 74 S. W. 263, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 580.

And where one merely filches money from the pocket on another who is drunk, the mere force necessary to remove the property is not all the force required by the statute to constitute robbery. Ramirez v. Territory, 9 Ariz. 177, 80 Pac. 391.

And in People v. Ryan, 239 Ill. 410, 81 N. E. 170, it was held that the offense is not robbery where the evidence tends to prove the removal of a stud by stealth and adroitness only.

In Dawson v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 5, 74 S. W. 701, it was held not to be robbery where the accused stealthily placed her hand in prosecutor's pocket and took therefrom some money. Nor did the fact that accused drew a pistol when the loss of the money was learned and prosecutor demanded its return make the act of taking robbery.

But in King v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 713, 76 S. W. 341, where the evidence was that prosecutor heard the accused call him, but he refused to stop, and had taken but a step or two when he felt her hand hit his pocket: that when she put her hand in his pocket she pulled him around and nearly pulled him off his feet, and then pulled her hand out and had his pocketbook, the court said that the trial court properly submitted to the jury the question as to whether it was taken by violence and putting prosecutor in fear, and refused to disturb the verdict of guilty of robbery.

II. Constructive force.

a. Demand with overwhelming numbers or demonstrations of force.

In Com. v. Titworth, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 402, 98 S. W. 1029, it was said that robbery may be committed by putting one in fear without using actual force or violence, but there must be upon the part of the wrongdoer such an attempt of intimidation, such threats of violence, demonstration or offer of force, toward the person deprived of his property, for the purpose of securing its surrender, as would reasonably be calculated to put the latter in attached. The attorney general has filed a motion to strike the case made, and consider this appeal on the transcript of the record, because said case made was not served on the county attorney within the time allowed by the trial court. The record shows that at the time of entering judgment the court extended the time for making and serving case made sixty days, and thereafter, on the 27th day of July, granted an additional extension of sixty days, and thereafter, on the 17th day of October, granted an additional extension of sixty days, and that the case made was served on the county attorney on the 21st day of November, and was settled and signed on the 7th day of December. The certificate of the trial judge recites: "I do hereby certify that the within and foregoing case made, and the amendments thereto, have been served in due time, and the same duly submitted to me for settlement and signing, as required by law." Thus it appears that the orders extending the time for making and serving the case made were in addition to the statutory time of thirty days, as provided by § 6951, Snyder's Stats. The motion to strike is therefore overruled.

The information charged, in substance, that on or about the 19th day of December, 1911, the said Thomas Monaghan did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, with force and violence, take from the person of one J. E. Armstrong, and against his will, personal property, to wit, $2.50, and fear, and cause him to part with his property.

And so pointing a pistol at one, and requiring him to hold up his hands while confederates go through his pockets and take therefrom personal property, is taking by force and fear. State v. Sanders, 14 N. D. 203, 103 N. W. 419.

And in Harris v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 469, 117 S. W. 830, it was said that a demand by one who held a gun pointed at another, that the latter hand over his money, complied with, would be robbery.

And robbery was held to have been committed,

—where accused took a revolver out of his pocket in a saloon, made the bystanders hold up their hands and told them that if anyone turned around he would blow his head off, went up to the bar and told prosecuting witness, who was behind the bar, to give him the money in the cash register, and to be quick about it, and, after it was handed to him, fled. People v. Howard, 3 Cal. App. 36, 84 Pac. 462;

—where accused walked up behind one who was assisting the banker in a gambling game, stooped down with his right hand on his pistol, which was in his pocket, and while in this position picked up the money with his left hand, and upon rising pulled out his pistol, cocked it, and said, "If you want any of this, come and get it," at the same time holding the pistol toward the banker, and stepping backward. Reyes v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 102 S. W. 1156. The court said: "These acts are incidents too close together for a finespun theory that he was not put in fear of his life, or that there was no assault. We believe these facts show both an assault upon [the banker] and fear on his part;"

—where the evidence showed that prosecutor avokey to find the accused with his (prosecutor's) trousers in one hand and a razor in the other hand; that he took the trousers away from the accused, but gave them up when accused demanded that he turn over his "stuff," at the same time threatening and menacing him with the razor, and that accused rifled the pockets of the money. People v. Stevens, 141 Cal. 488, 75 Pac. 62. The court said that it may very well be that the taking of the trousers down from the headboard while the owner slept constituted but larceny; but the owner recaptured them with the money in them, and was thereafter induced against his will, by means of force and fear, to yield up to the accused the possession of the trousers with the "stuff" in them that accused was after, and that the latter act was beyond question a robbery;

—where one was held up and put in fear of his life by having a gun pointed at him and being told to put up his hands and drop certain property, which he was forced to do, and the party with the gun took charge of the property. Brown v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 334, 136 S. W. 265.

And in State v. Luhano, 31 Nev. 278, 102 Pac. 260, it was held that the elements of force and intimidation were sufficiently established to justify a verdict of robbery where one of the accused stood in front of prosecuting witness holding a knife in a threatening manner and telling him to keep still, and the other accused reached into his pocket and took therefrom a sack of gold.

And, also, in Keys v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 279, 131 S. W. 1068, where the evidence was that accused ordered the prosecutor to hold up his hands, and he did so through fear of his life, and accused then went through his pockets.

And in Tones v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 363, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 122 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 217, 13 Ann. Cas. 455, where the evidence was that two officers arrested prosecutor, and after taking him to jail, without his consenting to be searched, they rudely backed him against the wall and held his hands up while one of them thrust his hand into his pocket and extracted his money, part of which was appropriated, it was held that there was sufficient force to constitute robbery. The court stated that a prisoner is powerless and knows it, and is aware that the least effort to foil the officer will call for greater force and violence, and acquiescence under one railroad passenger ticket from Vinita, Oklahoma, to Boonville, Missouri, of the value of $6.50, said personal property then and there being in the possession of said J. E. Armstrong, with the intent on the part of him, the said Thomas Monaghan, to then and there rob the said J. E. Armstrong.

The testimony in the case was substantially as follows:

J. E. Armstrong, the complaining witness, testified that he lived in Cooper county, Missouri, and came to Vinita on the Katy Flyer on the 19th day of December, and while waiting at the depot to take the 4 o'clock train to Blue Jacket, he was talking to several fellows there, and was drinking "right smartly." That he went to sleep and caught the defendant trying to steal something from him, and a short time after that he was in the closet with his clothes unloosed, and while he was unbuttoning his suspenders, the defendant "socked" his hand into his pocket, and said: "God damn you; give me that pocketbook,"—and he got the pocketbook and got away from him. That he had too much whisky to defend himself, or he could not have got away so easy. That he followed him a little piece, and saw two fellows starting after him, and he hallooed to them: "Arrest him! He robbed me,"—and they caught him. That there was a $5 bill and a little change and a ticket from Vinita, to Boonville, Missouri, in the pocketbook. That he did not consent to the defendant's taking his pocketbook the circumstances is undoubtedly superinduced by his surroundings.

b. Threats of prosecution.

In State v. Parson, 44 Wash. 299, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 566, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 87 Pac. 349, 12 Ann. Cas. 61, it was held that there was a sufficient use of force and putting in fear, within the statutory definition of robbery, where one approached an intoxicated person and pretended to arrest him, and, after compelling him to go away, searched him and took his valuables from him, no resistance being made because prosecutor believed such one to be an officer, and that he would be locked up if he resisted.

III. Force employed as a means of escape or to prevent a recapture of property taken without force.

After money has been stealthily removed from the pocket of another, the force used to prevent its recapture or to effect an escape does not relate back, so as to constitute the original taking a robbery. Colbey v. State, 46 Fla. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 87, 35 So. 189; Jones v. Com. 115 Ky. 592, 103 Am. St. Rep. 340, 74 S. W. 263, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 580.

And as there was no force in the taking, it was held in Grant v. State, 125 Ga. 259, 54 S. E. 191, that the taking was not robbery by force, but by intimidation, where accused went into a pawn shop, asked to be shown revolvers, selected one, loaded it, and, pointing it at the clerk, demanded him to stand back, and, upon the latter getting under the counter, backed out of the store carrying away the revolver.

IV. Decisions under special statutes.

Under the Texas Penal Code, art. 857, which provides that if any person, by threatening to do some illegal act injurious to the character, person, or property of another, shall fraudulently induce the person so threatened to deliver to him any property, with the intent to appropriate 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) it to his own use, he shall be guilty of robbery, it was said in Burnsides v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 399, 102 S. W. 108, that the offense would be made out where the indictment charges that one falsely impersonated an officer, and falsely charged another with committing an offense and threatened to put him in jail, and thereby induced such other to pay over a sum of money. But in this case the conviction was reversed, as there was evidence that accused in good faith believed that he had a right to make the arrest, and the prosecuting witness was actually committing an offense, and so, though the accused's subsequent accepting of money for his release might be an offense, it was not robbery.

In Doyle v. State, 77 Ga. 516, cited in the earlier note, the court said that, in view of the fact that almost every community is infested with gangs of thieves whose only vocation seems to be to entrap unsuspecting persons in the exhibition of their money, or throw them off their guard and snatch money or other valuables from their person, it wished to call the attention of the general assembly to the matter and unanimously recommended that such offense be made robbery and punished as that crime is punished. This suggestion was carried out by the amendment of the Penal Code, § 151 (Acts 1903, p. 43), so as to read: "Robbery is . . . the sudden snatching, taking, or carrying away any money, goods, chattels, or anything of value from the owner or person in possession or control thereof, without the consent of the owner or person in possession or control thereof." In construing this statute, the court in Williams v. State, 9 Ga. App. 170, 70 S. E. 890, said that formerly violence of some kind was essential to the offense of robbery, but that under this act, in order to prove a case of robbery by suddenly taking or carrying away the property of another without his consent, it is necessary to show only that the person robbed was conscious that something was being taken from him, and that for any reason he was unable to prevent it; that the only difference between robbery of this class and larceny

That they put him in jail, but released him the next morning. On cross-examination he stated that he was drinking when he arrived at Vinita; that he had a little square grip with a quart of whisky, a jar of honey, and some cakes in it, and he had a bottle of whisky in his pocket; that he gave the defendant and one or two others a drink of whisky in the toilet room; that he did not know how many drinks he gave the defendant; that he also visited some negro joints across the track near the depot; that when they drank his whisky the fellow with the defendant wanted him to give him a dollar to get some more whisky, and he told him he did not have any money.

J. W. May testified that he saw the defendant running from Armstrong, and followed him with a fellow named Pyatt, who caught him about 300 yards from the depot; that Pyatt let him go, and said, "I seen him throw something out of his pocket as he came around that corner;" that witness then took Monaghan to jail.

Jake Smith testified that he was present when the sheriff arrested the defendant, and heard them say that a man was robbed, and went to see if he could find anything, and found a pocketbook with a ticket in it to Boonville; that a fellow named Pyatt gave him directions where to look.

Charles A. Davidson testified that he saw witness Armstrong near the depot so drunk he could hardly stand; he hallooed that he had been robbed, "Catch him," and a man that he did not know caught the defendant and threw him down; that the defendant had a knife in his hand, and he ran over and took the knife away from him.

Lee R. Mitchell, clerk of the district from the person is that in the latter case property is abstracted without the knowledge of the possessor; but if the possessor becomes conscious, even in the taking that his property is being taken from him, and the knowledge is obtained before the taking is complete, it is robbery. And, so in that case it was held that as there was evidence that prosecuting witness was conscious that something was being taken from his pocket before, or at least at the same time that, an outcry was made that his money was taken from him, the jury were authorized to find that his money was suddenly taken away from him without his consent, but with his knowledge, and that the offense was robbery, and not larceny from the person or secret theft.

And in Hickey v. State, 125 Ga. 145, 53 S. E. 1026, a conviction under this act was sustained where the facts were almost identical.

And also in Pride v. State, 125 Ga. 750, 54 S. E. 698, the court said that "the sudden snatching from the victim with his court of Craig county, over the defendant's objection, was permitted to identify a subpoena issued to the sheriff of Muskogee county, commanding W. B. Pyatt to appear as a witness for the state in the case on trial, together with the signed order of the court for W. B. Pyatt to appear, and the return of the sheriff of Muskogee county showing that said W. B. Pyatt was not found in said county.

C. Caldwell, county attorney, of Craig county, testified that the W. B. Pyatt named in said subpoena is the man referred to as Pyatt by the witness who testified, and, over the defendant's objection, was permitted to state that on Monday last "I finally got in communication with Mr. Pyatt, or someone answering to the name of W. B. Pyatt, in Muskogee, and endeavored to get him here as a witness." Thereupon the defendant moved that the statement be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. The motion was overruled: the court saying to the jury that "This testimony is only permitted and will only be considered by the jury as showing or tending to show what effort the county attorney made to get this witness. That's the sole purpose of this particular testimony, and you will consider it for no other. The defendant may have an exception."

H. E. Ridenhour, sheriff, testified that when he arrested the defendant, he had one dollar in silver and three half dollars.

On behalf of the defendant, G. A. Whitney testified that he was with the defendant in the waiting room of the depot, and the complaining witness Armstrong invited them to go in the toilet and have a drink with him; and they went with him, he had knowledge is violence in the sense of this word as used in the amending act. In other words, the general assembly has enlarged the meaning of the words 'open force and violence,' as used in the section of the Penal Code, so that the crime of robbery may now be committed by force exerted directly upon the person robbed, or by suddenly snatching the property from the person, where no other force is used than is necessary for the thief to obtain possession of the property."

But in Morris v. State, 125 Ga. 36, 53 S. E. 564, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction under this act, where the prosecutor's purse was taken from his pocket without his knowledge and without resort to any violence in the taking, the court stating that the offense proved, if any, was that of larceny from the person, the distinction between this and the preceding cases being the fact that the property was taken without the owner's knowledge.

J. H. B.

a 4-ounce bottle of whisky, and they drank it up. Armstrong then said: "I would buy some more, but I have only got 15 cents." That he had a little telescope, and they opened it up, and it had a little can of something and big black bottle. That they had been in there about twenty minutes when witness left. That he saw the defendant have $2 or $3 in his hand at a drug store just before they went to the depot.

The defendant, as a witness on his own behalf, testified that he went to the depot with Whitney, and they went into the smoke room and sat down. Armstrong was talking to a couple of negroes, and then commenced a conversation with Whitney. They got up and went into the closet, and Armstrong produced a bottle of whisky, and they drank it. Armstrong said he wanted to eat a little, and that he had a lunch in his grip, and asked us to open it for him, and we found a bottle of whisky and a little jar of jam and some cakes. That Armstrong commenced eating the cakes, and witness said to Whitney, "I am going to get that bottle of whisky." That Whitney left, and he then slipped the bottle of whisky into his shirt, and a man named Bowen came in, and Armstrong pulled another bottle of whisky out of his pocket and they all drank. That he then went out and hid the bottle of whisky that he had taken from the grip under the depot, and then went back to the closet. As he went in Bowen came out, and Armstrong followed him out, saying he had been robbed, and he ran because he thought he meant that he was robbed of his whisky. That a fellow named Pyatt caught him and knocked him down, and he took his knife out and made him turn him loose. That Davidson came and took the knife away from him, and he started across the street, and the sheriff arrested him. He denied taking the pocketbook or anything else except the bottle of whisky.

It is contended, first, that the court erred in denying the motion for continuance made when the case was called for trial. His affidavit contained all the formal allegations required by law, and is in part as follows: "That the defendant on the 20th day of May, 1912, caused subpoena to be issued for Ed Bowen, who lives at Bartlesville, on which subpoena was indorsed an order of the court commanding attendance of said witness; that the return of the sheriff of Washington county this day filed is 'not found in my county;' that the said Ed Bowen, if present, would testify that at the time of the alleged robbery the said Armstrong and this defendant and the said Bowen were at the Missouri, Kansas, & 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Texas depot, in Vinita; that this defendant and Bowen and the said Armstrong were in the toilet drinking, and no robbery occurred during said time; that this defendant left said toilet, and that the said Bowen and said Armstrong remained therein; that about fifteen minutes later this defendant returned, and just as this defendant was entering the said toilet room, said Bowen left the same, and was immediately followed by said Armstrong; that said witness, if present, would also testify that the said Armstrong told him he had no money, and would have to borrow some from W. H. Kornegay in order to get to Blue Jacket, and that this defendant prior to going to said depot had money amounting to about $2.50; that the facts set forth are true, and that he cannot prove them by any other witness; that if he is granted a continuance, we can secure the testimony of said Bowen by the next term of this court, and that the said Bowen is not absent by the advice, procurement, or consent of affiant." No rule is more fully established than that this court will not reverse a judgment of the trial court upon the ground that it refused to grant a continuance, unless it appears that such court has manifestly abused its discretion in refusing it. We think the affidavit does not disclose such diligence on the part of defendant to procure the attendance of this witness as made it the duty of the court to grant the continuance.

The principal question presented is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment. It is not pretended that the prosecuting witness was put in any fear of injury to his person, and there was no evidence conducing to show that the defendant obtained or retained possession of the pocketbook by force and violence.

Section 2364 (Rev. Laws) of our Penal Code defines robbery as follows: "Robbery is a wrongful taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear."

Section 2365 provides: "To constitute robbery, the force or fear must be employed either to obtain or retain possession of the property, or to prevent or overcome resistance to the taking. If employed merely as a means of escape, it does not constitute robbery."

Section 2366 provides: "When force is employed in either of the ways specified in the last section, the degree of force employed is immaterial."

Section 2655 defines grand larceny as follows: "Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases:

First. When the property taken is of value exceeding $20. Second. When such property, although not of value exceeding $20 in value, is taken from the person of another."

The larcenous taking of property from the person of another constitutes grand larceny, except when the taking is accomplished by either force or by putting in fear; it is then robbery. Says Bishop: "Every robbery requires either actual violence inflicted on the person robbed, or such demonstrations or threats as under the circumstances create in him reasonable apprehension of bodily injury." 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, ¶ 116. Says Wharton: "The snatching a thing is not considered a taking by force, but if there be a struggle to keep it, or any violence or disruption, the taking is robbery, the reason of the distinction being that, in the former case we can infer neither fear nor the intention violently to take in face of resisting force. If putting in fear be proved, the offense is robbery. And so where the thing is torn from the person, as an earring from the ear." 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 854. "The violence or intimidation in robbery must precede or be contemporaneous with the taking of the property. The violence which constitutes an essential element of the crime of robbery must be actual, personal violence, but the degree of force used is immaterial, except under statutes which provide for a punishment varying with the violence which accompanies the taking. All the force that is required to make the offense a robbery is such force as is actually sufficient to overcome the victim's resistance. The mere snatching of an article from the person of another, without violence or putting in fear, is not robbery, except where there is some injury or violence to the person of the owner, or where the property snatched is so attached to the person or clothes of the owner as to afford resistance." 34 Cyc. 1799, and cases cited.

The prosecuting witness was the only person to testify to the circumstances attending the taking of the pocketbook. He admitted that he was helplessly drunk at the time, and his examination discloses the fact that he only knew that his pocketbook was taken against his will. His testimony also shows that he was not only violating the prohibition law of the state, but also the Federal law prohibiting the introduction of whisky into the Indian country. The subsequent struggle of the defendant with other persons in attempting to escape cannot be considered to determine whether the taking was forceful or furtive. It would seem, and we would suggest, that always in a case of this character, where the line of demarcation between offenses, as in this case, has a very narrow margin, the safe practice, where the proof may be uncertain, is to charge the lesser offense. Upon a careful review it is our opinion that the evidence did not show either force or fear in the taking of the property in question, and that the crime charged was not proved.

The charge of the court contains twenty-one instructions, and submitted only the issue of robbery in the first degree. The rules of law applicable to a case of this character are simple and plain, and the practice of encumbering the record with so many useless instructions is a vicious one, and ought not to be encouraged.

The instruction on the presumption of innocence concludes with the following disquisition: "But the court charges you that the presumption of innocence is not evidence, and does not partake of the nature of evidence, and that it remains with the defendant only until it is overcome by competent evidence which convinces your minds of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." The defendant's counsel contends that by this statement "the court completely destroys the presumption of innocence." Our Procedure Criminal provides, § 5875 (Rev. Laws): "A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved; and, in case of a reasonable doubt as to whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to be acquitted." The "presumption of innocence is founded upon the first principles of justice; it is the same presumption of law which obtained in behalf of the accused at common law. It is a principle so just, and so undoubted and universal, as to stand upon the recognition of all the times wherever the common law is respected. Our statute provides, as a rule of law, the state's burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and the presumption of innocence will therefore sustain the burden of evidence until the defendant is proven guilty by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. While the presumption of innocence is not evidence in the true sense, it may in a sense be called "an instrument of proof" or something "in the nature of evidence," in that it determines from whom evidence shall come, and it should continue to have its logical weight in the case, not only during the taking of the testimony, but during the deliberations of the jury until they have arrived at a verdict. The defendant is entitled in every instance to an instruction on the presumption of his innocence, and that the state must prove the charge against him beyond a reasonable doubt. The jury are bound to take the law from the court, and questions of fact are to be decided by the jury. The charge of the court must not invade the province of the jury, and should not extend beyond a plain statement of the law applicable to the case. Philosophic disquisition on the presumption of innocence or dissertation upon the nature of evidence should always be omitted. We think that the jury could be easily confused and misled by the qualifying statement in said instruction, "that the presumption of innocence is not evidence, and does not partake of the nature of evidence." Ordinarily they would understand the court to mean that the presumption of innocence amounts to nothing, and that they should only consider any inference of the fact of innocence that may arise upon the evidence. In other words, that they should not consider that the defendant was presumed to be innocent. It may also be construed as a comment upon the weight of evidence. The law requires the court, not only to abstain from positive expression as to the weight of the evidence, but to avoid even the appearance of an intimation as to the facts, and to so guard the language of its charge to the jury, which is the law of the case, that no inference, however remote or obscure, may be drawn by the jury as to the weight of the evidence. It is our opinion that the exception to the instruction was well taken.

In view of the fact that the judgment must be reversed for the errors already indicated, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the other questions raised.

For the reasons indicated the judgment appealed from is reversed. The warden of the penitentiary is directed to deliver the defendant to the sheriff of Craig county, who will hold him in custody until he shall be discharged therefrom, or as otherwise ordered according to law.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

CARRIE BROWN, Appt.,

v.

SARAH M. JOHNSON, Respnt.

(— Utah, —, 134 Pac. 590.)

Usury — bonus taken by agent — effect.

1. A principal who does not authorize or ratify the act of his agent in receiving a bonus beyond legal interest for lending his money, or knowingly receive or retain any of the fruits of the illegal transaction, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

is not subject to the penalties of the statute against usury.

Same — monthly interest — effect.

2. A note is not usurious because it provides for interest at a certain rate per month, if such rate is merely one twelfth of the yearly rate allowed by statute.

Evidence — of agent — negotiation of loan — usury.

3. Upon the question of usury in a loan, evidence of the agent of the borrower, who secured the loan, as to the transactions attending it, is admissible.

Same — services of agent — admissibility.

4. Upon the question of usury because of a bonus taken by the lender's agent, who claims that the bonus was for services performed by him for the borrower, evidence of the performance of such services is admissible.

(May 8, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Commissions charged by lender's agent as usury.

This note supplements the note to France v. Monro, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391, where the earlier cases are collected.

In Griswold v. Dugane, 148 Iowa, 504, 127 N. W. 664, the court declared that it was clear that if the person who negotiated the loan acted as agent for the lender, any commission to him, in addition to the legal rate of interest, would render the loan usurious. This is probably upon the assumption that the facts were known to the lender, though it is not expressly so stated.

The mere fact that the lender's agent exacts a commission from the borrower, in addition to legal interest, does not render the transaction usurious as to the lender, in the absence of proof that he knew of such exaction. Silverman v. Katz, 120 N. Y. Supp. 790.

Where, however, the principal is charged with knowledge of the charges made, he is bound by the acts of the agent. Thus, in Schwarz v. Sweitzer, 202 N. Y. 8, 94 N. E.

1090, affirming 134 App. Div. 939, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1140, it was held that a loan made by a son as agent for his mother for $960, the son retaining $160 as a bonus, of which fact the mother was informed, was held to be usurious; it appearing that the mother afterward collected interest on the loan, and that neither the borrower nor her broker, who effected the loan, knew that the son retained the bonus.

So, in American Mortg. Co. v. Woodward, 83 S. C. 521, 65 S. E. 739, it is held that the receipt of excessive and unreasonable commissions by the agent of the lender, with the knowledge, actual or constructive, of the principal, renders the transaction usurious, if such commissions and the interest added exceed the lawful rates.

And, in Robertson v. Merwin, 154 App. Div. 723, 139 N. Y. Supp. 726, the court concedes that a charge by an agent, without the knowledge or ratification of the principal, cannot be made the basis of a usury defense against the principal, but holds that, where one of three joint owners of a fund charged a sum in making a loan from that fund sufficient to amount to usury, and took security in the name of one of the other parties, which was in accordance with their practice generally in making loans from the fund, he was acting as a principal for the benefit of all three in a 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. A. A. Duncan, for respondent:

The amount retained by Mr. Lochwitz in excess of legal interest was solely as compensation for the loan or forbearance of the money involved in this action.

Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 112.

The principal is chargeable with the usury of the agent when either (1) the agency is general, or (2) the agent's services are gratuitous, and he receives his compensation from the borrower.

point enterprise, and the defense of usury was available.

When the taking of usury is made a criminal offense, the agent of the lender will be liable to prosecution if he charges a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest. Thus, in Owens v. State, 63 Fla. 26, 58 So. 125, which was a criminal prosecution under a statute providing that "any person, association of persons, firm or corporation, or the agent, officer, or other representative of any person, association of persons, firm, or corporation lending money in this state, who shall wilfully and knowingly charge or accept any sum of money greater than the sum of money loaned, and an additional sum of money equal to 25 per centum per annum upon the principal sum loaned, by any contract, contrivance, or device whatever, directly or indirectly, by way of commissions, discount, exchange, interest, pretended sale of any article, assignment of salary or wages, inspection fees or other fees, or otherwise," shall be guilty of misdemeanor, the court sustained the conviction of an agent of an investment company who charged a commission made on a loan, in addition to the full legal interest, though the agent maintained his own offices, and no part of the commission went to the investment company.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover upon a promissory note given for $350. The only defense interposed is usury. A trial to the court resulted in findings and judgment for defendant and the plaintiff appeals.

The interest specified in the note did not exceed the rate permitted by our statute, and hence the defendant undertook to prove usury by parol evidence. We have carefully gone over and examined all of the evidence that was produced at the trial, and which was certified up by the trial court in appellant's bill of exceptions. The material evidence produced by both parties is substantially as follows: Some time in 1910 Mrs. Mansfield, the mother of respondent, applied to one Adolph Lochwitz to obtain a loan of $250 or $300, which she said she needed immediately to pay certain materialmen for material which they had furnished and were furnishing for a new dwelling house she was then building. In this connection she testified that she went to Mr. Lochwitz and asked him for the money, and after telling him that she could secure its payment by a chattel mortgage upon her daughter's (respondent's) property he said that he would see what he could do for her by way of obtaining the money, and that he advised her that she needed at least $350; that within a day or two thereafter she saw him again, and he told her that he could let her have the money, but that she would have to pay $50 for it for ninety days; that pursuant to this arrangement she, at his request, went to the office of Mr. Sanford, an attorney at law, to have the necessary papers drawn to evidence the loan and there to obtain the money; that she met Mr. Sanford and Mr. Lochwitz at the office of the former, and he prepared the papers and she signed them by signing her daughter's name, by herself, as attorney in fact; that after the papers were signed Mr. Sanford counted out $300, placing the same in three separate parcels, and also counted out an additional $50 and placed it in a separate parcel and shoved the whole amount across the office desk toward her; that she was about to take the money when Mr. Lochwitz said that the interest and expenses for drawing the papers should be deducted from the amount. After this the witness's memory is not clear with respect to just how the transaction terminated. Mr. Sanford, however, testified that he obtained the $350 from his stenographer, with whom Mr. Lochwitz had left it, and that he counted all of it and shoved it across the desk to Mrs. Mansfield, when Mr. Lochwitz spoke up and said that the interest called for in the note, to wit, 1 per cent a month, should be taken out of the amount, and further that one half of the expenses for drawing the papers should also be deducted therefrom. He accordingly asked Mr. Sanford what the expenses were, and was informed that they would be $5. Mr. Sanford then sought to take the amount of the interest, namely, $10.50, and his expenses, $5, out of the $350, but could not do so because he could not make the change correctly. Mr. Lochwitz then paid Mr. Sanford the portion of the expenses Mrs. Mansfield was to pay and immediately left the office to go with her to the bank where she wanted to deposit the money so that she could check against it, where she said she would repay him her share of the expenses. As to what happened at the bank, the witnesses are greatly at variance, but, in view of the conclusions reached, the precise nature of the transaction there is not material. Mrs. Mansfield, however, asserts that Mr. Lochwitz took the whole $50 for interest, while he insists that all he took was $10.50 and one half of the expenses, and that Mrs. Mansfield gave him $37 as compensation for his efforts in obtaining the money in question and to further assist her to obtain a loan upon her house she was then building. He says that this came about in this way: When Mrs. Mansfield asked him for the money in question he asked her what means she had to repay the loan if made; that she said she wanted to secure $1,200 by mortgaging her house, and if she could do so she could repay the loan from him out of that. After considering her wants as detailed by her, he told her that she had better make a loan of $1,600, and that in consideration of the $50 she offered to pay him he would assist her to obtain the loan from some real estate men with whom he was acquainted. She disputes the latter statement and insists that the $50 was asked as a compensation for the use of the money in question. The evidence is without contradiction that the money in question belonged to the appellant, who is a niece of Mr. Lochwitz, and at the time the loan was made lived and still lives in San Francisco; that some time prior to the transaction in question she had lived at Price, Utah, and from there came to Salt Lake City for surgical treatment; that after she was operated upon and was about to leave Salt Lake City for San Francisco she had more money than she needed and she gave $400 to her uncle, Mr. Lochwitz, telling him to use it or do with it as he thought best, and when she needed it he could, upon request, return it to her. Mr. Lochwitz states that after he had tried in vain for a number of days to obtain the money for Mrs. Mansfield, and after she had offered him $50 as compensation to obtain it, he finally let her have $350 of the $400 aforesaid and took a chattel mortgage as security; that his niece had no knowledge whatever that he was about to make or that he had made the loan, until afterwards, when he advised her of the fact and asked her to execute a power of attorney to him so that he might do everything that might be required of him in collecting the money; that she did not know anything about the arrangements between him and Mrs. Mansfield respecting the interest, commission, or bonus (whatever it may be called), and never obtained any part or share of the same; that no arrangement or understanding of any kind was ever had or talked of between him and his niece about the making of this or any other loan, or about his services in case he made a loan, and that his niece furnished the entire $350. Respondent introduced the aforesaid power of attorney in evidence, which is dated and was executed some time after the note in question was made and delivered. It is not necessary to detail the evidence further.

The only findings of fact made by the court, except the formal ones, are as follows: "That the said note and mortgage were made and delivered to the plaintiff upon an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the defendant should pay to plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should take, receive, reserve, and secure to herself for the loan of the principal sum therein mentioned, a greater sum than at the rate of 12 per centum per annum upon said principal sum, to wit, at the rate of 1 per cent per month from date of said note, as provided therein, and in addition thereto the sum of $34; and, in addition to the said interest so reserved by the said note at the rate of 1 per cent per month from date thereof until paid, the defendant at the time of the execution and delivery thereof paid to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took and received in pursuance of said agreement, the said further sum of $34 as additional interest or compensation for the loan of the said principal sum."

Upon the foregoing findings the court made conclusions of law and entered judgment in favor of respondent, in which the note and chattel mortgage were canceled and appellant was adjudged to pay the costs of the action. Appellant complains that the findings aforesaid are not sustained by the evidence, and that the court's conclusions of law and judgment are contrary to law.

We think it requires no extended, if any, argument to show that in view of the evidence to which we have referred the so-called findings of fact are merely a blending of conclusions of fact and conclusions of law interspersed with some ultimate facts. The finding that an agreement was entered into "between the plaintiff and defendant" is, in view of the evidence, a conclusion of law pure and simple, since the evidence is without dispute that Mr. Lochwitz acted as agent for and on behalf of the appellant, and that Mrs. Mansfield acted as such for and on behalf of the respondent. In view, therefore, that the transaction was effected through the agents of both parties, and since appellant contended at the trial and now contends that she did not enter into a corrupt and usurious agreement, knew nothing about it, and neither received any of the fruits thereof nor ratified the transaction, the court should have specifically found the facts with regard to those matters and should have made his conclusions of law from the facts found.

There is not the slightest evidence in this record from which any inference can legitimately be deduced that the appellant authorized her uncle to enter into a usurious contract, unless such inference is permissible from the mere fact that she left the money with him under the conditions hereinbefore detailed and from the execution of the power of attorney to him after the loan was made. Nor is there any evidence of ratification, nor that she knowingly received or retained any of the fruits of the illegal transaction, nor that she received anything forbidden by law. We think the great weight of authority is to the effect that the facts in this case are clearly insufficient to justify the inference above referred to. We shall refer to some of the cases upon this point further on in this opinion.

The court, however, also found that the note in question upon its face provided for a higher rate of interest than is permitted by our statute in that it calls for interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month while the statute permits interest at a rate "not to exceed 12 per cent per annum." If this were so, the finding is useless, since the note speaks for itself. The finding is, however, a mere conclusion of law, but whether it is called a conclusion or a finding of fact it cannot be sustained, because there is no evidence whatever to support it. Nor does the language of the note support it if it be assumed to be a mere legal conclusion. This is easily demonstrable. The statute permits any rate of interest not exceeding 12 per cent per annum. This means a period of twelve months, no more no less. One per cent a month is precisely 12 per cent per annum, and this is especially so where the loan is for less than a whole year. If the interest reserved in the note in question be calculated, we find that upon the $350 it amounts to $3.50 a month and for twelve months to $42. Interest at the rate of 12 per cent per annum would amount to $42 for a year on $350, and to $3.50 for each month, and for three months to $10.50, just the amount reserved in the note. If it were true that the note on its face called for a usurious rate, then we cannot see how the appellant could escape the consequences of a usurious contract, and the judgment would be correct regardless of the findings of fact, and there would have been no need of an extended opinion in this case. We are, however, clearly of the opinion that the note upon its face called for legal interest merely, and hence the usury must be established, if established at all, from facts aliunde. The question, therefore, is, Does the evidence in this case establish usury in the sense that it vitiates the note under our statute as between appellant and respondent? While the courts with regard to when a principal is bound by the acts of an agent in entering into usurious contracts or transactions are seemingly not in harmony, yet from a careful examination of the cases it will be found that their divergent views are more apparent than real.

In Boylston v. Bain, 90 Ill. 285, the supreme court of Illinois states the law upon the subject thus: "If the plaintiff did not authorize his agent to charge a higher rate of interest than is given by the statute, and if he had no knowledge that a higher rate was charged, and did not receive the interest paid in excess of that allowed by statute, as stated in the instruction, we perceive no ground upon which the defense of usury could be rested. An unlawful and corrupt intent is the very essence of a usurious transaction, and how the plaintiff could be charged with an intent to violate the law if he had no knowledge that a usurious rate of interest was charged, and never received the illegal interest, as declared in the instruction, it is difficult to understand."

The supreme court of Iowa in Greenfield v. Monaghan, 85 Iowa, 211, 52 N. W. 193, in the headnote, lays down the following rule: "Where an agent for a person lending money upon a promissory note charged the borrower a rate of interest in excess of that allowed by law, retaining the difference between the rate charged and the legal rate for his own use, held, that the loan was not usurious unless the charge of illegal interest was authorized or ratified by the principal, and that upon such issue the burden of proof was upon the party charging usury."

In Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 102, 29 L. ed. 561, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 303, the Supreme Court of the United States, after reviewing the Iowa cases in connection with a number of others, says: "These decisions seem to be founded on plain principles of justice and right. For when two persons, the agent and the borrower, conspire together and for their own purposes violate the law, how can punishment for their acts be justly imposed on the innocent third party, the lender?"

What have we in this case except a secret arrangement between Mrs. Mansfield and Mr. Lochwitz, the former being anxious to obtain the money and the latter desirous of receiving the bonus or a commission (call it what you will) from her out of the money loaned without the knowledge or consent of appellant, whose money was loaned? Why should she be made to suffer for their acts from which each expected some benefits, while she could obtain none except the interest allowed by law?

The editor in a footnote to the case of Bank of Newport v. Cook, 46 Am. St. Rep. 197, after reviewing many of the cases, states the substance of the decisions in the following language: "If the person to whom a commission or bonus is paid is an agent of the lender, the question whether such payment can be taken into consideration in determining whether the transaction is usurious depends upon whether or not the lender is to profit, directly or indirectly, by the transaction. If he does not know that a commission has been, or is agreed to be, paid, and has no notice of such facts as impose upon him the duty of inquiry, and he does not knowingly receive any benefit from the commission or bonus, he certainly has no usurious intent, and, having neither usurious intent nor a usurious profit, the cases agree that he is not to be subjected to the penalties of usury." Many cases are cited as supporting the foregoing statement of the editor.

Without making further excerpts from the decisions, we refer to the following cases, all of which are in harmony with the cases referred to and in which many others are cited: Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Franzen v. Hammond, 136 Wis. 239, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 399, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1079, 116 N. W. 169; Silverman v. Katz (Sup.) 120 N. Y. Supp. 790.

In the case of Rogers v. Buckingham, supra, the transaction there involved, like the one in this case was the only one that had been entered into by the agent for the principal; and the court held that a single transaction by an agent, where no arrangement existed between the principal and such agent with regard to the compensation he should receive or the rate he should reserve, was insufficient to authorize an inference or presumption of fact that the agent was authorized to exact usury. That case is frequently cited and approved by the courts upon the question of establishing authority upon the part of the agent to bind the principal upon a usurious contract made by the agent. It has, however, also been frequently held that, where an agent enters into a usurious contract with a borrower, the lender, under certain circumstances, may be bound by the acts of the agent, although the former did not know of nor directly authorize the particular transaction. The rule in this respect is perhaps as well stated by the supreme court of Minnesota as it is anywhere in the headnote to the opinion in the case of Hall v. Maudlin, 58 Minn. 137, 49 Am. St. Rep. 492, 59 N. W. 985, which we quote: "Where a money lender intrusts the entire management of his business to a general agent, with unlimited authority to conduct it according to his own discretion, and with the understanding that he shall obtain the compensation for his services as agent from the borrowers, in the form of bonus or commission, if the agent exacts from a borrower a bonus or commission which, together with the interest reserved in the contract, amounts to more than the maximum rate of interest allowed by law, the transaction is usurious." The following cases clearly support the rule as there stated: Robinson v. Blaker, 85 Minn. 242, 89 Am. St. Rep. 541, 88 N. W. 845; Payne v. Henderson, 106 Ky. 135, 50 S. W. 34; Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611, 39 Am. Rep. 69; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 384, 35 L. ed. 786, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

51 L.R.A. 499, 36 S. E. 837; Whaley v. American Freehold Land-Mortg. Co. 20 C. C. A. 306, 42 U. S. App. 90, 74 Fed. 73. See also cases cited in the footnote to Bank of Newport v. Cook, 46 Am. St. Rep. 198, 199.

In addition to the cases just cited there are a few in which the principal's liability is extended to all acts which were within the apparent scope of the agent's authority. All that the courts in those cases seemed to inquire into was whether the agent had the authority to make the loan, and, if he had, the principal was held bound by the agent's acts, although the agent transcended the express directions of his principal. To this effect is an early case from Nebraska which is referred to by Mr. Justice Sullivan in Hare v. Winterer, 64 Neb. 551, 90 N. W. 544. In the latter case it is, however, expressly stated that it was not necessary to go, and that the court did not go, to that extent in a later case. The later Nebraska case may therefore be classed as belonging to the second group of cases cited above. Another case which perhaps goes to the extent of the early Nebraska case is Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130.

It is also claimed by respondent that the case of Algur v. Gardner, 54 N. Y. 360, supports the doctrine laid down in the Vermont case. It will be observed that the case of Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446, to which we have referred, and which is a later New York case, squarely lays down the doctrine of the Illinois case which we have quoted from. Moreover, the reasoning in the opinion in 54 N. Y. is not satisfactory, and we have not found the case cited nor followed by any of the later New York or other cases, while the case in 66 N. Y. has frequently been cited and followed.

There is still another case decided by the supreme court of Missouri, Western Storage & Warehouse Co. v. Glasner, 169 Mo. 38, 68 S. W. 917. The decision in that case is, however, squarely based upon a local statute, and is therefore not controlling here. There may be a few more sporadic cases which follow the rule laid down by the Vermont court, but we have not found them. We desire to add in this connection that, when all of the cases from which we have quoted, and the others to which we have referred, except the ones from Nebraska, Vermont, and Missouri, and possibly the one in 54 N. Y., are carefully examined and analyzed, it will be found that all of them support the doctrine laid down by the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Boylston v. Rain, 90 Ill. 285. We are also of the opinion that the doctrine as there laid down is the correct one.

The question of whether the agent had authority to enter into a contract in violation of law should not be limited to the mere formal inquiry of whether he had the express or implied authority to lend the principal's money. While that question, as a matter of course, is always an element and lies at the very threshold of the inquiry where the authority of the agent is involved, yet, where the transaction involves the violation of a statute, the inquiry should go farther, and it should be ascertained whether the agent had the authority to enter into the contract which is alleged to be in violation of law. To establish such authority it need not be shown that the principal expressly conferred it, but it may be shown in the same manner as it usually is shown by proving the facts and circumstances from which the authority may legally be inferred or implied. And in this regard, if it be shown that there was an understanding, express or implied, between the agent and the principal whereby the former should look to the borrower for a commission or bonus as compensation, or if he has made loans for his principal in which such a course was pursued and the principal knew of it, or approved of it, or if there are any other facts or circumstances from which authority may be clearly implied, it may be found to exist. In the case at bar, as we have seen, there is nothing from which authority may be deduced except the naked fact that the uncle of appellant was authorized to exercise his best judgment in making use of the $400 she had left with him. Assuming that all that Mrs. Mansfield claims is true, still the question remains, What authority has the court to declare appellant's money forfeited to the respondent? Certainly our statute does not require that under such conditions the latter's money should be forfeited to the borrower.

The statute says "whenever it shall satisfactorily appear by the admission of the party or by proof that any bond, bill, etc., has been taken or received in violation of the provisions" [Utah Comp. Laws 1907, § 1241 X 8] of the statute, then, and not otherwise, shall the lender forfeit the whole sum expressed in the contract to the borrower. We held in Culmer Paint & Glass Co. v. Gleason, — Utah, —, 130 Pac. 66, that when the plea of usury is interposed and forfeitures are involved, and "especially such as have the effect of taking property from one and giving it to another [the forfeiture] should be enforced only when the proof is clear and convincing, if not beyond a reasonable doubt." We think that this is what is contemplated by the language of the statute which is, when it 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

shall satisfactorily appear by the admission of the party or by proof that the provisions thereof have been violated, a forfeiture, etc., shall be declared by the court. If this means anything, it means that the proof showing a violation of the statute should be clear and convincing. The proof, in order to be satisfactory, can be no less than this.

Entirely apart, however, from the terms of our statute, the overwhelming weight of authority is clearly to the effect that the burden of proof is upon him who alleges usury, and that he must establish it by at least clear and convincing evidence, and not merely by a preponderance thereof. Webb, Usury, § 417; Yellow Medicine County Bank v. Cook, 61 Minn. 452, 63 N. W. 1093; Wood v. Babbitt (C. C.) 149 Fed. 818; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Short v. Post, 58 N. J. Eq. 130, 42 Atl. 563. The evidence as it now stands is therefore clearly within the rule laid down in Yellow Medicine County Bank v. Cook, supra, and is insufficient to support the conclusions of law and judgment.

Appellant further contends that the court erred in overruling her motion to strike the testimony of Mrs. Mansfield. This contention is not tenable. While Mrs. Mansfield's testimony, standing alone, was clearly insufficient to make out a case as against the appellant, yet the testimony was properly received by the court. There is a further assignment that the court erred in admitting and excluding certain evidence.

We have carefully gone over the court's rulings in that regard, and we do not find any error in that regard excepting in one particular in connection with the claim advanced by appellant; namely, Mr. Lochwitz claimed that he was to receive the $50 as compensation for obtaining a loan upon Mrs. Mansfield's house and lot and for what he had done in looking up persons who had money to lend before the loan in question was made, and in connection with the claim he attempted to prove that he had in fact assisted Mrs. Mansfield, and he offered to show just what he had done in that respect. The court ruled that he could prove the agreement between himself and Mrs. Mansfield, but also ruled that he could not show what he had done after the loan in question was made. Where usury is attempted to be proved by parol evidence or otherwise, it is always proper for either party to go into the whole transaction for the purpose of disclosing all of the circumstances relating thereto. The evidence offered by appellant, while somewhat remote was nevertheless proper in view of the claim made by Mr. Lochwitz. The question was one of weight, and not of relevancy. The only objection was that it was not material. It clearly was material, and, as we have seen, was otherwise proper. If this were the only error, we should not reverse the judgment, because it appears from the record that most of the offer to which we have referred was nevertheless before the court, as upon cross-examination Mr. Lochwitz was permitted to state about all of the facts in that regard. We have only mentioned the matter as a guide to the court in case a retrial of the case is had.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, the case is remanded to the District Court, with directions to grant a new trial and to proceed with the case in accordance with this opinion. Appellant to recover costs.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

T. D. SIMPSON

v.

DENVER & RIO GRANDE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Utah, —, 134 Pac. 883.)

Pleading — complaint — issuance of pay check — negligence or estoppel.

1. One cashing a railroad pay check which was delivered by the railroad company to an impostor cannot, in an action to recover the amount from the railroad company, succeed upon the theory of negligence or estoppel on its part, unless he alleged such grounds in his complaint.

Bills and notes — pay check — issuance to impostor — forged indorsement — liability of holder.

2. A railroad company which by mistake issues to impostors pay checks belonging to employees is not liable to pay them to one who cashes them upon the forged indorsement of the impostors, without negligence or conduct amounting to an estoppel on its part.

lief demanded in an action brought to recover upon certain pay checks issued by defendant which had been cashed by plaintiff. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Van Cott, Allison, & Riter, for defendant:

In order to pass title to the checks in question, the impostors had to forge the signatures of the payees.

Forgery can pass no title to a negotiable instrument.

Straup, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts are undisputed. The case was presented on an agreed statement. The substance of it is: The defendant operated a railroad and had in its employ several thousand employees, who were paid on the 10th of each month for services rendered the previous month. At the end of each month it prepared a pay roll, containing the names of the employees, their occupation, places employed, number of days worked, and the amount due. Pay checks were then prepared in which the date, the name of the employee, and the amount due were stated. The paymaster, with the pay car, the pay rolls, and checks traveled his district from place to place, and delivered the checks to the employees, who passed through the car to receive them. In October, 1911, the defendant had in its employ two firemen, E. C. Fields and C. B. Rings, who worked on its road between Salt Lake City and Helper, Utah. At the end of that month it owed Fields for services $93.49; Rings $109.75. Their names were on the pay roll, and pay checks made out to each. The one to Fields is:

The Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Co.
Roll No. 1540. No. 4.

Denver, Colo., November 10, 1911.

The treasurer of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Co. will pay to the order of C. E. Fields $93.49, ninety-three and 49/100 dollars for services rendered during the month of October, 1911, when countersigned by Freeman Sumner, paymaster.

J. W. Gilluly, Treasurer.

F. Sumner, Paymaster.

No. C368899.

The other to Rings is the same, except the substitution of his name, the number and the amount due him, $109.75. On November 10, 1911, the pay car in charge of the paymaster was at Salt Lake City from 7 o'clock in the morning until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. From repeated deliveries of pay checks the paymaster became personally acquainted with a large number of the employees. Fields and Rings, however, had been in the defendant's employ only since August, 1911. While the paymaster had delivered them two pay checks before, in September and October, still, owing to the large number of employees paid off each month, between 3,500 and 4,000, he was unable to remember and identify all of them, and did not remember or know Fields or Rings. On November 10, 1911, between the hours stated, between 1,700 and 1,900 employees at Salt Lake City passed through the pay car for their checks, practically a continuous procession or line. As they approached the paymaster they announced their names, the pay roll was examined, the check selected and delivered to the employee, and the date of delivery stamped on the pay roll opposite his name. Between the hours stated two unknown men, impostors, entered the pay car at different times. One of them, preceded and followed by employees, as he approached the paymaster called out the name of E. C. Fields. The paymaster looked at him, but did not in fact know whether he was or was not Fields, but believing that he was, and seeing the name of Fields on the pay roll, selected the check which had been made out for Fields, and delivered it to the impostor representing himself to be Fields. The other impostor, representing himself to be Rings, in like manner obtained the Rings' check.

The plaintiff formerly was in the employ of the defendant at Salt Lake City, and had a general acquaintance with its employees at that place; but at and prior to the time in question he was engaged in the saloon business at Salt Lake City, and had been in the habit of cashing at their face value a large number of the employees' checks. The impostors in the afternoon of the day they obtained the checks presented them to the plaintiff, and asked him to cash them. They were strangers to him. He asked them if they were the parties named in the checks, and was told by them that they were. They wholly unidentified indorsed them. The one holding the Fields' check indorsed it, "E. C. Fiels," the other, "C. B. Rings." The plaintiff paid them the face value of the checks, in ignorance of the fraud practised on the defendant and of the forgeries of the indorsements. That night the real E. C. Fields, and the next day the real C. B. Rings, presented themselves to the defendant for their pay checks. It learning of the fraud practised on it and of the mistake made in delivering the checks to the wrong persons, paid Fields and Rings the full amount of their wages. The plaintiff indorsed the checks the impostors had indorsed to him, and deposited them to his credit with his bank. In due course they were presented to the defendant's treasurer, who refused to honor and pay them. The bank canceled the credit, and the plaintiff brought this action against the defendant on two counts, one on the Fields' check, the other on the Rings' check. The court gave plaintiff judgment on the Rings' check, the defendant on the Fields'. This, because of the difference in the indorsements; the Fields' check being indorsed by the impostor, "Fiels," not "Fields."

Both the plaintiff and the defendant appeal. There is no claim of bad faith on the part of either. The plaintiff has alleged no negligence nor any estoppel on the part of the defendant. He claims neither in his brief; he did, in a way, claim both in oral argument. His claim, however, can be no broader than his complaint. Nor does the agreed statement contain facts upon which an estoppel may be founded, or from which negligence may be inferred.

The case is thus presented within a very narrow compass. It is, Can the plaintiff a holder under the forged indorsements of the pay checks, treated by both parties as negotiable instruments, compel the defendant, who is both the drawer and the drawee, to pay him the checks, without allegations and proof of negligence or an estoppel on the part of the defendant? That the persons who presented the checks to the plaintiff were impostors, had no right or authority to receive, present, indorse, or transfer them, and that their indorsements were clear forgeries, are conceded propositions; and without allegations and proof of negligence, or an estoppel on the part of the defendant, we think the plaintiff is not entitled to prevail on either count. Tolman v. American 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Nat. Bank, 22 R. I. 462, 52 L.R.A. 877, 84 Am. St. Rep. 850, 48 Atl. 480; Harmon v. Old Detroit Nat. Bank, 153 Mich. 73, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 514, 126 Am. St. Rep. 467, 116 N. W. 617; *Rolling v. The plaintiff, in support of his contention that the defendant, "having permitted the checks by mistake to come into the hands of the impostors," who wrongfully received them, and without authority and by forgery indorsed them "to a bona fide holder, is liable to such holder for the payment of the same,"—cites: United States v. National Exch. Bank (C. C.) 45 Fed. 163; Emporia Nat. Bank v. Shotwell, 35 Kan. 360, 57 Am. Rep. 171, 11 Pac. 141; Crippen v. American Nat. Bank, 51 Mo. App. 508; Meridian Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Ind. App. 322, 52 Am. St. Rep. 450, 33 N. E. 247, 34 N. E. 608; Robertson v. Coleman, 141 Mass. 231, 55 Am. Rep. 471, 4 N. E. 619; Maloney v. Clark, 6 Kan. 83; E. S. Karoly Electrical Constr. Co. v. Globe Sav. Bank, 64 Ill. App. 225; Famous Shoe & Clothing Co. v. Crosswhite, 124 Mo. 34, 26 L.R.A. 568, 46 Am. St. Rep. 424, 27 S. W. 397; Fiore v. Ladd, 22 Or. 202, 29 Pac. 435, and McHenry v. Old Citizens' Nat. Bank, 85 Ohio St. 203, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1111, 97 N. E. 395. We think the cases are not applicable, for the principal reason that in nearly all of them the person to whom the check or instrument was delivered was the very person whom the drawer intended should present and indorse it, and receive the money evidenced by it, or with whom the transaction was had with respect to which the check was given, or where recovery was permitted on the ground of negligence or an estoppel. These elements are not here present. Deliveries were here made of the checks with the intent and purpose that the persons and payees named in the checks, and no other, except upon their valid indorsements, should present them and receive the money evidenced by them. The checks on their face were payable to the order of E. C. Fields and C. B. Rings, and in themselves plainly directed that payment would be made only to them, or to their indorsees, and to no other. Plaintiff knew that. That is what the checks themselves told him. The impostors came to him without title. Plaintiff's title rests absolutely upon their forgeries of the indorsements.

It is well settled that a forged indorsement does not pass title to commercial paper negotiable only by indorsement. Warren v. Smith, 35 Utah, 455, 136 Am. St. Rep. 1071, 100 Pac. 1069. To that effect also is our statute. Section 1575, Comp. Laws 1907, provides: "Where a signature is forged or made without the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be, it is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the instrument, or to give a discharge therefor, or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto, can be acquired through or under such signature, unless the party against whom it is sought to enforce such right is precluded from setting up the forgery or want of authority." And as plaintiff has no other claim of title it follows he cannot prevail.

That part of the judgment which is in the defendant's favor is therefore affirmed; that in favor of the plaintiff reversed. The case is remanded for a new trial. Costs to the defendant.

Personal property placed by a nonresident with trustees within a state for investment, under a trust which might have been terminated at any time, and does not name ultimate beneficiaries, retains its situs at his domicile, and where he dies without descendants, it is not subject to a collateral inheritance tax at the domicile of the trustees.

(April 29, 1912.)

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Lee Patton, for appellant:

The situs of intangible personal property held by resident trustees for nonresident cestui qui trustent is in that state where the trustee in whom is vested the legal title and ownership, is domiciled.

Scope.

This note is confined strictly to the question whether the physical presence within the taxing jurisdiction of personal property, or the evidences thereof, belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, will subject it to a succession tax; and the converse question whether the exaction of such a tax in respect of personal property of a decedent who was domiciled within the taxing jurisdiction is prevented by the physical absence of such property, or the evidences thereof. It therefore does not deal with questions in relation to exemptions of particular property, the deduction of indebtedness, or generally matters affecting the amount of, or mode of computing, the tax, or the means of enforcing the payment of the same, whether those questions relate to property within or without the jurisdiction. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The domicile of the decedent at the time of her death was in France. She was a widow and left no lineal descendant. She owned real estate in this state which was appraised at $17,500, and, as there was no conversion of it into personalty by the terms of her will, its liability to collateral inheritance tax was conceded. In 1853 she placed a certain fund in the hands of trustees in the city of Philadelphia, and when she died it was held by their successors. Seven eighths of it represented accumulations, and the whole of it consisted of bonds, mortgages, and obligations of individuals and corporations. From the disallowance of the commonwealth's claim to collateral inheritance tax on this personal fund, it has appealed.

The deed of trust executed by the decedent does not seem to have been before points excluded will be found under the main divisions of the note.

It should be borne in mind that this note only purports to cover the case law on the question involved, and does not, except incidentally and occasionally, undertake to note changes in the statutes except as they are passed upon by the adjudicated cases. The fact that the doctrine established by a line of cases under a particular form of statute is abrogated so far as the jurisdiction in which they were rendered is concerned by subsequent changes in the statute does not, of course militate against their value as legal precedents, in other jurisdictions whose statutes are similar in form to that under which they were decided. It may be observed, however, that recently a tendency is observable to adopt by legislative action, a more consistent principle in laying these taxes, and thus avoid the double taxation inevitably resulting from the application of diverse principles in determining the property in respect of which the tax is to be paid.

I. Personal property of nonresident's estate physically present within the taxing jurisdiction.

a. In general.

There are a number of questions in relation to the liability to a succession or inheritance tax in respect of personal property belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent that are not within the scope of this note, for the reason that they do not depend solely upon the effect of the presence within the taxing jurisdiction of the personal property in question, or the evidences thereof. Such, for example, is the question whether an indebtedness to the estate of a nonresident is subject to the succession or inheritance tax law of a particular jurisdiction because the debtor is a resident, or a corporation, of that jurisdiction (on that point, see note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 953), or because it is secured by a lien upon real property situated in that jurisdiction (on that point, see notes in 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1104, and 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 784). 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, whether the fact that a corporation in which a nonresident holds stock is a domestic corporation will render the stock liable to the payment of the debt, irrespective of the place where the certificates are held, is not within the scope of the present note. (On that point see notes in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 887 and 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 384). Questions, otherwise within the scope of the present note, that arise in connection with the exercise of a power of appointment, are also excluded, as they are treated in the note on that general subject in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 236, 239.

The question whether property out of the state is to be included in fixing exemptions under the inheritance tax law is considered in the note in 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

As to liability of insurance policy issued by a domestic corporation upon the life of a nonresident to a local transfer tax, see note to Re Gordon, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1089.

As to effect of apportioning property of nonresident decedent within the state to payment of debt or legacies which are exempt or subject to a reduced rate, see note in 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946.

While, with a few exceptions, it is generally held or assumed, both as a matter of constitutional law and statutory construction, unless the terms of the statute forbid, that a state or country within which the decedent was domiciled at the time of his death may exact a succession tax in respect of his personal property (not otherwise exempt) although such property or the evidence thereof is physically present in another jurisdiction (see infra, II.), the converse of that principle, namely, that the tax should not be exacted in respect of personal property within the jurisdiction, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, is not generally accepted in this country, unless the terms of the statute require it.

Upon the other hand, it is very generally held in this country, unless the terms of the statute forbid, that a succession or inheritance tax is payable in respect of the personal property belonging to the estate of the court below, and we are ignorant of its terms and provisions. It does appear, however—apparently by admission—that she could have terminated the trust at any time and taken possession of all the trustees held for her. Aside from mere compensation for their services, they had no beneficial interest in the fund, even though the legal title to the securities may have been in their names. During all the nearly sixty years' duration of this passive trust, the decedent was the real owner of the securities, and she died as such owner, while domiciled in a foreign country. Up to the time of her death everything held by the trustees was at her absolute disposal and constituted part of her personal estate. At the time of her death, what was the situs of this fund? If it was in France, which was her home, it is not taxable here. The earnest contention of the learned counsel for the commonwealth is that its situs was here. As just stated, we do not have the benefit of any light which the deed of trust might throw upon this question, and, with the admitted right of the decedent to absolutely control the fund at all times, was it, at the time of her death, within the rule or maxim, Mobilia sequuntur personam? We are of opinion that it was.

While as a general rule the situs of personal property follows the owner, some species of personality may, for particular purposes, have a situs distinct from the legal one. This was recognized in Small's Estate, 151 Pa. 1, 25 Atl. 23, 28, because the propa nonresident decedent, where such property, or the evidence thereof, is physically present within the taxing state; at least, if not there for a mere temporary presence (the cases cited are subsequently set out in detail). Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277; Gallup's Appeal, 76 Conn. 617, 57 Atl. 699 (But see infra as to limitation of this doctrine in Connecticut); People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82; Callahan v. Woodbridge, 171 Mass. 595, 51 N. E. 176; Re Stanton, 142 Mich. 491, 105 N. Supp. 858, affirmed without opinion in 182 N. Y. 524, 74 N. E. 1116; Re Tiffany, 143 App. Div. 327, 128 N. Y. Supp. 106, affirmed in 202 N. Y. 550, 95 N. E. 1140; Re Burr, 16 Misc. 89, 38 N. Y. R. 260; Com. v. Brenner, 2 Legal Gaz. 413.

In other words, unless the terms of the statute forbid, the courts in this country generally pursue the course expressly declared by the court in Re Whiting, 150 N. Y. 27, 34 L.R.A. 232, 55 Am. St. Rep. 640, 44 N. E. 715, and ignore the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam so far as it is an obstacle, and leave it unchanged so far as it is an aid, to the imposition of the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tax. Though this inevitably leads to double taxation, it is not constitutionally objectionable on that account. (See notes in 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 150, and 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 142.)

In this connection it may be observed that by an amendment of the inheritance tax law in 1911 [3 N. Y. Laws 1911, chap. 372, § 11], New York appears to have abandoned the plan of laying the tax according to inconsistent and mutually antagonistic principles, and to have adopted in place thereof the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam as the criterion of liability in respect of intangible personal property, and actual situs as the criterion in respect of tangible personal property.

The discussion of the amended statute, however, is not within the scope of the present note, as it does not appear to have been passed upon by the New York courts, at least as regards any question now under consideration. In a Kansas case (State ex rel. Dawson v. Davis, 88 Kan. 849, 129 Pac. 1197), however, where the effect of the New York amended statute became involved because of the reciprocity feature of the Kansas statute, it was assumed that, under the amended statute, upon the death of a resident of New York, a tax is imposed upon all his intangible property, wherever located, and upon such of his tangible property as is situated in New York, but none in respect of his tangible property outside of that state; that upon the death of a nonresident of New York, owning property there, a tax is exacted only in respect of such of it as is tangible.

Recurring to cases where the terms of the statute did not forbid the application of diverse and inconsistent principles in determining the property in respect of which the tax is payable:

In State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82, the court declared that in the absence of constitutional prohibition, the state has authority to regulate by law the devolution and the distribution of an intestate's property situated within the jurisdiction of the state, and

erty of the limited partnership in this state, in which the foreign decedent held stock, "was largely made up of lands, merchandise, flour, grain, and other personal property which had a visible and tangible existence and an actual situs in this state." Great reliance seems to be placed on this case as an authority sustaining the claim of the commonwealth for collateral inheritance tax on the bonds, mortgages, and obligations which were held here for the Countess de Noailles; but, in relying upon it, counsel seems to overlook what was further said by Mr. Justice Sterrett: "As a general rule, intangible personal property of a nonresident, such as bonds, mortgages, and other choses in action, is governed, as to its situs, by the fiction of law above noticed, and hence such property is not subject to collateral inheritance taxation under our laws, because it is not 'situated within this state.'" Lewis's Estate, 203 Pa. 211, 52 Atl. 205, is also pressed upon us as a controlling authority for the commonwealth; and it is proper that we should show it is not. We have heretofore said of it that it was decided upon its own peculiar facts and is not to be stretched. Shoenberger's Estate, 221 Pa. 112, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 290, 128 Am. St. Rep. 737, 70 Atl. 579. One of the two reasons given by the court below in Lewis's Estate for holding that it was liable to collateral inheritance tax here was that, as the executor and legatees had requested and consented that a complete administration and distripersonal property situated elsewhere, but owned by a resident, and to prescribe who shall and who shall not be capable of taking it.

And so the words "being in this state in the statute imposing a collateral inheritance tax upon 'all assets . . . of every kind, passing from any person who may die seised and possessed thereof, being in this state,'" refer to the property, and not to the person; and property actually within the state, although for other purposes it may be treated as constructively elsewhere, because of the owner's nonresidence, is subject to the tax. Ibid.

In State ex rel. Floyd v. District Ct. 41 Mont. 357, 109 Pac. 438, it was held that the tax was payable in respect of the personal property in Montana, notwithstanding that the property was not to be distributed in Montana, but was to be turned over to foreign representatives for distribution at the domicile of the decedent.

In some instances, either because of the terms of the particular statute, or upon considerations of policy, it has been held that the tax is laid exclusively according to the principle of actual situs, to the exclusion of the principle of domicile, and in this view, of course, the personal property of a nonresident if actually within the jurisdiction is subject to the tax; at least, if not present for a merely temporary purpose.

This was the view taken of the Pennsylvania statute at the time of the decision in Com. v. Smith, 5 Pa. 142, holding that a legacy in a will of a person domiciled in a foreign country was subject to the tax so far as it was payable out of personal property in Pennsylvania. This statute was subsequently amended so as to cover property without the jurisdiction belonging to one domiciled within the jurisdiction, but the provision covering the property within the jurisdiction belonging to a nonresident was not changed.

And so in Alvany v. Powell, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 51, holding that personal property in North Carolina belonging to the estate of a nonresident was subject to the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tax under the North Carolina statute providing that a tax shall be levied and collected upon the value of all personal property or goods bequeathed or distributed to the class of persons named, the court took the position that the tax was laid according to the principle of actual situs, and not according to the fiction that the situs follows the domicile.

Because of ambiguities in the language of the New York act of 1885, it was held that no tax was exacted thereby in respect of property passing by will or intestacy from a nonresident of the state. Re Enston (People v. Sherwood) 113 N. Y. 174, 3 L.R.A. 464, 21 N. E. 87.

But by the act of 1887, the earlier act was amended so as to subject to the tax "all property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same, while a resident of this state, or, if such decedent was not a resident at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state." The amendment removed any question as to the liability to pay the tax in respect of personal property within the state belonging to a nonresident testator,—except that arising from the omission about to be referred to: but the statute, as amended, was still ambiguous in respect of property within the state belonging to the estate of a nonresident intestate. However, in Re Romaine, 127 N. Y. 80, 12 L.R.A. 401, 27 N. E. 759, the court construed the amended act to apply to personal property within the state belonging to a nonresident decedent, whether he died testate or intestate. (But see infra, II., as to 1911 amendment of New York statute.)

Even after the act of 1887, and before the omission was cured by the act of 1892, the surrogate had no jurisdiction to impose the tax in respect of the personal property of a nonresident unless he owned real estate within the state. And it was held in Re Embury, 19 App. Div. 214, 45 N. Y. Supp. 881, affirmed in 154 N. Y. 746, 49 N. E. 1096, where the decedent, a nonresident, died after the act of 1887, but before the act of 1892, and the executors had removed bution of the whole estate comprehended in the account should be had in Luzerne county, under Pennsylvania laws, by a Pennsylvania court, and not, as is usual in mere ancillary accounting, transmitted to a foreign forum, they could not have the benefit of this departure from the general rule without taking that benefit with its burdens. It was for this reason that the decree was affirmed.

The first reason given by the court below was not sustainable, as clearly appears from what was decided in Lines's Estate, 155 Pa. 378, 26 Atl. 728. Lines died in the city of Easton, and had been domiciled there for thirty years before his death. In 1887 he executed and delivered to the Union Trust Company, a New York corporation doing business there, a deed of trust, which included 118 mortgage bonds, of $1,000 each, issued by a Missouri railroad company, and 281 shares of the capital stock of a New Jersey corporation doing business there. These securities were delivered to the trustee, and, on the books of the two corporations, were transferred to "the Union Trust Company of New York, in trust for Jesse Lines and others." According to the provisions of the deed, the trustee was to hold the securities, collect the interest and income thereof, and pay the same to Lines during his natural life, and, upon his decease, divide the bonds and stocks by transferring one half of them to certain of his nephews and nieces and the other half to all the personal property from the state before the passage of the latter act, they could not be held liable for the tax. And in Re Pettit, 65 App. Div. 30, 72 N. Y. Supp. 469, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 654, 63 N. E. 1121, it was held that personal property within the state, belonging to the estate of a nonresident who died before the act of 1892, was not liable to the tax, although the property was not removed from the state until after that act became effective.

The equal protection of the laws was not denied by the imposition of the inheritance tax provided for by N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 713, upon certain bequests of personalty by a nonresident decedent owning both real and personal property within the state because, under that statute, as construed by the state courts, the tax could not be collected if the only property belonging to the decedent situated within the state was personalty. Beers v. Glynn, 211 U. S. 477, 53 L. ed. 290, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186.

The question as to when, under varying circumstances, personal property belonging to the estate of a nonresident will be deemed to be within the state so as to become subject to the payment of the tax, will be subsequently treated.

Reciprocity.

The Connecticut statute is framed upon the theory that domicile should be the exclusive criterion in laying the tax, but adds to the force of example the influence of reciprocity by permitting the exaction of the tax in respect of personal property within the state belonging to the estate of a nonresident, but foregoing its collection if the decedent was domiciled in a state which does not collect the tax from personal property therein, belonging to the estates of Connecticut decedents. (See Gallup's Appeal, 76 Conn. 617, 57 Atl. 699.)

The principle of reciprocity is also adopted by the Kansas statute which provides that an inheritance tax shall not be exacted where a similar tax has been paid in the state of the decedent's residence, "provided the law of that state contains a like exemption." That provision was held in State ex rel. Dawson v. Davis, 88 Kan. 849, 129 Pac. 1197, to apply in case of intangible property (stock in a Kansas corporation) belonging to the estate of a New York decedent, since the exemption under the New York statutes (referring to the amended act of 1911, see supra, l. a) is like that of the Kansas statute so far as intangible property—the kind of property in question—is concerned, though, in the respect that it does not extend to tangible property, less liberal than the Kansas exemption.

English cases.

The English courts, contrary to the position now generally prevailing in this country, have taken the view that the legacy and succession duties, though the acts are broad enough in terms to cover all legacies or successions without reference to domicile or situs, are, so far as concerns personal property, laid solely according to the principle of domicile, and that therefore the tax is not payable in respect of personal property situated in England, belonging to the estate of one who was domiciled out of England. Thomson v. Advocate General, 12 Clark & F. 1, 13 Sim. 153, 9 Jur. 217; Wallace v. Atty. Gen. L. R. 1 Ch. 1, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 124, 11 Jur. N. S. 937, 13 L. T. N. S. 480, 14 Week. Rep. 116; Re Bruce, 2 Crompt. & J. 436, 1 L. J. Exch. N. S. 153, 2 Tyrw. 475.

And so, personal assets situated out of England at the time of the death of a nonresident, though subsequently remitted to England, are not subject to the tax. Atty. Gen. v. Jackson, 2 Clark & F. 48, 3 Tyrw. 982; Logan v. Fairlie, 2 Sim. & Stu. 291, 3 L. J. Ch. 152; Arnold v. Arnold, 2 Myl. & C. 256, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 218, 1 Jur. 255.

The principle that the succession tax is imposed only on movables which the successor claims under or by virtue of the law of the jurisdiction imposing the tax was applied in Lambe v. Manuel [1903] A. C. 68, 72 L. J. P. C. N. S. 17, 87 L. T. N. S. 460, 19 Times L. R. 68, to the Quebec succession a putative son. The trust deed contained a clause which gave to Lines the right and power to alter, change, modify, or revoke the disposition to be made of the property, after his decease; but this right was never exercised. The trustee collected and paid over to Lines the income of the trust securities during his life, and after his decease, divided and distributed the corpus of the estate, consisting of the said securities, to beneficiaries entitled thereto according to the provisions of the deed. In holding that the commonwealth had a right to collect a collateral inheritance tax on these securities, it was said: "Mr. Lines was not only the beneficial owner of the securities prior to and at the time of his decease, but, under the reserved power of modification, revocation, etc., he had absolute control of the disposition to be made of the securities upon his decease. At any time prior thereto, he could have modified or revoked the trust in favor of the beneficiaries named in the deed. It is true the legal title to the securities was in the trust company, but aside from mere compensation for its services, as custodian of the property, the company had no beneficial interest therein.

duty act providing that all transmissions, owing to death, of property movable and immovable in the province, shall be liable to the tax; and it was accordingly held that the tax was not payable in respect of shares of stock in a Quebec bank belonging to the estate of a decedent who was domiciled in the province of Ontario. It does not appear where the stock was kept.

There is, however, an exception to the English rule when the final disposition of the property of a nonresident is superseded by an English trust, so that the final devolution of the property at the termination of the trust estate takes place by virtue of the law of England, and not by the law of the testator's domicile. In such case, upon the devolution of the property at the termination of the trust, it becomes liable to the succession duty. Atty. Gen. v. Campbell, L. R. 5 H. L. 524, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 611, 21 Week. Rep. 34, note; Re Wallop, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 351, 1 De G. J. & S. 656, 5 New Reports, 679, 10 Jur. N. S. 328, 10 L. T. N. S. 174, 12 Week. Rep. 587; Re Capdevielle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 985, 33 L. J. Exch. N. S. 306, 12 Week. Rep. 110, 10 Jur. N. S. 1155; Re Smith, 12 Week. Rep. 933, 10 L. T. N. S. 598; Re Cigala, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 351, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 166, 38 L. T. N. S. 439, 26 Week. Rep. 257; Re Lovelace, 4 DeG. & J. 341, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 489, 5 Jur. N. S. 694, 7 Week. Rep. 575.

So, where a foreigner gave to an English company formed for that purpose certain stock and other securities in trust to pay him the income for life, and after his death to apply the property, subject to the provisions of the deed, for certain benevolent purposes, it was held that upon the grantor's death the property became subject to the English succession tax, although the principal part of it was composed of foreign securities situated abroad, the documents of title being also abroad, a small proportion only of the property subject to the deed being in England. Atty. Gen. v. Jewish Colonization Asso. [1901] 1 K. B. 123, 70 I. J. Q. B. N. S. 101, 65 J. P. 21, 49 Week. Rep. 230, 83 L. T. N. S. 561, 17 Times L. R. 106.

The principle established in England that legacy and succession duties are laid solely according to the principle of domicile has no application to probate duties, or estate duties which supersede the probate duty so far as they cover the same ground.

The reason for the distinction, as declared by the Lord Chancellor in Winans v. Atty. Gen. [1910] A. C. 27, 101 L. T. N. S. 754, 26 Times L. R. 133, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 156, 54 Sol. Jo. 133, 47 Scot. L. R. 593, is that legacy and succession duties fall upon the benefit received by survivors on their accession upon a death, while the estate duty or probate duty falls upon the property passing upon death, apart from its destination.

b. Tangible personal property.

Obviously, unless a particular jurisdiction adopts the English view that the succession tax is laid solely according to the principle of domicile, tangible personal property belonging to the estate of a nonresident, if within the jurisdiction, will be subject to the tax; at least, unless it was there merely for a temporary purpose.

Thus, tangible personal property in Illinois, belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, is subject to the tax. People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313.

So, money of a nonresident in the hands of her New York attorney is subject to the tax. Re Burr, 16 Misc. 89, 38 N. Y. Supp. 811.

c. Securities within state for investment.

The New York decisions cited in this subdivision were rendered before the amendment of 1911 referred to supra, I. a.

Again, assuming that the particular jurisdiction is not committed to the English doctrine, it is clear that the tax is payable in respect of money or securities belonging to a nonresident, but kept within the jurisdiction in connection with a local business, or for the purposes of investment and reinvestment, since, under such circumstances, the property would have a local situs, even for the purpose of property taxes. (See notes in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 637, and 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 493.)

Thus, stock, bonds, and other evidence of indebtedness belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, but which he had kept in the hands of an agent in Pennsylvania

In any proper sense of the term the securities were the personal property of Mr. Lines. They were his to enjoy during his lifetime, and his to dispose of, in any manner he saw fit at any time prior to his decease. He chose to leave the trust in favor of the beneficiaries unaltered and unrevoked, and, as he intended, it took effect, in enjoyment, immediately after his decease. Moreover, the securities were that kind of personal property, the situs of which follows the owner."

If Lines had been domiciled in New York, and the securities had been held for him by a trustee here, they would not, on the correct reasoning of Mr. Chief Justice Sterrett, have been liable to collateral inheritance tax here. The estate of the Countess de Noailles in the hands of the trustees here is more than the converse of the Lines estate. The deed of trust was subject to her revocation at any time, and the entire fund, made up largely of accumulations, did not pass to any beneficiaries named in the deed, but directly to the ancillary administrators of her estate.

Decree affirmed, at appellant's costs.

for the purpose of transacting business with them, are, at least to the extent of "investment and reinvestment," subject to the payment of the tax. Lewis's Estate, 203 Pa. 211, 52 Atl. 205, distinguishing Orcutt's Appeal, 97 Pa. 179, on the ground that the securities there were not in the hands of the agent for the purpose of transacting business, but merely for temporary safe-keeping. In the Lewis case, it appeared that the executor and legatees had requested and consented that the complete administration and distribution of the whole estate comprehended in the account should be had in Pennsylvania and by a Pennsylvania court, and not, as is usual in mere ancillary accounting, transmitted to a foreign forum. And this agreement was urged by counsel and apparently regarded by the court as an additional reason why the property was subject to the tax, though apparently the result would have been the same in any case.

So, property of a nonresident, consisting of stock in a national bank doing business in Michigan, an executory land contract in relation to land in that state, and notes secured by mortgages upon land in that state, which were kept at an office in Michigan for the purposes of deposit and reinvestment, is property within the state and subject to the inheritance tax. Re Stanton, 142 Mich. 491, 105 N. W. 1122. In view of the decision in the subsequent case of Re Merriam (Bradley v. Merriam) 147 Mich. 630, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1104, 118 Am. St. Rep. 561, 11 N. W. 196, 11 Ann. Cas. 119, it would seem that the mere fact that the notes were secured by mortgages upon land in Michigan would have been sufficient to subject them to the tax, even if the securities had not been physically within the state.

The judgment of the circuit court which was affirmed in Re Stanton, supra, determined that a certificate of capital stock of an Illinois corporation, belonging to the estate of a decedent domiciled in New York, was not property within the state, within the meaning of the Michigan inheritance tax law, although the certificate, together with other securities, was, at the time of the decedent's death, in an office maintained by her in Detroit, apparently for the purposes of collection, deposit, and reinvestment. The appeal, however, was by the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) estate only, and therefore there was no complaint of the decision on this point.

A bond belonging to the estate of a nonresident, secured upon real property in New York, and in the hands of a New York agent at the time of the decedent's death, is subject to the tax. Re Burr, 16 Misc. 89, 38 N. Y. Supp. 811.

The decision in Re Enston (People v. Sherwood) 113 N. Y. 174, 3 L.R.A. 464, 21 N. E. 87, that bonds secured by mortgages upon real property in New York, and promissory notes and bonds of municipal corporations, and stock and bonds of foreign corporations, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, were not subject to the tax, although they were apparently within the state for investment, was under the act of 1885, which was held not, under any circumstances, to embrace property of a nonresident.

A similar decision in Re Tulane, 51 Hun, 213, 4 N. Y. Supp. 36, was also under the act of 1885.

As to whether a tax is payable at the domicile of the decedent in respect of securities kept in another state for investment, see infra, II.

d. Securities within state for other purposes.

The New York cases cited in this subdivision were decided prior to the amendment of 1911, referred to supra, I. a.

There is more doubt whether securities belonging to a nonresident which are within the state merely for safe-keeping may be regarded as property within the state so as to subject them to the tax. In this connection it is to be observed that as to stock in a domestic corporation, its liability to the tax is not necessarily dependent upon the physical presence of the certificates within the state, and the fact that the corporation in question is a domestic one is, according to the prevailing view, sufficient to subject it to the tax, unless the terms of the statutes are clearly opposed, although there is some conflict on the point. (See notes in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 887, and 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 384.)

In some cases the courts have apparently made a distinction between bonds of foreign corporations and bonds of domestic corporations belonging to a nonresident, but within the jurisdiction for safe-keeping.

Thus, under the Illinois statute, substantially adopted from the New York statute, it has been held that stocks and bonds of an Illinois corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident, but habitually kept in a safe-deposit box in Illinois for safe-keeping, were subject to the tax, but that stocks and bonds of foreign corporations also in such box were not subject to the tax. People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313. This decision, which, it will be observed, is opposed to the decision in Re Whiting, infra, so far as the stocks and bonds of foreign corporations are concerned, was largely influenced by New York decisions which were rendered before the adoption of the Illinois statute, the decision in the Whiting Case having been rendered after that time.

In People v. Griffith, supra, the case of Buck v. Beach, 206 U. S. 392, 51 L. ed. 1106, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712, 11 Ann. Cas. 732, was relied on as supporting the contention that Illinois could not exact a succession tax in respect of securities belonging to a nonresident, which were in Illinois merely for the purpose of safe-keeping, but the court quoted from the opinion in that case as follows: "Cases arising under collateral inheritance or succession tax acts have been cited as affording foundation for the right to tax as herein asserted. The foundation upon which such acts rest is different from that which exists where the assessment is levied upon property. The succession or inheritance tax is not a tax on property . . . and therefore the decisions arising under such inheritance tax cases are not in point."

Prior to the decision in the Whiting Case, infra, there was some doubt in New York whether the mere presence within the state for safe-keeping of securities belonging to the estate of a nonresident was sufficient to subject them to the tax, even after the amendment of 1887. After that amendment, it was held in Re Romaine, 127 N. Y. 80, 12 L.R.A. 401, 27 N. E. 759, that the property belonging to a nonresident, representing corporate stocks and bonds, a mortgage upon New York real estate, and pass books showing deposits in various banks in New York, all of the securities being at the time of the decedent's death, and for about three years prior thereto, in a box in a safety deposit company in New York, were subject to the tax. It does not appear, however, whether the stocks and bonds were of foreign or domestic corporations, though, for the reasons suggested below that would not seem to be material so far as the bonds were concerned.

The decision in Re Schermerhorn, 50 Misc. 233, 100 N. Y. Supp. 480, that United States bonds in the state, belonging to the estate of a nonresident who died in 1891, and thus before the passage of the act of 1892, which was held to exempt such bonds, were not subject to the tax, was upon the ground that, prior to the enactment of the statutory construction law of 1892, the "bonds" themselves did not represent property.

The decisions in Re James, 144 N. Y. 6, 38 N. E. 961, that stock of a foreign corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, on deposit in the state at the time of the decedent's death, was not subject to the tax; and in Re Gibbes, 84 App. Div. 510, 83 N. Y. Supp. 53, affirmed in 176 N. Y. 565, 68 N. E. 1117, holding the same as to bonds of foreign corporations left on deposit in a New York bank, though rendered after the amendatory act of 1892, were controlled by the act of 1887, the decedents having died before the act of 1892; and the court in the Gibbes Case noted that under the amendatory act of 1892, construed in the light of the statutory construction law, the court of appeals had held that bonds of a foreign corporation, left within the state by a nonresident, are taxable. (Referring to the Whiting Case.)

Under the New York statute as amended in 1892, bonds of a foreign corporation, as well as bonds and certificates of stock of domestic corporations, when deposited in a safety deposit vault within the state, although owned by a nonresident, were held to be "property within the state" and subject to the tax, although, so far as appears, they were present merely for safe-keeping. Re Whiting, 150 N. Y. 27, 34 L.R.A. 232, 55 Am. St. Rep. 640, 44 N. E. 715. Gray and Haight, JJ., dissented as to the bonds of the foreign corporation, upon the ground that the securities in question had no situs in New York. While, as above suggested, the result as to the certificates of stock in the domestic corporation would doubtless have been the same even if the certificates had not been within the state, it is clear that the liability of the other securities to the tax was dependent upon their physical presence within the state. If other evidence of this were needed it would be furnished by the holding at the same term of court in Re Bronson, 150 N. Y. 1, 34 L.R.A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632, 44 N. E. 707 (a case only incidentally in point in this note), that bonds of a domestic corporation which are in another state, in possession of a nonresident, are not "property within the state" within the meaning of the transfer tax act. If this is true of bonds of a domestic corporation, it is a fortiori true of bonds of a foreign corporation. (See, however, supra, I. a, as to amendment of New York statute in 1911.)

So, promissory notes belonging to the estate of a nonresident, due from residents and nonresidents, and secured by mortgages on property in the state, the notes themselves being in a safety box in the city of New York at the time of the decedent's death, are liable to the tax. Re Tiffany, 143 App. Div. 327, 128 N. Y. Supp. 106, affirmed in 202 N. Y. 550, 95 N. E. 1140.

The court distinguished Buck v. Beach, 206 U. S. 392, 51 L. ed. 1106, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712, 11 Ann. Cas. 732, upon the ground that that related to a property tax, and not to a succession tax. That it was the fact of the physical presence of the note within the state, and not the residence of some of the makers within the state, that was held to subject them to the tax, is apparent from the statement at the close of the opinion that the residence of the debtor cannot change the character of the property, or determine whether it is liable to an inheritance tax.

A negotiable promissory note or a bond, though belonging to the estate of a nonresident and secured by a mortgage upon land in another state, is liable to the tax if located in New York at time of decedent's death. Re Gibbs, 60 Misc. 645, 113 N. Y. Supp. 939. The particular circumstances of the presence of the securities in New York do not appear.

But stock in a foreign corporation, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, is not subject to the transfer tax law of New York, merely because the transfer agent of the corporation does business within that state. Dunham v. City Trust Co. 115 App. Div. 584, 101 N. Y. Supp. 87, affirmed without opinion in 193 N. Y. 642, 86 N. E. 1123.

The decision in Re Pullman, 46 App. Div. 574, 62 N. Y. Supp. 395, that stocks and bonds of New York corporations, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, the title to which was in New York creditors, who held them in that state as collateral, were not subject to the tax, was not upon the ground that they were not property within the state, but upon the ground that the creditors' security should not be diminished "at this time." The general liability of such securities belonging to the estate of a nonresident, when within the state, was recognized.

In Re Fearing, 200 N. Y. 340, 93 N. E. 956, holding that bonds secured by mortgages upon real estate in New York, passing under the will of a nonresident, were not subject to the tax, the bonds were not within the state, and the attempt to reach them was because of the location within the state of the property by which they were secured. Upon that point, see notes in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1104 and 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 784.

In Re Bishop, 82 App. Div. 112, 81 N. Y. Supp. 474, reversing 40 Misc. 64, 81 N. Y. Supp. 262, holding that stock in a foreign corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident was not subject to the tax, it does not appear where the certificates of stock were held, but, as it was assumed that the question whether the stock was subject to the tax turned entirely on the question whether the decedent was domiciled in New York or elsewhere, it would seem that the certificates were not in New York.

Railroad bonds, bonds of municipalities outside of Massachusetts, and United States bonds, all of which were completely transferable by delivery and commonly bought and sold in the market in Massachusetts, when within that state, although belonging to the estate of a nonresident, are property within the state within the Massachusetts 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

statute subjecting to the succession tax "all property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, and any interest therein, whether belonging to inhabitants of the commonwealth or not, and whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the laws of the commonwealth regulating intestate succession. . . . Callahan v. Woodbridge, 171 Mass. 595, 51 N. E. 176. The report in this case does not show under what circumstances the evidences of the obligations in question were within the commonwealth; the mere fact that they were there seems to have been regarded as subjecting them to the tax. The court expressed a doubt as to whether a note and mortgage upon land in another state, which seemed also to have been within the state, were subject to the tax; but it was not necessary to decide the point.

But the fact that United States bonds have been intrusted by the testator, a nonresident, temporarily for safe-keeping with a trust company in the state, does not subject them to the inheritance tax, where the testator was a nonresident. Orcutt's Appeal, 77 Pa. 179.

e. Bank deposits.

In this connection attention is called to the fact that the New York cases cited in this division were rendered before the amendment of the inheritance tax law (see supra, I. a).

Though a general bank deposit, strictly speaking, represents an indebtedness merely, it is, unless the statute declares otherwise, generally regarded as the equivalent of the money for which it stands so far as succession taxes are concerned. And so, whatever may be the rule as to an ordinary indebtedness from a resident to a nonresident (a question not within the scope of this note), it is very generally held in jurisdictions which adopt the view that the tax is payable in respect of personal property of a nonresident within the jurisdiction, that general deposits in local banks to the credit of nonresidents are subject to the tax.

Thus, money of a nonresident on deposit in an Illinois bank is subject to the Illinois transfer tax act. People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313.

In Re Houdayer, 150 N. Y. 37, 34 L.R.A. 235, 55 Am. St. Rep. 642, 44 N. E. 718, holding that money of a nonresident, deposited by him in a bank within the state, although commingled with trust funds in an account opened by him as trustee, constitutes property "within the state" within the act of 1892, and thus liable to the payment of the tax, the court said that while technically the relation of creditor and debtor existed, practically the decedent had his money in the bank, and could come and get it when he wanted it.

So, deposits in a New York trust company and a New York bank, belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, were held in Re Blackstone to be subject to the New York inheritance tax law. Re Blackstone, 69 App. Div. 127, 74 N. Y. Supp. 508, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 682, 64 N. E. 1118. The decision of the court of appeals was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277. The latter court, however, merely passed upon the question of constitutional power, and not upon the question of statutory construction. Even before the decision in the Blackstone Case, it was held in Re Clark, 2 Connoly, 183, 9 N. Y. Supp. 444, that bank accounts to the credit of a nonresident were property within the state, within the meaning of the act of 1887, and so liable to the tax.

In Re Myers, 129 N. Y. Supp. 194, holding that the deposit by a nonresident in a New York trust company was liable to the tax, the court said that the contention that the deposit was in New York temporarily, for the purpose of investment, and therefore not subject to the tax, was untenable, as the property was on deposit for nearly two months before the date of the decedent's death.

So, a deposit in a New York savings bank, belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent, is subject to the tax. Re Burr, 16 Misc. 89, 38 N. Y. Supp. 811. But see contra, Allen v. Philadelphia Sav. Fund Soc. Fed. Cas. No. 234, which, however, relied on Re Kintzing, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 217, Fed. Cas. No. 7,833, which merely held that choses in action against the state, its corporations or inhabitants, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, were not subject to the tax under the Pennsylvania statute. The Allen Case failed to observe the distinction between an ordinary indebtedness and a bank deposit.

And a deposit to the credit of a nonresident owner was held to be within the state and subject to the tax in Re Stanton, 142 Mich. 491, 105 N. W. 1122. In this case, however, the decedent had an office in Michigan where her securities were kept for the purpose of collection, deposit, and reinvestment.

In Re Daly, 100 App. Div. 373, 91 N. Y. Supp. 858, affirmed without opinion in 182 N. Y. 524, 74 N. E. 1116, under the rule of the Houdayer and Blackstone Cases in relation to bank deposits, an inheritance tax was held payable in respect of a special deposit to the credit of a nonresident, representing the amount of a check drawn to his order, by a solvent resident of New York in payment of an entire indebtedness, only part of which was due, it appearing that the check, which was delivered to and indorsed by his secretary, was placed in the special account because the payee was not in a condition to transact business, it further appearing that he died without having affirmed or disaffirmed the transaction, but that the money was received by his executors as part of his estate. This decision was rendered upon the assumption that if the payee had disaffirmed the transaction, the money in the bank would have been payable to the drawer. A majority of the court were of the opinion that even treating the money as an indebtedness of the drawer of the check, it would be subject to the payment of the inheritance tax, citing in this connection the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277. This, however, suggests a point that is beyond the scope of the present note.

Money to the credit of a nonresident with a firm of New York bankers and brokers, representing a balance on the closing out of stock transactions conducted for him, and which was subject to his control, and payable on demand, or to be used for the purchase of stocks, as he might direct, the brokers in the meantime having the right to use the same in their business, paying interest thereon, was held in Re Daly, 100 App. Div. 373, 91 N. Y. Supp. 858, to be subject to the payment of the inheritance tax under the rule announced in Re Houdayer and Re Blackstone in relation to deposits. A majority of the court were of the opinion that it would be liable even if treated as debts in the ordinary sense. The latter ground, however, is not within the scope of this note.

But in Re Leopold, 35 Misc. 369, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1032, money of a nonresident, temporarily on deposit in New York to the credit of a syndicate formed for the purpose of purchasing the stock of a corporation, was held not subject to the tax, although the nonresident died before the transaction was completed.

And an indebtedness due from a nonresident to a nonresident is not subject to the tax, although the debtor did business in New York as a banker, and the debt is described in the inventory as "balance of account with bankers." Re Bentley, 31 Misc. 656, 66 N. Y. Supp. 95.

The decision in Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Crenshaw, 120 Tenn. 606, 110 S. W. 1017, that a deposit in a Tennessee bank to the credit of a nonresident decedent was not subject to the tax, was not upon the ground that the deposit did not represent property within the state, but upon the ground that, by the law of Kentucky, where the decedent was domiciled, the mother was the sole distributee, and that the interest passing to her is not subject to the tax under the Tennessee statute; and it was so held notwithstanding that, by the law of Tennessee, part of the estate would have gone to the decedent's brother, and would have been subject to the tax.

As to whether the tax is payable at the domicile of decedent in respect of deposits in a bank in another jurisdiction, see infra, II.

f. Property held subject to trust.

As to liability of personal property within the jurisdiction, subject to a trust created by a nonresident, see also supra as to the English cases in relation to such trusts.

The maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam is applied in RE HELENA with the result of denying the liability to pay the tax in respect of security belonging to the estate of a nonresident, held, at the time of her death, by trustees in Pennsylvania, subject to a deed of trust revocable by decedent at any time prior to her death, the trustees having no beneficial interest therein other than their right to compensation, even though the legal title to the securities may have been in their names.

However, securities consisting of stock trust certificates and certificates of stock transferred by revocable deed of trust of a nonresident to a Pennsylvania trust company, with discretionary power in the trustee "to sell the same and reinvest the proceeds in good securities," in trust to pay the income to the grantor for life, and after her death, to pay a certain designated portion of the principal to collaterals, were held in Singer v. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 270, to be liable to the inheritance tax upon the death of the grantor, it not appearing that ancillary letters had been granted, nor alleged that the fund produced by the sale of the securities after the death of the testatrix was needed or had been claimed by executors for payment of debts, but, upon the other hand, it appearing that the trustees had paid over the fund, less the collateral inheritance tax, to the persons named in the deed of trust.

In Com. v. Kuhn, 43 Phila. Leg. Int. 280, the decision that stocks and other securities which the decedent transferred in her lifetime in trust were subject to the tax under the Pennsylvania statute, notwithstanding that after the creation of the trust the decedent became a resident of another state, was upon the ground that the situs of the property subject to the trust was established in Pennsylvania by the execution of the trust instrument, and was not affected by the change of domicile subsequently there-to.

As to whether a tax is payable at the domicile in respect of securities held in trust in another jurisdiction, see infra, II.

g. Interest of one decedent in estate of another.

It is to be observed that the cases cited in this subdivision assume that the property in question was subject to the tax as part of the estate of the original decedent, either because he was a resident of the jurisdiction, or the property was within the jurisdiction; and they deal merely with the question whether the property was subject to another tax as a part of the estate of the second decedent.

The interest of a nonresident at the time of his death in the estate of his deceased brother, a resident, within the state, consisting of bank stock and other stocks, bonds and cash, is property within the state, subject to the Maryland collateral inheritance tax. State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82.

The interest which a nonresident took by inheritance from a resident of Pennsylvania, the property being in the hands of a guardian of the former, residing in Pennsylvania, is subject to the Pennsylvania inheritance tax, upon her death. Com. v. Brenner, 2 Legal Gaz. 413.

A fund inherited by a nonresident decedent shortly before his death, from a decedent who was domiciled in Pennsylvania, the fund never having been out of Pennsylvania, and being paid over by the administrator of one estate to the administrator of the other, is subject to the inheritance tax of Pennsylvania. Weaver's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 260.

But in Re Phipps, 77 Hun, 325, 28 N. Y. Supp. 330, affirmed in 143 N. Y. 641, 37 N. E. 823, where a nonresident who was a residuary legatee under the will of a resident, died while the resident's estate was unsettled, his interest was held not liable to the tax as a part of his estate, the legacy never having been paid to him, nor having been in the condition to be paid to him prior to his death. It does not appear where the property applicable to the residuary bequest was situated. It appears that a tax had been paid in respect of such property as a part of the estate of the resident, but of course the domicile of the original testator within the state would have subjected it to such tax, irrespective of its actual location. The court treated the right of the nonresident at the time of his death as a mere chose in action, and invoked the principle that the situs of a debt, even for the purposes of a succession tax, is at the domicile of the creditor, and not at the domicile of the debtor. That general principle is not within the scope of this note, but is considered in the note in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 953. It may be remarked, however, that the United States Supreme Court in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, seems to take the view that, for the purposes of a succession tax, at least, the situs of a debt, not evidenced by a negotiable instrument, may be regarded as at the domicile of the debtor.

And in Re Zefita, 167 N. Y. 280, 60 N. E. 598, where a daughter, a nonresident of New York, died before any accounting by the executors under the will of her mother, also a nonresident, the residuary legatee of the daughter was held liable to the payment of a transfer tax in respect of securities actually situated in New York, in which the daughter had a remainder interest subject to the life estate of her mother, and also in respect of the interest to which the daughter succeeded under a power of appointment exercised by her mother's will; but it was held that the estate of the daughter was not, at the time of the attempted appraisal, subject to the tax in respect of her residuary legacy in her mother's estate, that estate being still unsettled. In the appellate division. 44 App. Div. 340, 60 N. Y. Supp. 927, the court took occasion to state that it was not called upon to determine whether the property, after it shall have been paid over by the executor of the mother to the executor of the daughter, must pay a transfer tax in his hands before it could be delivered to the residuary legatee of the daughter. There is a suggestion of a similar limitation in the statement of the court of appeals, that it is obvious that, at the time of the appraisal, neither the executor under the will of the daughter, nor her residuary legatee, was liable to pay a tax on the amount of an unascertained claim against the estate of the mother.

So, the interest as residuary legatee under the will of her husband (a nonresident), of a widow (also a nonresident), who died before the probate of his will, was not "property within the state," so as to subject to the inheritance tax, as a part of her estate, securities belonging to the husband that were within the state at the time of the death of both of them, but were subsequently removed to the domicile and there paid over to the executors by her husband's executors, in performance of the residuary legacy. Re Lord, 111 App. Div. 152, 97 N. Y. Supp. 553, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 549, 79 N. E. 1110. The decision was upon the ground that the widow, at the time of her death, had no right to the particular property, but merely a right to the balance of the proceeds of the husband's property after the payment of his debts and the expenses of administration. This case, so far as it involved property which passed to the widow under the exercise of a power of appointment by the husband, is set out in the note in 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 240.

But in Re Clinch, 99 App. Div. 298, 90 N. Y. Supp. 923, affirmed in 180 N. Y. 300, 73 N. E. 35, it was held that stocks in a New York corporation, bonds, etc., passing to the decedent, a nonresident, under the will of his father, who was also a nonresident, the securities being in the hands of the executor of the father's estate in New York, were subject to the transfer tax after they had been set apart for the son's estate, and delivered over to his executors, notwithstanding that the executor of the father's estate had not accounted and had made no distribution of his estate at the time of the son's death. It was said in the opinion of the appellate division that it was not claimed, and, in view of the New York decisions, it could not well have been claimed, but that property of the kind in question is taxable under the New York law, but that the contention was based on the fact that the interest of the son in his father's estate had not been definitely determined and the property reduced to possession prior to the son's death. The appellate division conceded that prior to the time of the actual settlement of the father's estate and transfer of the securities, no tax could be imposed, but said that the property became subject to the tax when the father's estate was settled.

in the estate of one who was domiciled in another jurisdiction, or had personal property in such jurisdiction, see infra, 11.

h. Miscellaneous.

Personal property belonging to the estate of a nonresident, and which, at the time of his death, was not in Pennsylvania, is not subject to a succession tax there, notwithstanding that, as directed by the will, it passed into the hands of Pennsylvania executors. Shoenberger's Estate, 221 Pa. 112, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 290, 128 Am. St. Rep. 737, 70 Atl. 579. But the provision of the Pennsylvania statute is to the effect that all property "situated within his state, whether the person or persons dying seised thereof be domiciled within or without the state," shall be subject to the tax. The court said that the domicile of the testator at the time of his death was the situs of his personal estate, and that situs, and not what he directed to be done with his estate, was the sole test of the right to tax it.

The interest of a nonresident in a limited partnership association whose business and property, real and personal, were in Pennsylvania, is within that state, within the meaning of the Pennsylvania inheritance act of 1887, declaring that all estates situated within the state, whether the person dying seised thereof be domiciled within or out of the state, shall be subject to the tax. Small's Estate, 151 Pa. 1, 25 Atl. 23, 28. So, shares of a nonresident in a joint stock association having its principal place of business in New York were held in Re Willmer, 153 App. Div. 804, 138 N. Y. Supp. 649, subject to a transfer tax upon that proportion of their value represented by property within the state.

So, shares of stock, so called, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, in "trust," the place of business of which is in Massachusetts, and all of the property of which, both real and personal, is in that state, the legal title to the property of the trusts being in the trustees, who have control over the property, with power to invest the whole personal property and distribute earnings among the shareholders, but no power to bind the shareholders personally,—represent property "within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth" within the meaning of the Massachusetts inheritance tax law, and are subject to the tax. Peabody v. The Treasurer, 215 Mass. 129, 102 N. E. 435.

In Del Busto's Estate, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 289, holding that choses in action consisting of stocks of bonds of Pennsylvania corporations, and cash awarded to the accountant by the adjudication of the account of the decedent's deceased partner, were not liable to the Pennsylvania tax under the act of 1887, the court seems to have been of the opinion that only tangible personal property belonging to a nonresident could have a situs in the state.

In Re Hillman, 116 App. Div. 186, 101

N. Y. Supp. 640, bonds of a foreign corporation which, after the death of the non-resident decedent, were apportioned to his estate, pursuant to an agreement for the sale in consideration of such bonds, of the property of a corporation in which he was a stockholder, were held not subject to the tax, although the purchasing company had mortgaged its property to a New York trust company, to secure the bonds in question, they having, however, not been issued at the time of the decedent's death.

II. Personal property of resident's estate physically absent from taxing jurisdiction.

This part of the note being concerned solely with the question whether the physical absence of the property or the evidence thereof will prevent the exaction of a tax in respect thereof, at the decedent's domicile, is not concerned with cases which merely assert the right to exact the tax in respect to various items of property, such as debts due from nonresidents or stocks in foreign corporations, where the question was not affected by the situs or location of the evidence of the obligations. So the question whether property out of the state must be included in fixing exemptions is beyond the scope of the note. (See on that point, note, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024. And see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Taxes," §§ 90-105, on various other questions of collateral interest.)

Although, as subsequently shown, there are some exceptions, it is generally held unless the terms of the statute forbid, that a succession or inheritance tax imposed by the state or country of the decedent's domicile is payable in respect of personal property, at least intangible property, not otherwise exempt, although the evidences thereof are physically absent from the jurisdiction. (The cases cited are subsequently set out in detail.) Keeney v. New York, 222 U. S. 525, 56 L. ed. 299, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1139, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105, affirming 194 N. Y. 281, 87 N. E. 428; Gallup's Appeal, 76 Conn. 617, 57 Atl. 699; Hopkins's Appeal, 77 Conn. 644, 60 Atl. 657; People v. Union Trust Co. 255 Ill. 168, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 99 N. E. 377, Ann. Cas. 1913 D, 514; Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475, 55 N. E. 623; Mann v. Carter, 74 N. H. 345, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150, 68 Atl. 130; Douglas County v. Kountze, 84 Neb. 506, 121 N. W. 593; Re Hartman, 70 N. J. Eq. 664, 62 Atl. 560; Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L.R.A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096; Re Merriam, 141 N. Y. 479, 36 N. E. 503; Re Dingman, 66 App. Div. 228, 72 N. Y. Supp. 694; Re Corning, 3 Misc. 160, 23 N. Y. Supp. 285; Lines's Estate, 155 Pa. 378, 26 Atl. 723; Milliken's Estate, 206 Pa. 149, 55 Atl. 853; Bullen's Estate, 143 Wis. 512, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1114, 128 N. W. 109. And see to the same effect English cases subsequently cited.

This is upon the ground that the devolution of the property is governed by the law of domicile; and generally prevails even in those jurisdictions that hold the tax payable in respect of personal property within the jurisdiction belonging to the estate of a nonresident. As shown in the note in 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150, the resulting double taxation is not obnoxious to any constitutional provision.

Thus, all personal property belonging to the estate of a decedent domiciled in Connecticut, irrespective of its actual situs or location in other states, was held in Gallup's Appeal, 76 Conn. 617, 57 Atl. 699, and Hopkins's Appeal, 77 Conn. 644, 60 Atl. 657, to be subject to the inheritance tax under the Connecticut statute providing that "in all such estates any property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, whether tangible or intangible, and whether belonging to parties in this state or not, which shall pass by will or by the inheritance laws of this state, . . ." shall be liable to the tax. The court took the view that the act was laid in view of the principle that personal property is bequeathed by will, and is descendible by inheritance according to the law of the domicile, and that the disposition of, and succession to, personal property, wherever situated, is to be governed by the laws of the state where the owner had his domicile at the time of his death.

In Hopkins's Appeal, supra, the personal property of a decedent domiciled in Connecticut, which was held liable to the payment of the tax, consisted of cash and credit on deposit in New York; shares of capital stock of corporations organized under the laws of Connecticut, New York, and other states, United States bonds, shares of stock of unincorporated associations, notes of residents of other states than Connecticut, secured by mortgage on land in such states, unsecured notes of residents of other states and bonds of North Carolina,—which securities were kept in New York by the testatrix at the time of her death.

So, in People v. Union Trust Co. 255 Ill. 168, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 99 N. E. 377, Ann. Cas. 1913 D, 514, it was held that personal property belonging to the estate of a decedent who was domiciled in Illinois, consisting of stocks and bonds of a non-Illinois corporation, held at the time of decedent's death in a safety deposit box in California, and a deposit in a California bank, were subject to the tax imposed by the Illinois statute, which, as the court said, was substantially adopted from New York after the decision in Re Swift, infra.

So, bonds and stock of foreign corporations, a certification of indebtedness of a foreign corporation, bonds secured by a mortgage on real estate in New Hampshire, the makers living in New York, and cash on deposit in savings banks in New York,—all of which had been in the hands of the agents in New York of a decedent who was domiciled in Massachusetts,—are property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, within the Massachusetts inheritance tax law, and subject to a tax under it. Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475, 55 N. E. 623. The court alludes to the fact that there had been no administration in New York, but that apparently is not to be regarded as a necessary limitation of the decision.

So, deposits in a foreign savings bank belonging to a resident of the state are property within the jurisdiction of the state, within the meaning of the collateral inheritance tax statute. Mann v. Carter, 74 N. H. 345, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150, 68 Atl. 130. The decision in part rested on the fact that the statute was adopted from Massachusetts, and that a similar construction had been previously placed upon the Massachusetts statute by Frothingham v. Shaw, supra.

And where one domiciled in Nebraska made a voluntary deed of settlement, directing a foreign trustee to hold certain stocks of a Nebraska corporation, paying the profits to the settlor during his life, and upon death, to transfer the stocks to certain beneficiaries, the stocks, upon their transfer to the beneficiaries upon the death of the settlor, were held subject to the transfer tax law of Nebraska, notwithstanding the contention that at the time of the settlor's death they were permanently located outside the limits and without the jurisdiction of the state. Douglas County v. Kountze, 84 Neb. 506, 121 N. W. 593. The court said that the complete devolution of the title must take place under the protection and according to the law of Nebraska, and that the succession is subject to the inheritance tax.

Under a statute substantially identical with the New York statute, it was held in Re Hartman, 70 N. J. Eq. 664, 62 Atl. 560, that personal property belonging to a decedent domiciled in New Jersey was subject to the tax in that state, notwithstanding that it was located in New York, and was subject to the succession tax law of that state. This apparently included both tangible and intangible property.

Under the New York act of 1887, amending the act of 1885, declaring subject to the tax "all property which shall pass by will . . . from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same, while a resident of this state . . ." it was held in Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L.R.A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096, reversing as to this point 64 Hun, 639, that all personal property of a resident decedent, wheresoever situated, whether within or without the state, including tangible personal property situated out of the state, was subject to the tax, since such tax was upon the right of succession. But see supra, I. a., with regard to an amendment in 1911 of the New York statute, which seems to abrogate the effect of this decision so far as tangible personal property is concerned.

Stocks in a foreign corporation, belonging to the estate of a resident of New York, are subject to the inheritance tax law of 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that state. Re Merriam, 141 N. Y. 479, 36 N. E. 505. It does not appear where the certificates were held.

In Re Keeney, 194 N. Y. 281, 87 N. E. 428, affirmed in 222 U. S. 525, 56 L. ed. 299, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1139, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105, where stocks and bonds had been transferred upon a trust to pay the income to the decedent during her life, and disposing of the same after her death, an objection to the tax upon the ground that the property at the time of the testator's death was in another state, with the legal title in a trustee, was answered by the statement that the liability accrued at the time the trust was created, and that it was not claimed that the decedent was not then a resident of the state, or that the property was not then within the state.

Personal property is subject to a tax at the domicile of decedent notwithstanding that, at the time of his death, it was in another state, and was administered upon and distributed pursuant to the laws of such state, and delivered within such state to a legatee, who was a resident thereof. Re Dingman, 66 App. Div. 228, 72 N. Y. Supp. 694. The court said in effect that the question how the tax was to be collected was another matter.

Notes, bonds, and mortgages belonging to the estate of a resident, but in the hands of an agent in another state at the time of his death are subject to the tax. Re Corning, 3 Misc. 160, 23 N. Y. Supp. 285 (surrogate's decision). The land covered by the mortgage was also situated in the other state.

The decision in Re Thomas, 3 Misc. 388, 24 N. Y. Supp. 713, that the personal estate of a decedent resident in New York, consisting of her distributive share in the estate of a deceased sister, who was domiciled in Ohio, no part of which said estate came to the possession of the testatrix prior to her death, was not subject to the tax, was in effect overruled by the decision in Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L.R.A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096, reversing the decision in Re Swift, 2 Connolly, 644, 47 N. Y. S. R. 47, 16 N. Y. Supp. 193, so far as it related to personal property of a resident decedent, upon which the court in Re Thomas relied.

Under the Pennsylvania act of 1826, subjecting "all estates, real, personal, and mixed . . . passing from any person who may die seised or possessed of such estate, being within this commonwealth, . . ." it was held in Com. v. Smith, 5 Pa. 144, that it was not the person, but the estate within the commonwealth, on which the tax is levied. Though the decision in that case was that personal property within the state, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, was subject to the tax, it is clear that unless the statute had been amended, the result would have been that the tax could not have been exacted in respect of personal property out of the commonwealth, belonging to the estate of a resident. The act referred to, however, was subsequently amended by declaring that the words "being within this commonwealth" shall be so construed as to relate to all persons who have been at the time of their decease, or now may be, domiciled within the commonwealth, as well as to estates. Under the amended statute, it was held in Re Short, 16 Pa. 63, that the tax was payable in respect of stocks and bonds of foreign corporations, and a deposit in a bank in another state, belonging to the estate of a resident, although the securities seem to have been without the state.

The Pennsylvania act of 1850 by which the inheritance tax was in effect extended to personal property out of the jurisdiction, belonging to the estate of a resident, was upheld in Carpenter v. Pennsylvania, 17 How. 456, 15 L. ed. 127, even as to the estate of a resident of Pennsylvania who died before the passage of the act.

The tax is payable in respect of bonds of a Missouri corporation and stock in a New Jersey corporation, notwithstanding that, at the time of the death of the decedent, a resident of Pennsylvania, they were in possession of a New York trust company upon a trust to pay the income to him, and after his death, to distribute to certain beneficiaries named in the trust deed, or such other beneficiaries as should be substituted therefor by will. Re Lines's Estate, 155 Pa. 378, 26 Atl. 728.

The distributive share of a resident of Pennsylvania in the estate of an intestate who was domiciled in New York, consisting of stocks, bonds and cash which, at the latter's death, was actually at his domicil, is subject to the tax, notwithstanding that the former died within two weeks after the death of the latter, and before the latter's estate had been settled, or the exact amount coming to the former therefrom had been determined. Milliken's Estate, 206 Pa. 149, 55 Atl. 853.

Securities consisting of stocks, bonds, notes, life insurance policies, etc., assigned in trust to an Illinois trust company by a resident of Wisconsin, who reserved the right to direct and control the distribution of the trust property, and to revoke the trust at any time during his lifetime, and who received the net income from the property during his lifetime, have such a situs in Wisconsin as to subject them to the inheritance tax law of that state, although the securities were at all times after the creation of the trust in the possession of the trust company, and never manually in Wisconsin. Bullen's Estate, 143 Wis. 512, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1114, 128 N. W. 109. The Wisconsin statute under which this case was decided was adopted from New York, and provides that the tax shall be paid when the transfer is by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person dying possessed of the property while a resident of the state, or when the transfer is of property, made by a resident or by a nonresident, when such nonresident's property is within the state, or within its jurisdiction, by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death.

So, in England, personal property belonging to the estate of a domiciled Englishman is subject to a legacy duty wherever located. Atty. Gen. v. Napier, 6 Exch. 217, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 173, 15 Jur. 253; Re Ewing, 1 Cramp. & J. 151, 1 Tyrw. 92, 9 L. J. Exch. 37; Re Coales, 7 Mees. & W. 390, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 207.

The English cases involving probate and estate duties are not included.

In Woodruff v. Atty. Gen. [1908] App. Cas. 508, it was held that the power of the provincial legislature of Ontario being limited by the British North America act to "direct taxation within the province," it had no power to impose a "succession tax," so-called, upon the transfer inter vivos of movables consisting of bonds, debentures, etc., made by a person domiciled in the province, where the securities were in New York, and the transfer and delivery were made in that state. Upon these facts the decision in this case would not seem to reach a case of a succession upon the death of an owner, testate or intestate; but it was said in the opinion: "The pith of the matter seems to be that the powers of the provincial legislature being strictly limited to 'direct taxation within the province' (British North America act, 30 & 31 Vict. chap. 3, § 92, subsec. 2), any attempt to levy a tax on property locally situate outside the province is beyond their competence."

That statement gave rise to a conflict of views among the members of the Supreme Court of Canada in Rex ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Cotton, 15 Can. S. C. 469, the majority being of the opinion that neither the decision nor the opinion of the privy council prevented the exaction by Quebec of a succession tax in respect of movables located out of the province, belonging to the estate of a decedent who was domiciled in the province. The majority were of the opinion that the decision in the Woodruff Case must be limited to the facts of that case, and that in any event the fact that the Quebec statute purported to lay the tax upon the transmission of the property, whereas the Ontario law, in terms, at least, purported to lay the tax upon the property itself, made a distinction which would save the Quebec law from the effect of the decision in the Woodruff case, even if that decision were to be construed to apply to succession by death as well as to transfers inter vivos under the Ontario statute then under consideration.

In some instances, however, either because of the terms of the particular statute, or upon general considerations, it has been held that the tax is not payable in respect of personal property belonging to estate of a resident, but not within the jurisdiction. This, as already shown, was true of the early Pennsylvania statute.

And so, under the Iowa statute declaring that "all property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, whether belonging to the inhabitants of this state or not, and whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the statutes of inheritance of this or any other state . . . shall be subject to a tax," it was held in Re Weaver, 110 Iowa, 328, 81 N. W. 603, that the actual situs of the property, and not the domicile of the owner, was the criterion, and accordingly that cattle owned by a decedent domiciled in Iowa, but which were in another state, were not subject to the tax; nor did the proceeds of the sale of such cattle, when brought into Iowa, become subject to the tax. The power of the state to impose the tax on such property was conceded, and the decision rested upon the construction of the statute.

The North Carolina supreme court having, in Alvany v. Powell, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 51, adopted the view that the tax was laid according to the principle of actual situs, rejecting the English doctrine that the tax is laid according to the principle of domicile, and applied the former view with the result of holding the tax payable in respect of personal property within the state, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, with a degree of consistency not much emulated by the courts of other jurisdictions, except when constrained by the terms of the statute, applied the same view conversely in State v. Brevard, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) 141, by holding that the tax was not payable in respect of personal property not within the state, devolving upon a citizen of North Carolina under the will of one who seems to have been domiciled in North Carolina. While it is not explicitly stated that the testator was domiciled in North Carolina, there would seem to be little doubt but that the case was decided on that assumption. In the first place, the opinion seems to regard the decision as the logical converse of the decision in Alvany v. Powell, supra, which would imply that the decedent in the Brevard Case was domiciled in North Carolina. The opinion also speaks of the "executors" having qualified in Lincoln county court, and of the property in Alabama having been sold by an "administrator" appointed in that state, from which it is fairly inferable that the domiciliary administration of the estate was in North Carolina.

In Rex ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Cotton, 45 Can. supra, upon an equal division of the court, it was held that personal property consisting of securities located beyond the province were not taxable under the terms of the Quebec statute in force in 1902, providing that all transmission owing to death, of property in usufruct or enjoyment of movable or immovable property "in the province," shall be liable to a succession tax. The statute was subsequently amended so as to subject to succession duty all movable property transmitted, "wherever situate, of persons having their domicile (or residing) in the province of Quebec at the time of their death;" and it was held that the amended statute covered property so circumstanced, it being further held as above shown, that, as so applied, the statute was within the power of the province.

In Re Joylsin, 76 Vt. 88, 56 Atl. 281, the court, contrary to the prevailing view in other states, took the position that only property within the probate jurisdiction is subject to the tax under a statute applying to "all property within the jurisdiction of this state . . . whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state," and it was accordingly held that the tax was not payable in respect of personalty belonging to the estate of a resident, consisting of bonds and notes of nonresidents, secured by mortgages on lands in other states, and a deposit in savings banks in another state, —all of which securities were "physically absent from the state of Vermont."

But after the statute had been amended so as to declare that every person who shall receive any legacy or distributive share comprised of or arising from property or any interest therein passing "by will, the law of descent, or the decree of a court of this state . . ." shall be subject to the tax. It was held in Re Howard, 80 Vt. 499, 68 Atl. 513, that the tax was payable in respect of notes held by a resident decedent against nonresidents, secured by mortgages upon real estate without the state, where they were never administered in the other jurisdiction, but were collected by the Vermont administrator, and formed part of the assets passing under the final decree of the probate court.

In one instance the right of the state of the domicile to exact the tax was defeated as the result of proceedings in another state.

Thus, the conclusiveness attending, under the New Jersey practice, the probate of a will, the settlement of the executors' account, and the final distribution of the estate pursuant to orders which the court made, after having decreed that all those who had neglected to bring in their claims were forever barred from their action therefor against the executors, renders repugnant to the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution—where no attack on the jurisdiction of the New Jersey courts was made—the subsequent assessment, under N. Y. Laws 1896, chap. 908, upon the personal estate of the decedent as a resident of New York, of a succession tax, which, under § 222 of that act, is made a lien on the property and a personal obligation of the transferees and executors. Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43, 52 L. ed. 95, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

In Re Cummings, 142 App. Div. 377, 127 N. Y. Supp. 109, where a decedent who was adjudged by the New York courts to have been domiciled in New York left personal property in that state and also in California, it was held that the tax imposed by the New York statute was payable in respect of the personal property in California, notwithstanding that it was determined by a court of that state that the decedent was domiciled in California, and that the property in that state was distributed by a decree of the California court, to the heir at law (the trusts created by the will having been held invalid). The case was distinguished from Tilt v. Kelsey, supra, upon the point, inter alia, that the California decree did not purport to administer and distribute the entire estate, but only such part of it as was in California, and that it was not preceded by a decree forever barring all demands not duly presented. It is also to be observed that the assessment was made on the basis of intestacy, and not, as in the Tilt Case, on the basis of a will which derived its authenticity and capacity to transmit property from a foreign probate. The court pointed out that it was not claimed that the order imposing the tax would create a lien on the California property, or impose any liability on a citizen of that state not a party to the New York proceedings; that the comptroller only asked for an order fixing the tax which accrued to the state upon the death of the decedent, and that he would, of course, have to collect the tax from some person over whom, or from some property over which, the courts of New York have jurisdiction.

The conclusion in the last case was approved by the Illinois supreme court in People v. Union Trust Co. 255 Ill. 168, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 99 N. E. 377, Ann. Cas. 1913 D, 514, although the court remarked that it might not agree with all the reasoning. It was held in the latter case that a decree of a California court distributing the estate, and discharging an administrator with the will annexed, upon a finding that all claims presented against the estate had been paid, including taxes and inheritance taxes, did not, under the doctrine of Tilt v. Kelsey, prevent the exaction of an inheritance tax by Illinois in respect of personal property located in California, belonging to the estate of the decedent domiciled in Illinois. G. H. P.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

GEORGE A. STAFFORD, Appt.

(— Conn. —, 87 Atl. 743.)

Automobile — negligence of chauffeur — release of steering gear.

1. A chauffeur is negligent in taking his hands from the steering gear to adjust his hat while the car is running 30 miles an hour, although the road is level, smooth, and straight.

Master and servant — servant riding in master's car — negligence of chauffeur — liability.

2. A domestic servant whose contract includes the right to be transported to church in the employer's automobile does not, while being so transported, retain the relation of servant to the master, so as to be a fellow servant of the chauffeur in charge of the car, and relieve the master from liability for injury due to the chauffeur's negligence.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Beers & Foster, for appellant: Jennie O'Bierne and John McAuliffe were fellow servants.

The manifest injustice of the verdict in this case is so plain and palpable as clearly to denote that some mistake was made by the jury in the application of legal principles.

Note. — Automobile owner's liability for injury to servant.

While the liability of the owner of an automobile to an employee injured thereby depends upon the general principles governing a master's liability for injury to his servant, including the duty to furnish safe place and appliances, the fellow servant rule, assumption of risk, contributory negligence, etc., it has been thought that it might be of service to collect the cases involving the application of these principles where an employee has been injured by his employer's automobile. For the exposition and exemplification of these principles in many other kinds of cases, see numerous notes referred to in Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Master and Servant," III. While there are as yet but few cases of the kind under consideration, they will doubtless soon become common.

Atl. 869; Stumm v. Goetz, 79 Conn. 314, 64 Atl. 810; Simsbury v. East Granby, 69 Conn. 302, 37 Atl. 678; Bulkley v. Waterman, 13 Conn. 332; Donovan v. Hartford Street R. There is here lacking the necessary element to the application of the fellow servant rule.

It has been held that one who, at the time she was injured in a collision, was riding in an automobile with her employer's wife in the capacity of her maid assumed the risk of the negligence of her employer's chauffeur. Erjauscheck v. Kramer, 141 App. Div. 545, 126 N. Y. Supp. 289. The court said: "Assuming, as we must, that the plaintiff's presence in the automobile was incident to her employment, it is difficult to understand why, within the principle of all the cases on the subject, she did not assume the risk of the chauffeur's negligence. Certainly her employment subjected her to that risk. The fact that her duty differed from that of the chauffeur is of no consequence. The controlling fact is that, in the performance of her duty, she incurred the risk of injury from the chauffeur's negligence."

In Coleman v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 113 Minn. 364, 129 N. W. 762, which was an action by an electrical engineer against his employers and a street railway, to recover for an injury resulting from a collision between the employers' auto truck and a street car while the employer was operating the truck and transporting the plaintiff to his work, the court held that the evidence in the record justified a finding that the concurrent negligence of the defendants acting independently was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. The court said: "It is not questioned that appellants, having undertaken to convey plaintiff in an auto truck to his place of work, owed him, on the occasion in question, in respect to the operation and control of the transportation being furnished under a contract made between the parties, the fellow servant doctrine does not apply.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury might reasonably have found these facts: The plaintiff was engaged in truck, the duty of exercising reasonable care for his protection from injury likely to follow a negligent or improper management of the same; nor can it be questioned that the street car company owed plaintiff the duty of exercising reasonable care to avoid injury to him. As to plaintiff, both may be liable on the doctrine of concurrent negligence, though in a controversy between themselves one defendant might be exonerated because of the contributory negligence to the other. Plaintiff, in riding in the auto truck with a member of defendant firm, was not engaged in a joint enterprise, nor had he any control over the movements of the truck. A member of the firm was operating it, and his negligence cannot be attributed to plaintiff. So that, if there was negligence in the management of the truck, and in the operation and control of the street car, plaintiff may recover against both defendants, for no claim is made that he was guilty of any negligence contributing to the accident. If both were in a measure negligent, as to plaintiff they were joint wrongdoers. To entitle appellants to a reversal, therefore, it must appear that they were wholly free from fault. . . . We shall not discuss the evidence. It is sufficient to say that we have examined the record and find therein evidence reasonably and fairly tending to sustain the jury in finding negligence on the part of defendant, in the management of the truck by Hellier, a member of the firm, and, whether greater or less in degree than that of the street car company, sufficient to support the verdict for plaintiff. The driver of the truck was aware of the fact, on approaching the car track, that a street car might be approaching from one direction the service of the defendant as a domestic servant, and as a part of the contract of employment the defendant contracted to take the plaintiff to church each Sunday in his automobile. The defendant's chauffeur, McAuliffe, was, at the time of the accident, taking the plaintiff to church in pursuance of the defendant's contract. He started late for church. At the time of the accident the car was traveling at a rapid speed of 30 miles an hour. The car was in good condition. It had descended a hill, and was at the foot, where the road was substantially straight and level and of macadam, in fairly good condition, when suddenly it left the highway and landed against some trees outside the highway; the car being at an angle of 45 degrees with the highway. As a consequence the car was badly damaged, and the plaintiff suffered the injuries complained of. A reasonably competent chauffeur, in the exercise of due care, ought to be able to keep a passenger automobile, which was in good condition, in the traveled way of an unobstructed highway which was level and straight and in reasonably good condition. The cause of the automobile leaving the highway was due to the fact that the chauffeur took his hand from the steering wheel for a moment in order to pull his cap over his eyes and prevent the rays of the sun being reflected from the brass lamps of the car into his eyes, and the speed of the car was then so great that it, not being under control for a brief space of time, plunged off the highway. As soon as the rays of the sun thus blinded the chauffeur, as the jury might reasonably have found, it was his duty to have stopped the car; had he done so, the accident would have been avoided. The only logical conclusion to be drawn from the facts proven was that the cause of the accident was the driving of the car in a negligent manner. The defendant claimed upon the trial that the injuries to the plaintiff, if any, were occasioned by the acts of a fellow servant, and, as we understand the record, requested the court upon this ground to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The fellow servant defense cannot prevail or another, and that unless he kept his truck under control a collision might occur, if the approaching street car was not also under control. The evidence tends to show that he observed the car in time to have avoided the collision, but, instead of stopping the truck or turning aside, as he could have done, he attempted to cross in front of the approaching car, and was struck just as the rear end of the truck was passing over the track. It is probable that if the motorman had been in control of his car, or had not been running the same at an excessive speed, the auto could have safely made the crossing. But this does not concern the plaintiff. As to plaintiff, the concurring negligence of defendants was the proximate cause of his injury."

In Anderson v. Van Riper, 128 N. Y. Supp. 66, a complaint was held insufficient on the ground that it failed to show negligence by the defendant, or sufficient facts in relation to the occurrence of the injury where it alleged only that the defendant hired the plaintiff as chauffeur and ordered him to go to the garage where the defendant's automobile was kept, stating that it was in good order; that, after examining the machine and satisfying himself that it was in running order as far as external appearances went, he pulled the starting lever, but that, owing to some latent defect not discernible by his examination, the handle flew back and injured his arm; and it further alleged that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant and her employees. The court said: "There is no fact stated to show the defendant to have been negligent. Allegations of conclusions cannot supply this deficiency. There is no duty cast upon the owner of an automobile, by the statutes of 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) this state, to have the same inspected. But if there were a duty which the master owed to the servant, to make or cause to be made an inspection, it would be necessary to allege facts showing that the neglect to inspect the car was the proximate cause of the injury. In this case the complaint alleges that, 'owing to some latent defect not discernible by plaintiff's examination, the handle or lever flew back.' The plaintiff was an expert, having driven automobiles for four years, and if he could not discover the defect on an examination of the machine, it would appear that he had properly described the defect as 'latent'—that is, not visible or discernible by observation,—and hence would not have been discovered by the defendant's inspection. But, further, the complaint fails to state sufficiently the facts in relation to the occurrence. Did any portion of the machine break through a defect in the material? Had any portion of the machine become defective through lack of repair? If we were allowed to speculate as to the reason of the flying back of the lever, the supposition that it happened through the plaintiff's careless operation would be more in accord with the probabilities than that it happened by reason of some hidden or unexplained defect in the machine itself. No liability can be predicated on the allegation that defendant's agent stated that the automobile was in good order, for the reason that the plaintiff did not rely on the statement, but made his own examination, and no facts are alleged which tend to show that this statement was not true."

in this case, unless it appear from the evidence: First, that the plaintiff, Miss O'Bierne, was an employee of the defendant at the time of the accident; second, that the accident resulted from the negligence alleged of the chauffeur, McAuliffe; and, third, that the relation of McAuliffe to Miss O'Bierne at that time was that of fellow servant. Sullivan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 73 Conn. 203, 214, 47 Atl. 131.

We have already considered the second of these conditions. Let us examine briefly the third and first condition in this order. The character of the duty violated is the test of the master's responsibility. McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, 164, 29 Am. St. Rep. 181, 22 Atl. 1094.

Was the defendant bound to perform the duty toward Miss O'Bierne which McAuliffe neglected to perform? If so, the negligence of McAuliffe was his. Peterson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 77 Conn. 351, 59 Atl. 502, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 455.

If the duty violated was the master's, the defense of fellow servant is never available. Messinger v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 85 Conn. 407, 474, 83 Atl. 631. The master may perform his duty personally, or by another; in either case the failure to perform the duty with reasonable care will impose a liability upon the master for consequent damages. McElligott v. Randolph, supra. The law places upon the master a positive duty as to the place, appliances, instrumentalities, and collaborators he shall provide for his servant. He may, by his contract of employment, extend the range of his duty. The parties are not restricted in their right of contract save by law. Whatever the master contracts to do within the law he must perform; he cannot by delegation escape the consequences of his nonperformance.

Let us next ascertain if Miss O'Bierne, at the time of the accident, was an employee of the defendant. She was his house servant, and in one sense continued in his employ during the period of employment wherever she might be and whether upon her own or her master's business. Her churchgoing cannot be said to have been connected with that employment. It was no part of her duty as a servant to go to church. She was free to go or not, and to choose the church she would go to. She was under no obligation to ride in the car; she was performing no service for him in so doing. On the contrary, he was rendering her the service required by his contract. The defendant did not pay her to ride in his car; she paid the defendant for the ride. This was as much a part consideration for her services as the wages paid her. On 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the way to and from the church her time was her own. She was traveling for her own purposes, and the right of the defendant to her services at this time was not "merely dormant, but wholly suspended." As she was not engaged in the defendant's work when she was injured, she was not a coemployee with McAuliffe.

There are numerous cases of railroad employees whose contracts of employment included transportation to and from work, who, while so traveling, had been injured by the negligence of the employees operating the train. In the best reasoned of these opinions, and in the greater number, these employees have been held to have been passengers, and not engaged in a common employment with the negligent employee of the railroad.

In McNulty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 182 Pa. 479, 38 L.R.A. 376, 61 Am. St. Rep. 721, 38 Atl. 524, the court held that one employed by a railroad at a certain wage and free transportation to and from his home was a passenger while traveling to his home after his day's work, saying: "In the case at bar, the transportation from and to his home, to which the deceased, McNulty, was entitled, was not in any sense a service, or connected with any service, that he was rendering to the defendant company, but it was a service which the latter, by the terms of its contract, was required to render to him. He was under no obligation to ride on the cars, but there was an obligation on the part of the company to afford him an opportunity of doing so, if he saw fit to avail himself of it; and when he exercised the right to which he was thus entitled, and entered the car for the sole purpose of being transported to Bristol, he was a passenger in the full sense of the word, and not an employee of the defendant." Dickinson v. West End Street R. Co. 177 Mass. 365, 52 L.R.A. 326, 83 Am. St. Rep. 284, 59 N. E. 60, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 293; Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. Lane*, 80 Conn. 237, 244, 67 Atl. 886, 11 Ann. Cas. 371, cites several of these cases, and holds to their doctrine.

The two rulings on evidence complained of were correctly decided.

Kinds of action—old remedies.

The consideration of this subject requires a word as to the kinds of action for a nuisance. The old common-law remedies by action were two: "(1) Quod permittat prosternere. This was in the nature of a writ of right, and therefore subject to great delays. It commanded the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance, or show cause against the same; and plaintiff could have judgment to abate the nuisance, and for damages against the defendant. (2) An assize of nuisance, in which the sheriff was commanded to summon a jury to view the premises, and, if they found for the plaintiff, he had judgment to have the nuisance abated, and for damages." Powell v. Bentley & G. Furniture Co. 34 W. Va. 804, 12 L.R.A. 53, 12 S. E. 1085. See also Waggoner v. Jermaine, 3 Denio, 306, 45 Am. Dec. 474; Brown v. Woodworth, 5 Barb. 550; Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 105 N. Y. 319, 11 N. E. 518; 29 Cyc. 1214. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

maintained against one who constructs a ditch and operates it for a time and his grantee who continues the operation, for injuries to abutting property because of percolation from the ditch, even though a statute provides that every successive owner of property who neglects to abate a continuing nuisance thereon created by a former owner is liable therefor in the same manner as the one who first created it.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Lincoln County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's land alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence in permitting seepage and percolating waters to flow thereon. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

By the statute of Westminster, II., 13 Edw. I. chap. 24, where the erector of a nuisance had conveyed away the property, a writ of assize would lie against grantor and grantee jointly. Baten's Case, 9 Coke, 53b; Plumer v. Harper, 3 N. H. 88, 14 Am. Dec. 333; Brown v. Woodworth, 5 Barb. 550; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157.

While the assize of nuisance has been occasionally employed in this country see Maris v. Parry, 3 Rawle, 113; Livezey v. Gorgas, 2 Binn. 192; Barnet v. Ihrie, 17 Serg. & R. 174, the two old writs became practically obsolete long before the American Revolution (Clark v. Storrs, 4 Barb. 562; Kintz v. McNeal, 1 Denio, 436; 3 Bl. Com. 221; 29 Cyc. 1214), and the usual remedy was an action on the case, in which form of action there could be simply a judgment for damages, as in such a case the nuisance could not be abated. (3 Bl. Com. 222). But resort was also had to equity. (Revisers Notes to N. Y. Revised Statutes.)

Although the writ of quod permittat prosternere was abolished in New York by the act of 1787 (Clark v. Storrs, 4 Barb. 562), the writ of nuisance was preserved by that statute, which substantially re-enacted the statute of 13 Edw. I. chap. 24, and gave the form of the writ against both grantor and grantee (Brown v. Woodworth, 5 Barb. 550). And the legal remedy by writ of nuisance for the recovery of damages and an abatement of the nuisance was retained by the Revised Statutes (which required both erector and grantee to be named as defendants, 2 Rev. Stat. 332, Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157), but thereafter the proceeding by writ of nuisance was abolished, the same relief being provided for in a special action under the Code (Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 105 N. Y. 319, 11 N. E. 518), which provides that these Code provisions shall not affect an action where damages only are demanded, and also provides that "a person by whom the nuisance has been erected, and a person to whom the real property has been transferred, may be joined as defendants in such

While in Pennsylvania, after some doubt, the courts adapted the old writ to modern forms (Barnet v. Ihrie, 17 Serg. & R. 174; the old writ is now superseded by the act of 1836; Pennock v. Octoraro Water Co. 15 Pa. Dist. R. 742), it was held in New York before the Code that one bringing a writ of nuisance must bring himself strictly with the ancient rules (Kintz v. McNeal, 1 Denio, 436), and it was later held that this was so of an action under the Code, as that was a substitute for the writ (Ellsworth v. Putnam, 16 Barb. 565), and that, therefore, as the writ ran only against freeholders, a joint action would not lie against one who built a building across the plaintiff's right of way and the person to whom the builder transferred the building, when it was not alleged that the defendants,—or either of them, were freeholders (Hess v. Buffalo & N. F. R. Co. 29 Barb. 391).

In so far as the ancient actions for nuisance have not been taken away by statute they are still available. 2 Wood, Nuisances, § 843; see also as far as concerns a writ of nuisance or assize of nuisance, 3 Farnham, Waters, p. 2815.

The other modern remedies are an action on the case for damages, an action in equity, and, in some jurisdictions at least, a special statutory action.

Joinder in various kinds of action.

The reader will understand that this note presupposes that an action would lie against either defendant separately, and it does not include cases where the ground of the decision was that one of the defendants was not liable at all.

For cases on joining landlord and tenant, see infra, "Joinder of landlord and tenant."

—writ of nuisance.

It is clear that in the jurisdictions where 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the statutes have not interfered with the writ of nuisance or assize of nuisance, the erector and his grantee would be properly joined in such writ under the statute of 13 Edw. I. chap. 24.

—action on the case for damages.

The decision in BROSE v. TWIN FALLS LAND & WATER CO., declining to permit the erector and his grantee to be joined as defendants in an action for damages on account of a nuisance, was followed in the similar case of Partridge v. Twin Falls Land & Water Co. — Idaho, —, 133 Pac. 677, where the nuisance was water overflowing and escaping from the grantee's lands.

And in Hess v. Buffalo & N. F. R. Co. supra, where there being no allegation that the defendants (who were erector and grantee) were freeholders, the court held that the action could not be sustained as an action for a nuisance under the New York Code, and that disregarding the demand for abatement and considering the action simply as an action on the case for damages, it could not be sustained, as it united several causes of action.

On the other hand in Hyde Park Thomson-Houston Light Co. v. Porter, 167 Ill. 276, 47 N. E. 206, affirming 64 Ill. App. 152, the court, in sustaining a judgment in an action on the case against the grantee of the concern which had erected the nuisance, said: "When appellant acquired the plant and placed it in operation, the adjoining property owners who were damaged, and who had received no compensation for the damages they had sustained, were entitled to sue either the party who erected the plant or the one who operated it, or both, as they might elect; but there could be but one recovery."

—actions in equity.

In Karns v. Allen, 135 Wis. 48, 115 N. W. 357, 15 Ann. Cas. 543, an action in equity to abate the nuisance and for damages, it was held that judgment for abatement was proper against the erectors and ages sustained prior to its ownership, management, and control of the canal, and if that company cannot be so held, then the defendants are improperly joined.

Co. 72 Conn. 362, 44 Atl. 547.

Allshie, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. Plaintiff declined to continuer of the nuisance, and that the continuer was not liable for anything before the sale to it by the erectors, but that the erectors being the officers of the continuer, which was a corporation and their grantee, and they, as such officers, having maintained the nuisance after the sale, in the same manner as before, they were personally liable for the damages.

—actions under special statute.

In Cobb v. Smith, 38 Wis. 21, it was held that the erector of a nuisance, and the transferee, who was a trustee, and the cestui que trust, were properly joined as defendants in an action under the Wisconsin statute for an abatement of the nuisance and for damages since a certain date to which they had theretofore recovered; and that judgment was properly entered against all of them for a certain sum for injury since said date, and that the nuisance be abated, or that, in the alternative, upon the payment of a certain larger sum, the plaintiffs be enjoined from disturbing the nuisance, and the defendants be entitled to continue it.

But in an action for damages and to abate a dam under the same statute, it was held error to require the plaintiff to bring in the defendant's grantees of a perpetual right to use a certain amount of water, or else to dismiss his action as far as the abatement was concerned, as the plaintiff might at his election sue only some of the tortfeasors (and if they desired their interests protected they might pay for the property injured, and then they might come into court and resist a judgment of abatement). Newell v. Smith, 26 Wis. 582.

Joinder of landlord and tenant.

Cases arising under general statutes permitting landlord and tenant to be joined as joint tortfeasors are excluded.

The only difficulty in joining landlord and tenant where each is liable is in relation to the damages. If the practice permits of a separate assessment of damages 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

there ought to be no objection to such joinder. See Taylor v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. infra.

—actions for damages on account of nuisance.

There are numerous cases in which it has been held that the landlord and tenant are properly joined in an action for damages on account of a nuisance.

This has been held in the case of:—

—the owner and lessee of a railroad on account of water seepage. Canon City & C. C. R. Co. v. Oxtoby, 45 Colo. 214, 100 Pac. 1127;

—the builder and lessee of an elevated railroad in a city. Taylor v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 18 Jones & S. 340; —maintaining a privy which was a nuisance. McCallum v. Hutchison, 7 U. C. C. P. 508.

In Rogers v. Stewart, 5 Vt. 215, 26 Am. Dec. 296, it was held that the lessor, his assignee, and the lessee and his subtenants, were all jointly liable in an action on the case for a nuisance in erecting and maintaining a fence across the plaintiff's right of way (and the court excluded any proof of damages except by the ordinary occupation).

In Gordon v. Peltzer, 56 Mo. App. 599, the court said (obiter): "If . . . the landlord shall erect a nuisance and let the same to a tenant, then both will be held liable for the consequent injuries,—the one for the creation and the other for the maintenance. They are considered as joint tortfeasors."

Where a railroad company has raised its tracks in a street in front of the plaintiff's premises and so committed a nuisance, the company and its lessee continuing such nuisance are properly joined in an action for damages, and both are liable for the permanent injury, and for the temporary injury occurring after the making of the lease. Little Miami R. Co. v. Hambleton, 40 Ohio St. 496.

In Taylor v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. supra, an action for damages against the amend, and judgment of dismissal was entered.

The action is prosecuted for recovery of damages caused by seepage and percolating waters from the canal owned by the Twin Falls Canal Company. The complaint, among other things, alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of certain lands in Twin Falls county under the canal system, owned by the Twin Falls Canal Company. The complaint charges that the defendant Twin Falls Land & Water Company, in the years 1905 and 1906, constructed an irrigating canal, commonly known as the "High-Line Canal of the Twin Falls Canal System," over and across the plaintiff's land, and that it owned, was in the possession of, and operated the canal and system until the 30th day of November, 1909, on which date the land and water company sold and transferred the entire canal system to its co-defendant, the Twin Falls Canal Company, and that the latter company thereupon acquired the title to the property and entered into possession and control thereof.

For convenience we will hereafter refer to the Twin Falls Land & Water Company as the Land & Water Company and to the Twin Falls Canal Company as the Canal Company.

The complaint then charges that the land & water company in the construction of the canal negligently failed to take such means as were necessary to prevent the water flowing in the canal from percolating, seeping, and flowing into and upon the lands of the plaintiff, and that from the time of the construction of the canal until the trans-builder of an elevated railroad and its lessee was held properly brought against both defendants, and that the most that the lessee could ask was that the damages should be severed and separately assessed.

So, also, the action has been maintained against landlord and tenant jointly where the nuisance has inflicted personal injury.

This has been done in case of:—

—an unguarded area near the sidewalk. Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. 219, 39 Am. Rep. 503;

—a coal hole in the pavement. Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 503;

—bad condition of a wharf. Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, 10 Atl. 620; —falling trough injuring plaintiff. Keeler v. Lederer Realty Corp. 26 R. I. 524, 59 Atl. 855, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 715; —explosion of gunpowder on premises used for its storage. Prussak v. Hutton, 30 App. Div. 66, 51 N. Y. Supp. 761.

"There can be no doubt," said the court in Irvine v. Wood, supra, "that they were properly sued together. The landlord rented the nuisance and took rent for it. The tenants used it and paid rent, and hence they must all be considered as continuing and responsible for the nuisance."

"If the owner lets the premises with the nuisance upon it, and the tenant allows it to remain, they are jointly and severally liable for injuries occasioned thereby." Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. 219, 39 Am. Rep. 503.

See also as recognizing the principle of joinder, Morris v. Brower, Anthon, N. P. 2d ed. 268.

—actions in equity.

There would seem to be no reason why landlord and tenant should not both be joined in an action in equity.

Thus, in O'Sullivan v. New York Elev. R. Co. 7 N. Y. Supp. 51, it was held that it was necessary that all parties having a substantial interest in the structure and its use should be made parties to an action in equity for an injunction against the nuisance. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sance until compensation be paid for operating the elevated railroad built by one of the defendants and leased to the other, and also for damages.

So, in Mazza v. Heister, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 430, it was held that the landlord should be made a defendant as a necessary party to the full determination of the question in an action against tenants to remove a building erected across an alleged private alley (the form of action not appearing, but it was probably in equity).

In Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157, it was held that an injunction should be granted against the erector of a nuisance and his lessee and a sublessee, but that a lessee who had assigned his lease without reserving rent and without any covenant for quiet enjoyment could not be a proper party to the bill.

—actions under special statutes.

In Greene v. Nunnemacher, 36 Wis. 50, it was held that a landlord and successive tenants could not be joined in an action for damages and abatement of a nuisance under the Wisconsin statute, where the nuisance was erected by the landlord, as the tenants could not be held liable for damages caused by him before the commencement of their term; nor should they be held liable for each other when in no way connected; and therefore there were several causes of action which could not be united.

In Robinson v. Smith, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 490, 7 N. Y. Supp. 38, it was held that an action for damages and for an abatement of a nuisance under the New York Code was properly brought against both landlord and tenant, but as an injunction perpetually enjoining the nuisance was granted, it would seem that the court overlooked the decision in Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 105 N. Y. 319, 11 N. E. 518, holding that such an action was one in equity, and was not to be considered as the special action for a nuisance provided for by the Code.

fer of the same to the canal company, the land & water company was the sole owner and in full control of the property, and that from the time of the transfer until the commencement of this action the canal company was the owner and in full control of the property, and that both defendants at all times since the construction of the canal, by one continuous negligent act, participated in by both of defendants during the periods aforesaid, negligently caused the water to flow in said canal so as to permit the same to percolate, seep, and flow onto the lands of the plaintiff to his damage in the sum of $5,000. The complaint also alleges that the land & water company knew that the canal was not properly constructed, and that the waters were seeping and percolating into and upon the lands of the plaintiff and injuring and damaging the same, and that the canal company at the time it acquired title to and took possession of the property knew of the defects in the system, and that damage was being done to the plaintiff, and that it continued to maintain and operate the canal without repairing or improving the same. The complaint contains a second count for the same tort and injury, but it is unnecessary to here recite any of the allegations of that count. The trial court sustained a demurrer to this complaint, upon the ground that it improperly united two causes of action, in that it united a cause of action against the land & water company alone with a cause of action against the canal company alone, and that the two companies were not jointly liable on either cause of action.

The only question presented for our consideration is whether the land & water company and the canal company are jointly liable for the tort and damage alleged in the complaint. In determining this question, it is important to understand clearly the cause of action alleged. When reduced to its last analysis, the complaint charges that the land & water company constructed this canal, and was the sole owner thereof and operated the same until November 30, 1909, and that on the latter date it sold and transferred the entire system and the possession and control thereof to the canal company. It then alleges that this injury and damage has been continuing from the time the land & water company began to run water through the canal up to the time of the commencement of this action.

The general rule of law with reference to the joint liability of trespassers and tortfeasors is well established and everywhere recognized, but it has proven one of the most difficult rules of application on account of the infinite diversity and variety of circumstances under which these wrongs are committed or which lead up to their commission.

The supreme court of Indiana in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hilligoss, 171 Ind. 417, 131 Am. St. Rep. 258, 86 N. E. 485, have stated the rule as to those cases in which joint liability will attach as follows: "When more persons than one unite in the commission of a wrong, each is responsible for the acts of all, and for the whole damage; also, where separate and independent acts of negligence by different persons concur in causing a single injury, each is fully responsible for the trespass. Courts will not undertake to apportion the damages in such cases among the joint wrongdoers. The injured party has at his election his remedy against all or any number. 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 153. He may elect to look to one only, and, if he accepts from that one a benefit or property in satisfaction and release, he can go no further."

On the other hand, the supreme court of Oregon, in Strauh v. Asiatic S. S. Co. 48 Or. 100, 85 Pac. 230, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 465, have stated the converse of this rule as follows: "To make tortfeasors liable jointly there must be some sort of community in the wrongdoing, and the injury must be in some way due to their joint work, but it is not necessary that they be acting together or in concert if their concurring negligence occasions the injury."

The same proposition is stated from another angle by the supreme court of California in Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 705, 125 Am. St. Rep. 87, 93 Pac. 875, as follows: "In actions against two or more persons for a single tort, there cannot be two verdicts for different sums against different defendants upon the same trial. There can be but one verdict for a single sum against all who are found guilty of the tort. All who are guilty at all are liable for the whole amount of the actual damages arising from the injury inflicted, irrespective of the degree of culpability."

In 38 Cyc. 484, the author says: "The fact that it is difficult to separate the injury done by each from that done by the others furnishes no reason for holding that one tortfeasor should be liable for the acts of others with whom he is not acting in concert. Furthermore, if defendant's act was several when it was committed, it cannot be made joint because of a consequence which followed in connection with the result of the same, or a similar act done by others."

In Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566, the court of appeals of New York said: "Where different parties pollute a stream by the discharge of sewage therein, each from his own premises, and each acting separately and independently of the others, one of the number is not liable for all the injury suffered by another because of the nuisance thus created. Each is liable only to the extent of the wrong committed by him."

Mr. Kinney in volume 3 of his work on Irrigation & Water Rights, at § 1685, under the subject of "Joint and Several Tortfeasors," says: "It is a well-settled principle of law of procedure that an action at law for damages cannot be maintained against several persons as parties defendant when each acted independently of the others and there was no concert or unity of design or action between them. It is held that in such a case the tort of each defendant is several when committed, and that it does not become joint because afterward its consequences united with the consequences of several other torts committed by other persons. If the rule were otherwise, the authorities hold that one defendant, however little he might have contributed to the injury of the plaintiff, would be liable for all the injury caused by the wrongful acts of all the other defendants, and he would have no remedy against the latter, because no contribution can be enforced between tortfeasors."

The following are some of the many authorities which support the general rule above stated: Walton v. Miller, 109 Va. 210, 132 Am. St. Rep. 908, 63 S. E. 458; Wiscarver v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 141 Iowa, 121, 119 N. W. 532; Verlinda v. Stone & W. Engineering Corp. 44 Mont. 223, 119 Pac. 573; Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17, 33 Am. Rep. 523, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 599; Miles v. Du Bey, 15 Mont. 340, 39 Pac. 313; Pom. Code Remedies, 4th ed. § 209; Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. §§ 137, 141.

Counsel for appellant cite a number of cases in support of their contention, but place their chief reliance on the case of Gunder v. Tibbits, 153 Ind. 591, 55 N. E. 762. That was an action for damages resulting from a personal wrong and injury. In that case the action was prosecuted for damages against the plaintiff's seducer and a physician who attended her later. As we read and understand that case, there is no similarity between the facts of the case there considered and the case at bar. There it appeared that each contributed to the wrong and injury, and that the act of each was ratified and approved by the other, so that both could well be termed and dealt with as joint wrongdoers and co-conspirators. In discussing the law applicable to such a case, the court said: "If each had acted independently, the plaintiff might have been compelled to pursue them separately, although the consequences of their acts united. But Kimball was the hand of Gunder in furthering Gunder's wrong. The consequences of the operation were necessarily intermingled by Kimball with the natural consequences of Gunder's sexual intercourse with plaintiff. When Gunder came to Kimball, the incident was not closed, and Kimball willingly joined in and helped on a wrong that was not completed,—a wrong that constituted, when completed, but one cause of action against Gunder. And so, if Kimball chose to come in at any stage, he, too, is liable for the whole; for the law will not undertake to apportion damages in such cases."

Let us now revert to the facts of the present case to see if they bring it within the rule of law recognized by the foregoing authorities. The land & water company constructed this canal and operated it alone and independent of the canal company up to the time of the transfer November 30, 1909. Indeed, it was stated on the argument that the canal company was not in existence during the greater portion of this period, and was not organized until shortly before it acquired this property. Whatever damage was done by the land & water company during its ownership and operation of this system and up until the 30th day of November, 1909, when it parted with its ownership and possession, was a separate and independent act for which appellant might maintain his action for the damages sustained by reason of that act, and the damages sustained by reason of that act could have been computed and ascertained with reasonable certainty. To this injury the canal company in no way contributed and in no way aided, abetted, or advised therein. The liability and responsibility of the canal company commenced only when it acquired title and took possession of this property, and began to operate it and run water through the canal, and allowed the same to percolate through and upon the lands of the appellant. The canal company might have immediately repaired this defect in the canal, and prevented the seepage and percolation which was causing damage to appellant, and thereby have avoided doing any injury to appellant or subjecting itself to liability for damages. The land & water company was in no respect liable or responsible for the continuation of any injury on account of seepage and percolation after it parted with title and right of possession. The acts of the two companies are severable and separable, and the wrong of the one did not carry over into the act of the other. In other words, there was no concurrence either in point of time or act; there was no community of action, and there was no joint action by these two companies. So far as we have been able to discover from the authorities, they all require that, in order to hold defendants jointly liable, there must be some joint or concurrent act, or community of action or duty, or neglect of some common duty, or that the several wrongful acts of the defendants done at different times concurred in their effects as one single act to produce the injury complained of.

It seems clear to us that the respondents, the land & water company and the canal company, are not shown to have acted either jointly and concurrently to produce the injury of which appellant complains, nor have they neglected a duty that was common to them both at one and the same time, nor have they so acted that the several acts of the two have at any one time joined and concurred to produce a single injury. When the canal company's first duty arose to repair or improve this canal so as to prevent water seeping and percolating onto appellant's land, the like duty which had previously devolved upon the land & water company ceased, and the same duty was never incumbent upon both at the same time.

It has been suggested that under the provisions of § 3660 of the Revised Codes, "every successive owner of property who neglects to abate a continuing nuisance upon or in the use of such property, created by a former owner, is liable therefor in the same manner as the one who first created it." It is contended that under this statute a man who purchases property containing a nuisance is liable for the damage previously inflicted by that nuisance. This statute does not impose such a liability. It was enacted for the purpose of rendering the purchaser of a property that contains a nuisance liable to an action to abate the nuisance in the same manner as if he had created the nuisance, and to render him liable for all subsequent damages the same as if he had created the nuisance. In other words, it was intended to preclude the purchaser of property containing a nuisance defending against an action for damages or to abate the same, on the ground that he did not create the nuisance, and that he was not responsible for its creation. It was never intended, however, to render the purchaser liable for damages previously incurred. Pierce v. German Sav. & L. Soc. 72 Cal. 180, 1 Am. St. Rep. 45, 13 Pac. 478; Castle v. Smith, — Cal. —, 36 Pac. 859; Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 203, 5 L.R.A. 449, 12 Am. St. Rep. 778, 22 N. E. 193; 34 Am. St. Rep. note at page 267; Plumer v. Harper, 3 N. H. 88, 14 Am. Dec. 333.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered. Costs awarded in favor of respondents.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Appt.,
v.

LORAIN HAYDEN, by Next Friend.

(154 Ky. 258, 157 S. W. 4.)

Municipal corporation — safe sidewalk — duty as to area covering.

1. The duty of a municipal corporation to keep its sidewalks safe does not require it to keep a covering of a stairway leading from the sidewalk to the cellar of an adjoining building safe as a standing place for persons wishing to look through the windows of the building.

Negligence — unsafe property — covering of cellar way.

2. Trustees of a church are not bound to keep the covering of an opening leading from the sidewalk to the cellar of the church safe for persons who attempt to make use of it to look into the church windows.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, Second Division, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bennett H. Young, Huston Quin, and Marlon W. Ripy, for appellant:

A municipal corporation cannot be compelled to respond in damages for conditions existing outside of the traveled or dedicated way.

The cellar door in question was put to such an extraordinary use at the time of the accident as that the defendant city cannot be held responsible, because it is not required to anticipate such a use.

Messrs. O'Doherty & Yonts for appellee.

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Calvary Baptist Church maintains a mission on the north side of Walnut street, west of Twenty-eighth street, in Louisville, for colored people. The building sets back about 3 feet from the line of the street, and there is a cellar door extending from the building out upon the sidewalk; the cellar door being about 5 feet long, and about 25 inches of the door being, according to the weight of evidence, within the line of the street. The cellar door is higher at the building than at the other end. There are no hinges upon it; the end next to the church rests upon timbers nailed to the side of the wall, and when the door is used it is simply lifted off. In June, 1909, they were holding a religious revival, and it was customary for people in the neighborhood, both white and colored, to gather around the church and look in at what was going on; in order to see better they frequently stood on the cellar door. On the night of June 24th quite a crowd had gathered there for some time, and about 9 o'clock among them was Loraine Hayden, a little girl about five or six years old. Loraine was standing on the cellar door near the building, and near her was Mrs. Minnie Bessels, who weighs something over 200 pounds. There were two or three other persons standing on the door or standing on the frame on which it rested. The door gave way at the end next to the building and fell through into the cellar. The little girl and Mrs. Bessels fell into the hole. The child was seriously hurt, and this suit was brought against the city of Louisville and the trustees of the church to recover damages for her injuries. At the conclusion of all the evidence the court instructed 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) ed the jury peremptorily to find a verdict in favor of the trustees of the church, and submitted the case to the jury as to the city. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the child for $1,000. The court entered judgment on the verdict, and overruled the city's motion for new trial, and the city appeals.

According to the evidence for the plaintiff, the cellar door was in a rotten, decayed condition, and this by casual inspection a passer-by could readily discover; and according to the plaintiff's evidence Mrs. Bessels and the child were the only two people on the door, but according to the evidence for the city there were other people on the door, so that the entire weight upon it was about 800 pounds, and this forced off the timber nailed to the wall upon which the door rested, and thus caused it to fall. There was sufficient evidence of the rotten condition of the door to take the case to the jury, if the accident had happened in the ordinary use of the street. The proof conduces strongly to show that the child was really standing beyond the line of the street; but, as there is some confusion in the evidence on this subject, we will treat the case as though she was within the line of the street, but was using the cellar door to stand on for the purpose of looking into the windows of the church.

The question is, Was the city liable to a person who was injured by such a use of the cellar door? In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 1711, 4th ed., it is said: "From what has already been said, that negligence is the ground of the liability, it follows that a municipal corporation is not an insurer against accidents upon the streets and sidewalks. Nor is every defect therein, though it may cause the injury sued for, actionable. It is sufficient, we think, if the streets (which include sidewalks and bridges thereon) are in a reasonably safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes, by night as well as by day; and whether they are so or not is a practical question to be determined in each case by its particular circumstances."

In Ryther v. Austin, 72 Minn. 24, 74 N. W. 1017, an electric light pole had been put up in a cement sidewalk so as to leave a space of 4 or 5 inches between the pole and the curb. Ryther hitched his horse to the pole; the horse began pawing and finally got one of his feet fastened in the hole between the pole and the curb, and was so injured that he had to be killed. Holding the city not liable, the court said: "We are of opinion that these facts do not tend to prove negligence on the part of the city, and hence that the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant. The poles were not erected or designed for hitching posts, and the plaintiff was aware of that fact. He understood the situation, and all the risks, if any, of hitching horses to the poles, as fully as any of the city officials did. If he saw fit, for his own convenience, to use the pole as a hitching post, he took it as it was, and assumed all the risks. If he had been driving along the street at night and collided with the pole in the dark, a very different case would have been presented."

In Stickney v. Salem, 3 Allen, 374, the plaintiff stopped near a railing for ten or fifteen minutes to talk to a friend, and, while standing there talking to his friend, leaned against the railing, which gave way, and he was injured. The city was held not liable. The court said: "The legal obligation of keeping a sufficient railing upon a highway is imposed only when it is necessary to mark the limits of that part of the road within which persons may safely travel, or to furnish a guard against dangerous places, so that proper protection may be afforded to those who, in the exercise of due care as travelers, while passing or standing on the way, might otherwise be exposed to accident or injury. If a person, without fault or negligence on his part, is forced against a railing, or takes hold of it to aid his passage, or falls against it by accident, or has occasion to use it in any way in furtherance of the lawful and reasonable exercise of his right as a traveler, and by reason of any defect or insufficiency it gives way and causes an injury, a town or city would be liable to make full compensation for the damages thereby occasioned. But this is the extent of the liability. A city or town is not bound by law to erect and maintain railings for persons to sit upon or lean against. They are not intended to be used for the convenience and accommodation of those who seek for a place of rest, while they stop in the highway to lounge, or to recover from fatigue, or to engage in conversation. If a person uses them for such purposes, he does it at his own risk. A town or city cannot be held liable for damages which are sustained by persons in consequence of improper or unauthorized uses of the highway, which occasion or contribute to accidents."

The same ruling was made in Blodgett v. Boston, 8 Allen, 237, when a boy who was playing "old man on the castle" on a plank sidewalk, in starting away, got his foot caught between the planks. The court, after pointing out that the duty imposed on the city is to keep the highway safe and convenient for travelers, said: "It has accordingly been held that towns and cities are not liable for damages occasioned by defects in highways to persons who were not travelers thereon at the time the injury to themselves or their property was suffered."

A like ruling was made in Sykes v. Pawlet, 43 Vt. 447, 5 Am. Rep. 295, where the plaintiff had left the highway and gone under a shed, and, in attempting to get from out of the shed and back to the highway, sustained an injury from a deep hole left by the side of the highway. The court said: "Again, the duty of the town in reference to the margins of highways has never been extended beyond the requirement that they should be kept in a reasonably safe condition as against such accidents as are likely to, and actually do, occur in using the highway for the purpose of travel. In this case the backing into the gulf was not the result of an accident that occurred in using the highway for travel, but it resulted from using a shed by the side of the highway, in an interval of cessation from travel, and attempting to get back into the road after a voluntary departure from it."

The same principle has often been applied in suits between master and servant where the servant used something not intended to bear the weight which he put upon it. Thus in Saunders v. Eastern Hydraulic Pressed Brick Co. 63 N. J. L. 554, 76 Am. St. Rep. 222, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 90, 44 Atl. 630, the master was held not responsible to a servant who went upon a roof and put his foot upon a mullion of a window intended as a skylight; it being held that the mullion was intended to support the skylight, and not for the purpose of a man standing upon it. In Crebarry v. National Transit Co. 77 Hun, 74, 28 N. Y. Supp. 291, the plaintiff was injured while leaning against a stay lath of a scaffold, the lath being intended only to keep the post upright. In Schmidt v. Leistikow, 6 Dak. 386, 43 N. W. 821, a miller was injured by the giving way of a spout in the mill, used for passing mill stuff from one part of the mill to another, he having climbed upon it to reach a certain place. And in Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co. v. Gossett, 142 Ky. 842, 135 S. W. 394, a recovery was denied where a painter trusted his weight to a small guy wire used to keep steady the post upon which the tank rested.

We do not see how this case can be distinguished from those cited. While the city was under obligation to keep its streets reasonably safe for the ordinary purposes of travel, it was not required to see that a cellar door was safe for the purpose of persons standing upon it and watching the proceedings in the church. The cellar door was not intended for this purpose. It inclined from the ground up, and, while it would give persons standing on it an advantage to see what was going on in the church, it was plainly not constructed for this purpose, and persons who used it for such purposes, and were injured while so using it, have no right of action against the city or the trustees of the church.

For the reasons indicated, the circuit court properly instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the church trustees; but he erred for the same reasons in refusing to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for the city.

The judgment as to the trustees of the church is affirmed; but the judgment as to the city is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

Note. — Constitutionality of statute authorizing the taking of more property than is intended to be used for a public purpose.

The rule is well established that a reasonable necessity must be shown to exist to authorize the condemnation of property by a corporation to which the power of eminent domain has been delegated, and the moment the appropriation goes beyond the reasonable necessity of the case, it ceases to be justified on the principles which underlie the right of eminent domain. 15 Cyc. 632; note in 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 55.

REPORT by the Land Court for Essex County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action to register a land title in which there was an intervention to condemn the land for alleged public purposes. Condemnation disallowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Horace I. Bartlett, Walter Coulson, and H. Christopher Chubb, for petitioner:

The act authorizes and permits the taking of land not for a public use.

Boston v. Talbot, 206 Mass. 89, 91 N. E. 1014; Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221, 98 N. E. 611, 204 Mass. 607, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 483, 91 N. E. 405, 204 Mass. 616, 91 N. E. 578.

It authorizes and permits the taking of land from one person for the purpose of selling or leasing to another.

Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417; 2 Kent, Com. 339, 340; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 763; Sanborn v. Van Dyne, 90 Minn. 215, 96 N. W. 41; Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v.

are unconstitutional in so far as they authorize the taking of more land than is necessary for the improvement, and to that extent they are unenforceable against the will of the landowner. Re Albany Street, 11 Wend. 149, 25 Am. Dec. 618; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 511, 53 Am. Dec. 325; Bennett v. Boyle, 40 Barb. 551; Gregg v. Baltimore, 56 Md. 256.

So, in Dunn v. Charleston, Harp. L. 189, it was held that a statute authorizing a city to condemn adjoining lots for the purpose of widening the streets must be construed to relate only to such portions thereof as shall be actually necessary for the street, since a construction that would authorize the taking of the whole lot when a part only was necessary would render the statute unconstitutional.

A similar objection was raised against an ordinance providing for the condemnation of land in Baltimore v. Clunet, 23 Md. 449, in which the rule announced in the above cases is affirmed; but in that case it was pointed out that the city was not authorized to take more land than was necessary for the improvement, except by the consent of the owner, but that it was required to take the whole when the owner desired it to do so, so that the surrender by the owner of the portions of lots not required for the improvement, and the sale thereof by the city, was not a taking of the same under the power of eminent domain; but was simply a mode devised by the ordinance for ascertaining the just compensation to be paid to the owner for the property actually taken for the public use.

In Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 142 U. S. 254, 35 L. ed. 1004, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173, it was held that, while it is beyond the competency of the state to appropriate to itself the property of individuals for the sole purpose of creating a water power to be leased for manufacturing purposes, if, in the erection of a public dam for a public purpose, there is a surplus of water which may be used for manufacturing purposes, the state may retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement. The court said: "So long as the dam was erected for the bona fide purpose of furnishing an adequate supply of water for the canal, and was not a colorable device for creating a water power, the agents of the state are entitled to great latitude of discretion in regard to the height of the dam and the head of water to be created; and while the surplus in this case may be unnecessarily large, there does not seem to have been any bad faith or abuse of discretion on the part of those charged with the construction of the improvement. Courts should not scan too jealously their conduct in this connection, if there be no reason to doubt that they were animated solely by a desire to promote the public interests; nor can they undertake to measure with nicety the exact amount of water required for the purposes of the public improvement. Under the circumstances of this case, we think it within the power of the state to retain within its immediate control such surplus as might incidentally be created by the erection of the dam."

Generally, as to the combination of public and private purposes as affecting the power of eminent domain, see note to Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 538.

Conrad, — Del. —, 83 Atl. 1036, is of interest in this connection, where it appeared the statute authorized boulevard corporations to condemn a strip of land 200 feet in width, and required them to construct only a vehicular road 30 feet in width, and further provided that every boulevard corporation organized under the provisions of the statute should have full power and authority to use that portion of its boulevard or strip of land not devoted to the road for vehicular travel, for any other purpose that may be desired, provided such purpose is not unlawful. It was held that the company's acceptance of the benefits of the statute, with the power and exercise of the right of eminent domain, imposed upon it the obligation of public use or service, and that the provisions of the statute itself indicated a legislative intent that the boulevard and all its elements should be for the use and accommodation of the public, and that the public should have the right to such use, or to the benefits thereof. As to the contention that more land was authorized to be taken than was necessary, the court said that the quantity of land necessary for the public use is a question for the legislature to decide, though it was also said that the courts might interfere where there has been a gross abuse of legislative discretion, or manifest fraud in the passage of the statute.

It was also objected in the above case that the land sought to be taken could not be regarded as taken for public use when there was no requirement that it should ever be used other than the 30-foot road, but the court said: "It is a sufficient answer to such objections to say that, even if there is in the statute no express requirement that the 170 feet of land shall at any time be devoted to public use, there is an obligation imposed upon the corporation by the statute, and the acceptance of its provisions, to so use the said land in a reasonable time. The word 'boulevard' imports public use in its entirety. The public must be entitled to the use, or the benefit of the use, of the property taken. Such use cannot be indefinitely postponed, and we do not understand that this is denied by the defendant corporation."

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is the constitutionality of Stat. 1912, chap. 715, entitled "An Act to Make Salisbury Beach a Public Reservation and to Establish the Salisbury Beach Reservation Commission." Its several sections provide for the appointment of a commission and the machinery by which land may be taken, money raised, and a public reservation managed. The ground of attack upon its validity is that it authorizes the taking of land for a private, rather than a public, use. In order to pass intelligently upon its constitutionality in this respect, the physical facts to which it is applicable may be considered to ascertain what may be its practical operation. The property which may be taken under the statute is known as Salisbury Beach, and consists of sand dunes and beach in the town of Salisbury extending from the New Hampshire line about 3½ miles by the sea to the mouth of the Merrimac river. A street railway has been constructed along the length of the beach. On the ocean side there are cottages for summer occupancy, and on the westerly line of the dunes a large number of houses have been built, and hotels, shops, boarding houses, places of amusement, and other buildings have been constructed, and a summer community has been established, with a system of water and gas pipes, electric lights, sewers, and telephones, all of which, including the street railway, were leased by the petitioner or its predecessors in title.

Streets were laid out or provided for by agreement with the town, plans were drawn showing the property divided into house lots, and many lots were leased to cottage owners and others. The property was owned by the commoners of Salisbury until 1903, when it passed into private ownership, and finally has come to the petitioner. Since the acquirement of the property by the petitioner many leases have expired, and they have not generally been renewed except in a few instances and at a substantial increase in rent.

It is a familiar principle of constitutional law that every presumption is made in favor of the validity of a statute. It is not to be held a violation of the fundamental charter established by the people in their Constitution, unless so clearly outside the power conferred upon the legislature as to be free from reasonable doubt in that regard. It must be assumed that the legislature intended to act within its lawful bounds, and this assumption cannot be overthrown unless the statute unmistakably oversteps these bounds by manifest and plain terms. On the other hand, when it is clear that the statute transgresses the authority vested in the legislature by the Constitution, it is the duty of the court,—a duty from which they cannot shrink without profaning their oaths of office,—to see and to declare the invalidity of the statute. The judicial department of government cannot surrender its judgment respecting the validity of statutes to that of either of the other departments, and, when the occasion arises, must refuse to enforce a statute which does not conform to the requirements of the fundamental law of the land. The statute must be construed as a whole. That which, by fair intendment, its terms may confer power to accomplish, must be ascertained by a broad consideration of the entire act, bearing constantly in mind the presumption in favor of its validity.

The establishment and maintenance of public parks and reservations out of moneys raised by taxation, and the exercise of the power of eminent domain for their acquirement, plainly are within the power of the legislature. It requires no discussion to demonstrate that this is a public purpose. Nor can it be contended reasonably in view of many of our decisions, that the taking of the fee rather than an easement in land to this end is not permissible. Higginson v. The Treasurer (Higginson v. Slattery) 212 Mass. 583, 591, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 215, 99 N. E. 523, and cases cited. The acquire-ment of beaches by eminent domain and at the public expense, for bathing and other purposes of general utility, has never been questioned in this commonwealth. That it is a legitimate exercise of the sovereign power is not open to doubt. See Re Metropolitan Park Comrs. 209 Mass. 381, 95 N. E. 866. Looking alone at § 4 of the act now under consideration, the power conferred does not appear to go beyond the right of acquiring and maintaining land and rights in land for a public park or reservation. But this section must be read in connection with other sections, in order to understand the full scope of the act. Section 10 authorizes the commission "to sell or lease any lands or rights in land taken" "by it, which are not needed as a public reservation." These words are not restricted as to time. They form a part of the original act, and are operative contemporaneously with all its other provisions. There is nothing to require a determination that, by reason of changed conditions, land deemed necessary at the time of taking has become no longer needed. These words in connection with § 4 undertake to enable the commission to take "any and all land" within the designated area, and at the same moment to determine that some of the lands thus taken "are not needed," and immediately to proceed "to sell or lease" such lands. Thus, there may be an adjudication that lands are needed for the public use, which involves a payment for them out of moneys raised by taxation, coupled with a determination not to devote some of these lands to the enjoyment of the people at large, but to sell or lease them for private occupation. There are no words in this or the other sections which limit this broad power. It is not stated expressly or by implication that such sales or leases can be only of property once needed and used for the public resort, but which, through changed conditions, have become useless therefor; nor confining the right to trifling and almost

Section 10: "Said commission may sell or lease any lands or rights in land taken or acquired by it, which are not needed as a public reservation for the use, exercise, and recreation of the inhabitants of the commonwealth, with or without restrictions as to its use, as it may deem advisable, and may make sales of the grass, sand, and other materials in said reservation. The town of Salisbury shall levy, assess, and collect a tax on all buildings and personal estate in said reservation not owned by the commonwealth, in the same manner as if the said reservation had not been created, and shall collect a tax on all land in said reservation not taken, acquired, or used by said commission for the purposes of this act."

Section 11: "The town of Salisbury shall have the general charge and supervision of the education of the children resident in the reservation as in the case of other children resident in the said town."

negligible remnants of estates which would be unsuitable for private use after the part actually needed for public use has been appropriated. That this wide power of taking for private use was intended by the present act is confirmed by reference to the latter part of § 10, to the effect that the town of Salisbury may tax "all buildings and personal estate in said reservation not owned by the commonwealth, . . . and shall collect a tax on all land in said reservation not taken, acquired, or used by said commission for the purposes of this act." The first part of this sentence seems to contemplate that buildings and personal property shall be and remain in private ownership upon the reservation to such an extent as to be substantial subjects of taxation, while the final clause appears to provide for the taking and holding by the commission of substantial areas of land not for the public purposes set forth in the act. No land can be "in said reservation" until taken or acquired by the commission under the authority of the act. The evident design of § 11 is that upon the reservation shall be such a considerable settlement of inhabitants that special provision was thought to be needed for the education of the children in the public schools of Salisbury. This would be impossible if a reservation of this size were devoted wholly to the public. Whatever may be said of the force of any one of these several provisions standing alone, taken in conjunction and construed together they authorize the taking not only of the seashore and other lands purely for reservation purposes, but also of other tracts in the designated territory to be sold or leased to private individuals, or held without appropriation to the use of the public, which means inferentially a holding for private uses. When applied to the subject-matter, namely, an existing summer resort with all its equipment of cottages and other appurtenances, it is difficult to say which of these two is the dominant aim.

The construction put by the commission upon the powers conferred by the act as revealed by their conduct is in accordance with this interpretation. It merely indicates the natural meaning of the act. The taking, which is made a part of the record, shows generally a careful exclusion of most of the lots not owned by the petitioner, even though in numerous instances this results in an interruption of the shore line, and in many others leaves small lots owned by individuals surrounded by land taken. The impression created by looking at the plan of the taking was not inaccurately described in argument as a "checker board" effect. It was found by the land court that the commission interpreted the act to authorize them legally to "take such lands as they did take for the purpose of carrying out the intent of the law, which, for the protection of the present cottage owners and people who in the future may become cottage owners or occupants, was to be done by leasing or selling the lands taken." This statement aptly summarizes the effect of the act. It authorizes the taking of land a part of which may never be intended for any public purpose, but for lease or sale for private use. It would be possible for the commissions, although strictly following the terms of the statute, to take this entire summer colony with its numerous houses and other buildings, and substitute themselves for the petitioner as landlord, and lease all the cottages and buildings indefinitely, or ultimately to sell them. The statute would enable the establishment of what in essence would be a scheme for utilizing and developing a seashore summer resort for the benefit of cottagers on a scale of some magnitude. This being the meaning of the statute, it remains to inquire whether it is within the scope of legislative power.

The acquisition of land under the power of eminent domain to be devoted to private uses has been recently considered and discussed somewhat at length. It has been said that the exercise of the power of the state, either through taxation or eminent domain, to take land from one person with the intent of handing it over to another person, is not a public purpose, and is contrary to basic and essential principles of free government. Opinion of Justices. 204 Mass. 607, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 483, 91 N. E. 405. The underlying objection is that the main end of legislation for this purpose is a private utility rather than the general good. While incidentally it may be an advantage to the public that private persons prosper, if the essential character of the transaction in its direct object is private benefit to individuals, the purpose is not public. In a general sense it is of public interest that the people be well housed, but this does not authorize the state to become the general landlord. That subject is a proper one for the exercise of the police power, but not of eminent domain. It was said by the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan in Madisonville Traction Co. v. St. Bernard Min. Co. 196 U. S. 239, 251, 49 L. ed. 462, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 251. 256: "It is fundamental in American jurisprudence that private property cannot be taken by the government, national or state, except for purposes which are of a public character, although such taking be accompanied by compensation to the owner. That principle . . . grows out of the essential nature of all free governments."

Private property cannot be taken directly or indirectly for a private end. It cannot be seized ostensibly for a public use and then diverted to a private use. Legislation which is designed, or which is so framed that it may be utilized, to accomplish the ultimate result of placing property in the hands of one individual for private enjoyment after it has been taken from another individual avowedly for a public purpose, is unconstitutional. It would enable that to be achieved by indirection which by plain statement would be impossible. These principles have been expounded at length in early decisions and recent opinions of this court with affluent citation of authorities. It is not necessary to do more than refer to a few of them. The case at bar is indistinguishable from them. Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39; Wilkins v. Jewett, 139 Mass. 29, 29 N. E. 214; Mead v. Acton, 139 Mass. 341, 1 N. E. 611. See also Hairston v. Danville & W. R. Co. 208 U. S. 598, 52 L. ed. 637, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 331, 13 Ann. Cas. 1008; Sanborn v. Van Duyne, 90 Minn. 215, 96 N. W. 41; Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 70 L.R.A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785.

The statute in the case at bar differs materially from others where the right to sell portions of real estate taken by eminent domain has been conferred. The metropolitan water act (Stat. 1895, chap. 488, § 11) authorizes the sale of land "no longer needed for the waterworks," and the lease of "property not then so needed." Property acquired for the metropolitan sewerage system "no longer needed" therefor may be sold (Stat. 1892, chap. 251, § 1), while the metropolitan park commission, "for all purposes not inconsistent with the purposes specified in the act establishing said commission," are given certain modified rights of granting interests in lands. Statutes like these, where the right to sell or lease manifestly is purely incidental to the chief public end, and is confined by fair intentment to land or buildings either once actually needed and used, which have ceased so to be needed, or which by lease may promote the general public aim, afford no support to the broad powers here attempted to be created. See Boston v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 215 Mass. 41, 102 N. E. 79. The same is true of the right to develop and sell power as incidental to a public undertaking. Stat. 895, chap. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

488, § 3; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. 229 U. S. 53, 72, 73, 57 L. ed. 1063, 1079, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 667. An absolute and unqualified power to sell and lease such as the present statute confers is different in kind from the carefully guarded powers conferred by the statutes to which we have referred. Moreover, a right to sell, when no longer needed, property taken or used for a public enterprise requiring extensive works of construction, where during the period of excavation or building land might be needed which would have no use on the completion of the work, is quite distinguishable from land taken for park or reservation purposes.

The taking here is not of a vast extent of wild or unsurveyed land whose agricultural and other possibilities are undiscovered. It is in one of the oldest towns of the state, is relatively small in area, and is a settled community with a large number of cottages, and all its characteristics thoroughly capable of easy comprehension. It requires no discussion to distinguish the power conferred by the present statute from that given to the metropolitan park commission and other like officers to construct or lease buildings manifestly in furtherance of the convenient use by the people of the parks and reservation. A shelter or a restaurant or a bath house, to which all have access on equal terms, do not stand on the same basis as a resort to a considerable extent devoted to cottages to be leased to private families, and from which when leased or sold the public must be excluded.

The cases relied upon by the commonwealth plainly are distinguishable. In Boston v. Talbot, 206 Mass. 82, 91 N. E. 1014, the dominant purpose of the act under consideration was the construction of the tunnel in Boston. Its terms did not permit a taking of land with a contemporaneous knowledge and purpose that a definite and separable part was not necessary for the public use. The authority to sell land taken was conferred only when, in the judgment of the transit commission, it "shall cease to be needed," plainly implying an adjudication that once it had been needed, but by reason of changed conditions was no longer required. The real estate there in question consisted in large part of horizontal planes of a building, a substantial part of one floor of which was used permanently for the tunnel, and considerations of economy in taking an entire estate were weighty in sustaining the statute. The reasoning of that opinion shows a wide divergence from the arguments urged on behalf of the commonwealth, and a reliance upon quite different facts. The only one there relied on which seems to us to have any connection with the case at bar is that it may be cheaper to take the entire estate of the petitioner with the power to sell or lease a part of it, than to take the part intended to be used for a reservation. The dominant purpose of this act affords no justification for the application of that principle. Here no excavations or constructions are contemplated which warrant the inference that any property would be injured in such a way as to cause real apprehensions of future danger which might prove groundless in actual experience or embarrassment in the assessment of damages. Any taking of a part of the property of the petitioner apart would present the ordinary questions of assessment of damage, which are of common occurrence. Moore v. Sanford, 151 Mass. 285, 7 L.R.A. 151, 24 N. E. 323, upheld the constitutionality of a statute which authorized the taking and filling of flats adjacent to flats of the commonwealth, and the subsequent sale of the filled land. But this was on the express ground that it was for the improvement of Boston Harbor, to which was annexed the reclamation of property of little or no worth without such improvement. The principle of development of lands substantially useless under private control, compared with their potential value as part of a general scheme of public improvement through the regulation of the common interests of owners, always has been relied on with caution, although it was held to be constitutional in our early case of Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417, and has been applied in supporting the numerous statutes establishing irrigation districts. Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 41 L. ed. 369, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56; Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 1085, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, 4 Ann. Cas. 1171; Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 200 U. S. 527, 50 L. ed. 581, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, 4 Ann. Cas. 1174. See Otis Co. v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. 186 Mass. 89, 104 Am. St. Rep. 563, 70 N. E. 1009, s. c. 201 U. S. 140, 50 L. ed. 696, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 353; Turner v. Nye, 154 Mass. 579, 582, 14 L.R.A. 487, 28 N. E. 1048; Wurts v. Hoagland, 114 U. S. 606, 29 L. ed. 229, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086. But this principle has no relation to the case at bar. Hellen v. Medford, 188 Mass. 42, 69 L.R.A. 314, 108 Am. St. Rep. 459, 73 N. E. 1070, affords no support to the contention of the commonwealth. The statute there under consideration was held to be unconstitutional, but the plaintiff was not in a position to take advantage of it, a principle frequently applied, but having no bearing upon the issues here raised, where the petitioner from the beginning has as- 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sailed this statute and has done nothing to waive its rights.

It is impossible to separate the valid from the invalid parts of this statute. The power of the commission to take land is inextricably interwoven with the power to sell and lease land so taken. It cannot be determined how the legislature would have dealt with the subject-matter if its attention had been directed specifically to the point that land and buildings, including a large number of dwelling houses, could not be taken for the purpose of lease and sale under the changed conditions of being in the neighborhood of a public reservation, and the expense of the undertaking lessened by the revenue to be derived therefrom. Different financial and other questions would have been presented, which might have caused the general court to have refrained from action, or to have enacted a statute of other tenor. Edwards v. Bruorton, 184 Mass. 529, 69 N. E. 328; Com. v. Hana, 195 Mass. 262, 267, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 799, 122 Am. St. Rep. 251, 81 N. E. 149, 11 Ann. Cas. 514.

We feel constrained to pronounce the statute unconstitutional. It becomes unnecessary to pass upon the other questions raised by the report.

Case remanded to the Land Court for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
EX REL. JOHN MITCHELL, Appt.,
v.
WILLIAM SOHMER, State Comptroller.
Respt.

(209 N. Y. 151, 102 N. E. 593.)

Officers — vacancy — ad interim power of appointment — resignation after adjournment of senate.

Under a statute providing that an office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of Note. — Right of governor or President to make an ad interim appointment to an office whose fixed term expires before the senate's adjournment, where the incumbent is authorized to hold over until his successor is appointed.

This note does not include cases on the question whether, when a new office is created by a legislature or by Congress, the governor or President may invoke his ad interim power of appointment after the adjournment of the legislative body.

The few cases coming within the scope of choosing a successor after the expiration of the term, the governor cannot, where the term expires while the senate is in session, appoint a successor upon the resignation of the incumbent after its adjournment, although under the statute he held over until his successor was appointed, where other portions of the statute provide that a vacancy occurring in the office of one appointed by the governor, with the advice of the senate, shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment was made, but giving the governor ad interim power of appointment if the vacancy occurs other than by expiration of the term while the senate was not in session, and declaring that an office may become vacant by resignation before expiration of the term.

(Cullen, Ch. J., and Werner, J., dissent.)

(June 20, 1913.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Albany County denying a writ of mandamus to compel the state comptroller to pay to relator the salary of the office of commissioner of labor. Affirmed.

this note involve neither the resignation of a hold over nor constitutional or statutory provisions similar to those of the New York statute. The cases referred to uniformly hold that where an officer is legally authorized to hold over and discharge the duties of the office until his successor is appointed, no vacancy arises from the expiration of the term which will warrant the executive exercise of his special or provisional power of appointment. Those cases, unlike PEOPLE EX REL. MITCHELL v. SOHMER, rest upon the theory that so long as there is a legal incumbent there can be no vacancy, and that this theory applies where the incumbent is a hold over. The SOHMER CASE, it will be observed, though holding that there was no vacancy warranting an executive appointment, is based upon the ground that the expiration of the fixed term of office ipso facto created a vacancy, notwithstanding the statutory provision for holding over, and thus forestalled the creation of a vacancy by the resignation of the hold over. Therefore, apart from the statutory provisions involved, the SOHMER CASE would seem opposed to the other decisions on theory, since the logical conclusion to be drawn from the other cases would seem to be that as there was no vacancy upon the expiration of the term, the resignation of the hold over would create a vacancy which might justify executive action.

But there is a fundamental theory which the SOHMER CASE has in common with the others, and that is that the various statutory and constitutional provisions indicate clearly a purpose to circumscribe the appointing power of the governor or President so far as it can be done consistently with the public welfare; but it is also a fundamental theory recognized by the courts, that the makers of Constitutions and statutes were just as much influenced by a desire to provide against all contingencies which might result in the existence of an office without an incumbent. In the main it may be said that the executive's power of provisional appointment is given for, and only for, the purpose of providing against the temporary lapse of a governmental function as a result of there being in office no legal incumbent to exercise that function. It would seem, therefore, that whenever possible, the statutory and constitutional provisions should be so construed as to diminish rather than increase the possibility of official vacancies.

It has already been stated that the courts are quite generally agreed that, so long as there is in office a person legally authorized to hold the same and discharge its duties, whether he be one lawfully elected or appointed for a fixed term or whether he be a hold over, there is no vacancy within the meaning of statutory or constitutional provision authorizing special or temporary appointment by the executive. As an illustration of the attitude of the courts on this more general question, reference may be had to an early New York case denying the right of the governor to appoint, even where the term expired after the legislative adjournment, and holding that the sole object of such an ad interim appointment was to prevent a public injury through want of an incumbent until an appointment could be made in the regular mode, and that where there was a hold-over provision there was no vacancy entitling the governor to appoint. Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige, 507, affirmed in 7 Hill, 259.

So it is, when the courts come down to the question as to ad interim appointments where the term expires during a session of the legislature, but the statute provides for holding over. In such circumstances the courts hold in the case of an officer appointed by the legislature or either body thereof, or by the governor, with the advice and consent of the legislature or either body, that there is no vacancy at the end of the term, since the "hold-over" provision is expressly designed to meet such a contingency, and that the governor cannot exercise his special power of appointment when the term of office expires during a legislative session. It is so held where the constitutional or statutory provision relating to ad interim appointments provides that when an officer ordinarily appointed with the consent of the legislature shall, during the recess, die or his office in any manner "become vacant," the governor shall have power to fill, etc. (People ex rel. Ewing v. Forquer, 1 Breece [Ill.] 68); or under a constitutional or statutory provision that where the power is to be exercised when the vacancy "occurs or happens"

Statement by Chase, J.:

The relator applied to the supreme court for a writ of mandamus to compel the state comptroller to issue his warrant for the payment of salary to which the relator asserts he is entitled by virtue of his incumbency of the office of state commissioner of labor, to which he claims to have been appointed by the governor on May 16, 1913; and the question is whether the relator was legally appointed to the office of commissioner of labor. At special term the writ was denied, and in the appellate division there was an affirmance by a divided court. The facts are undisputed.

Prior to January 1, 1913, John Williams held the office of state labor commissioner under a regular appointment for a term of four years, which expired on December 31, 1912. On April 21, 1913, the legislature then being in regular session, the governor nominated John Mitchell for the office and sent his name to the senate for confirmation. On May 2, 1913, the senate notified the governor of its refusal to confirm the nomination. On May 3, 1913, the governor again nominated Mitchell and sent his name to the senate. The senate at once acted adversely upon the nomination and adjourned sine die. On the 16th day of May, 1913, when the legislature is not in session (State ex rel. Carson v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663, 16 N. E. 384; State ex rel. Lyon v. Bowden, 92 S. C. 393, 75 S. E. 866). To the same effect is State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Rareside, 32 La. Ann. 934, in which the court states that such a result is demanded by the Louisiana constitutional and statutory provisions, but does not disclose their language. Indeed, a like result was reached in State ex rel. Tredway v. Lusk, 18 Mo. 333, under a constitutional provision that when any office shall become vacant the governor shall fill such vacancy. The same is true of State ex rel. Wagner v. Compson, 34 Or. 25, 54 Pac. 349.

In Re District Attorney, 7 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 786, Fed. Cas. No. 3,924, denying the President's right to make an ad interim appointment where the term expired during a session of the Senate, the court expressed the opinion that the provision of the tenure of office at that certain appointive officers should hold office until their successors should be appointed did not, in view of a further provision that nothing in the act should be construed to extend any term of office limited by law, be regarded as extending the term so as to warrant an ad interim appointment of a successor whose fixed term expired during a session of the Senate, under the constitutional provision giving the President power to fill all vacancies that might happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which should expire at the end of their next session. But in reaching its decision it seems that the court laid greater stress on the fact that the person whose successor was sought to be appointed in the case was in office at the time of the enactment of the tenure of office act, and that therefore the "hold-over" provision did not apply, irrespective of the effect of the provision that nothing in the act should be construed to extend any fixed term of office. It is also to be noted that the court construed the word "happen" in the constitutional provision giving the President power of ad interim appointment to mean not merely "happen to exist," but to be confined to cases in which a vacancy should for the first time occur during the recess of the Senate.

So, where one is, under constitutional authority, appointed to fill an unexpired term of an elective judgeship whose incumbent has resigned, he takes the latter's right to hold over until the election of the successor, and the governor therefore has no right at the expiration of the regular term to make an appointment. State ex rel. Hoyt v. Metcalfe, 80 Ohio St. 244, 88 N. E. 738.

Attention is also directed to Brady v. Howe, 50 Miss. 607, holding that where a fixed term will expire during a recess of the senate, the governor cannot make an ad interim appointment to which the Constitution requires the consent of the senate, where it is provided by statute that the governor shall appoint by and with the consent of the senate where the term is about to expire.

In view of the fact that in numerous jurisdictions the courts have been called upon to decide whether a hold-over provision is a limitation upon the power of choosing a successor, it may well be that the New York legislature, in providing that "after the expiration of such term, the office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor," merely intended to dispense with the necessity of a judicial construction in New York, and to make it clear that the hold-over provision should not prevent the selection of a successor in the regular mode; that is, with the consent and advice of the senate. While it is true that under the express provision of the statute there was a vacancy in a sense upon the expiration of the term, it is to be observed that in the prevailing opinion in the SOHMER CASE no reference is made to that provision of § 5 which declares that an officer holding over for one or more entire terms shall, for the purpose of choosing his successor, be regarded as having been newly chosen for such term. This latter provision is said by Judge Cullen in his dissenting opinion to make it clear that the words, "expiration of the term," as used in the statute, meant not merely the period of time for which the officer is in the first instance appointed, but the time which, under the law, he has a right to serve, and that in the true sense of the word all of that period constituted the incumbent's term.

Williams sent his resignation to the governor, which was accepted, and thereupon Mitchell was appointed to fill the vacancy which is claimed to have been thus created.

Mr. D. Cady Herrick, for appellant:

The governor has the right to fill a vacancy in an office of an officer appointed by the governor by and with the consent of the senate when such vacancy occurs or exists otherwise than by the expiration of a term, while the senate is not in session. In this case there was no vacancy occurring or existing while the senate was in session except for the purpose of appointing a successor to the then incumbent.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question involved on this appeal is not intricate. It is very simple, and depends upon a construction of the public officers law. Did the office of commissioner of labor become vacant at the expiration of the term of commissioner Williams, and remain so vacant within the meaning of that law for the purpose of choosing a new incumbent for that office? The office did become and was vacant, that is, empty, unoccupied, without an incumbent after the expiration of Commissioner Williams' term, "for the purpose of choosing his (the incumbent's) successor." That is the express provision of the statute. It is urged that the words quoted should not be construed to prevent an ad interim appointment in case of an actual "vacancy occurring or existing" in an office when the senate is not in session, although the actual vacancy occurs after the expiration of such term of office. The statute does not so qualify its general language.

We are not referred to any decision construing the statute now in force upon the exact question in controversy. Most of the decisions discussed by counsel were rendered when other statutes were in force. The words of § 5 of the public officers law (Consol. Laws, chap. 47) as follows: "After the expiration of such term (term of office), the office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor,"—were new in § 5 of chapter 681 of the Laws of 1892, from which § 5 of the public officers law was taken. Neither the words quoted nor any similar language were included in the Revised Statutes (part 1, chap. 5, title 6), although it was therein provided that every public officer appointed, with certain named exceptions, "shall continue to discharge the duties thereof, although his term of office shall have expired, until a successor in such office shall be duly qualified." Section 9.

The following, among other decisions in this state, relied upon by the relator, were rendered prior to said statute of 1892 in the construction of statutes existing at the time when the several decisions were rendered: Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige, 507; People ex rel. Simpson v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. 515; People ex rel. Brown v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 355. The commissioners of statutory revision in their notes say that "the provisions of § 5 as to appointment of successors of officers holding over after expiration of term will clear the law on the subject of its present ambiguity." The decisions of other states and in the Federal courts, called to our attention, are each based upon the particular statutes under consideration. The question involved on this appeal is without controlling precedent.

What did the legislature intend by the words, "The office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor?" It did not mean that the office was wholly vacant for all purposes, because the language quoted is used in connection with the provision that every officer, with the exceptions named, who enters upon the duties of his office, shall, "unless the office shall terminate or be abolished, hold over and continue to discharge the duties of his office, after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been chosen, until his successor shall be chosen and qualify." It intended that the office be deemed vacant in every respect so far as it relates to a new incumbent as fully as if the provision for a hold over had not been therein included.

The statute deals with vacancies occurring in an office when the incumbent is appointed for a prescribed term. A vacancy by expiration of the term of office is a certain event to occur at a known time. The statute also deals with vacancies that may arise before the expiration of the term of office by death or other event, the time of which is not known. It provides for filling vacancies in the two classes of cases. I quote from the statute:

"§ 39. A vacancy which shall occur during the session of the senate, in the office of an officer appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall be filled in the same manner as an original appointment. Such a vacancy occurring or existing otherwise than by expiration of term, while the senate is not in session, shall be filled by the governor for a term which shall expire at the end of twenty days from the commencement of the next meeting of the senate."

"§ 30. Every office shall be vacant upon the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term thereof: (1) The death of the incumbent; (2) his resignation; (3) his removal from office; (4) his ceasing to be an inhabitant of the state, or, if he be a local officer, of the political subdivision or municipal corporation of which he is required to be a resident when chosen; (5) his conviction of a felony, or a crime involving a violation of his oath of office; (6) the judgment of a court declaring void his election or appointment, or that his office is forfeited or vacant; (7) his refusal or neglect to file his official oath or undertaking, if one is required, before or within fifteen days after the commencement of the term of office for which he is chosen, if an elective office, or, if an appointive office, within fifteen days after notice of his appointment, or within fifteen days after the commencement of such term; or to file a renewal undertaking within the time required by law, or, if no time be so specified, within fifteen days after notice to him in pursuance of law, that such renewal undertaking is required. When a new office or an additional incumbent of an existing office shall be created, such office shall, for the purposes of an appointment or election, be vacant from the date of its creation, until it shall be filled by election or appointment."

"§ 5. Every officer except a judicial officer, a notary public, a commissioner of deeds, and an officer whose term is fixed by the Constitution, having duly entered on the duties of his office, shall, unless the office shall terminate or be abolished, hold over and continue to discharge the duties of his office, after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been chosen, until his successor shall be chosen and qualified; but after the expiration of such term, the office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor. An officer so holding over for one or more entire terms shall, for the purpose of choosing his successor, be regarded as having been newly chosen for such terms. An appointment for a term shortened by reason of a predecessor holding over shall be for the residue of the term only."

It is assumed without controversy that Commissioner Williams' term of office expired during the session of the senate, and although he remained in office as a hold over, as prescribed by § 5 that section also provides that "the office shall be (is) deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor." Such vacancy continues until a new incumbent is chosen. It does not end with the adjournment of the senate, to occur again when the senate reconvenes.

For the purpose of determining whether the statute contemplates another and different vacancy arising by reason of some uncertain event affecting a hold-over incumbent after the expiration of a fixed term of office, the first words of § 30 are important. That section provides that "every office shall be vacant upon the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term thereof." The same is true of the language of § 39 as follows: "A vacancy occurring or existing otherwise than by expiration of term, while the senate is not in session, shall be filled by the governor" as therein provided.

The statute, as we have seen, deals with vacancies occurring by reason of the expiration of a term of office, which is a certain event, and a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term of office, which is an uncertain event. The occurrence of any of the events mentioned in § 30 after the expiration of the term does not create a vacancy for the purpose of an appointment of a successor incumbent, to be filled temporarily by the governor, because the vacancy for the purpose of choosing a successor has existed by reason of the statute from the date of the expiration of the term. The right to choose a successor incumbent depends upon the statute, and not upon the event which removed the hold over incumbent.

It is plain as an abstract proposition, apart from the words of any provision in regard thereto, that no vacancy can be wrought in any office by the act or fault of the incumbent after the expiration of the term for which he was first entitled to hold it. People ex rel. Jackson v. Potter, 47 N. Y. 375. The governor's power to make an ad interim appointment is confined to cases of actual vacancies arising from events occurring before the expiration of the term of the incumbent of an office. In all cases other than a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term of office, the vacancy, for the purpose of appointing a successor incumbent, is deemed to exist from the date of the expiration of the term of office.

In view of the general purpose and express language of the statute, it appears that it was not the intention of the legislature, in providing when an office shall be deemed vacant, to qualify or restrict the purpose in any way so far as it relates to choosing a new incumbent, nor did it intend to permit a temporary or ad interim appointment by the governor if an actual vacancy occurs after the expiration of the term in an office occupied by a hold over. By such construction, force and effect is given to the language of the statute and to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the purpose of revising it as expressed by the commissioners of statutory revision.

The public service is not endangered by the provisions of the statute. It is provided by § 41 of the labor law (Consol. Laws, chap. 31), in substance, that the duties of an office in case of an actual vacancy devolve upon the deputy. If the governor considers an occasion extraordinary, he can call the senate together to consider an appointment by him. Const. art. 4, § 4.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

Willard Bartlett, Collin, Cuddeback, and Hogan, JJ., concur.

Cullen, Ch. J., dissenting:

In 1912 John Williams was commissioner of labor, the duration of whose office was four years, which expired December 31, 1912. The office is one created by statute (Laws 1909, chap. 36, § 40, as amended by Laws 1913, chap. 145), which provides that the officer shall be appointed by the governor with the consent of the senate. A successor to Williams has never been appointed; the first step for that purpose having been taken on April 21, 1913, when the governor sent the name of John Mitchell, the relator, to the senate for confirmation as commissioner of labor, but the nomination was rejected. On May 3, 1913, the governor against nominated the relator to the office and again the relator was rejected. Under the Constitution the legislature convened on January 1, 1913, and the senate continued in session until May 3d, when it adjourned sine die. Mr. Williams, despite the expiration of the period for which he had been appointed to office, under the provisions of the public officers law (§ 5) continued to hold his office till May 16th, on which date, after the adjournment of the senate, he resigned his office, and thereupon the governor appointed the relator to fill the vacancy. The relator duly qualified. At the expiration of the month the comptroller declined to pay the relator his official salary on the ground that his appointment was made by the governor without authority of law, and thereupon the relator applied for a mandamus to compel such payment. The special term held that it was invalid and denied his application for the writ, and that decision has been affirmed by the appellate division by a divided court.

The only question in the case is the validity of the relator's appointment. The Constitution (article 10, § 5) prescribes that the legislature shall provide for filling vacancies in office. Therefore the determination of this proceeding depends solely upon the statute law on the subject, the material parts of which are the following sections of the public officers law (Consol. Laws, chap. 47):

Section 5: "Every officer except a judicial officer, a notary public, a commissioner of deeds, and an officer whose term is fixed by the Constitution, having duly entered on the duties of his office, shall, unless the office shall terminate or be abolished, hold over and continue to discharge the duties of his office, after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been chosen, until his successor shall be chosen and qualified; but after the expiration of such term, the office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor. An officer so holding over for one or more entire terms shall, for the purpose of choosing his successor, be regarded as having been newly chosen for such terms. An appointment for a term shortened by reason of a predecessor holding over shall be for the residue of the term only."

Section 30: "Every office shall be vacant upon the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term thereof: (1) The death of the incumbent; (2) his resignation; (3) his removal from office; (4) his ceasing to be an inhabitant of the state, or, if he be a local officer, of the political subdivision or municipal corporation of which he is required to be a resident when chosen; (5) his conviction of a felony, or a crime involving a violation of his oath of office; (6) the judgment of a court, declaring void his election or appointment, or that his office is forfeited or vacant. . . ."

Section 31: "Public officers may resign their offices as follows: 1. The governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, comptroller, attorney general, state engineer, and surveyor, to the legislature; (2) all officers appointed by the governor alone, or by him with the consent of the senate, to the governor; . . . every resignation shall be in writing addressed to the officer or body to whom it is made. If addressed to an officer, it shall take effect upon delivery to him at his place of business or when it shall be filed in his office. . . ."

Section 38: "If an appointment of a person to fill a vacancy in an appointive office be made by the officer, or by the officers, body or board of officers, authorized to make appointments to the office for the full term, the person so appointed to such vacancy shall hold office for the balance of the unexpired term. . . ."

Section 39: "A vacancy which shall occur during the session of the senate, in the office of an officer appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall be filled in the same manner as an original appointment. Such a vacancy occurring or existing otherwise than by expiration of term, while the senate is not in session, shall be filled by the governor for a term which shall expire at the end of twenty days from the commencement of the next meeting of the senate."

It will be seen that by § 39, so far as it applies to officers of the character of the one in this controversy, the governor's power to fill a vacancy is subject to only a single exception (that is, a vacancy by expiration of term); and the power is given whether the vacancy occurs or exists when the senate is not in session, though in this case when Williams resigned the senate was not in session. The decision of the controversy before us depends upon the determination of what was the vacancy which the governor's appointment on May 16th was operative to fill. The learned courts below have held, and the attorney general contends, that the only vacancy in the office claimed by the relator is the vacancy created by the expiration, with the end of the year 1912, of the period for which Williams had been appointed to office. If this position is correct, then the appointment of the relator was invalid, and right here is the crux of the whole controversy. By § 5 of the public officers law, hitherto quoted, it is provided that every officer, with certain exceptions (which do not include the one before us), shall hold over and continue the discharge of the duties of the office after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been chosen, until his successor shall be chosen and qualified. If the section ended here, there would be no room for controversy. The failure to appoint or elect his successor in office, or a failure of such successor to duly qualify, would not create a vacancy, because despite of such failures there would be a person entitled by law to continue in the office and discharge its duties. The scheme of officials holding over despite the expiration of the original term has prevailed in this state from early times, and also is prevalent in other states.

The decisions are uniform both in this state and in the other states so far as they are cited to us by the attorney general, that where there is a provision for a holding over there can be no vacancy in the office. In Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige, 507, the complainant was a flour inspector appointed by the governor, with the consent of the senate, to hold office for two years. There was a failure to appoint his successor, and, under a provision substantially the same as that extant to-day, authorizing the governor to fill vacancies by temporary appointments expiring twenty days after the commencement of the next meeting of the senate, the defendant had been appointed to the office to fill the vacancy. Then, as now, the statute law was that every officer, with few exceptions, should hold over until a successor in office should have been duly appointed and qualified. The chancellor held that there was no vacancy in office because the hold over was the legal incumbent of the office. The same rule was declared by the supreme court in People ex rel. Simpson v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. 515, 518, where Chief Justice Savage said: "It will be seen, too, that the word 'vacancies' is applicable to cases where officers have been duly chosen or appointed, and not to the cases where there has been an omission to elect at the annual town meeting. In such cases there is, in fact, no vacancy, because the officers of the preceding year hold the offices until others are chosen or appointed in their places and have qualified." The decisive authority on this point is the case of People ex rel. Brown v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 355. In that case the statute had authorized the comptroller of the city of New York to appoint three commissioners of taxes and assessments of the city of New York, who should hold office for the term of five years or until others were appointed in their places. Any vacancy in said board, by death, resignation, or otherwise, was to be filled by said comptroller. No authority was given to appoint their successors. The relator was one of the original appointees. After the expiration of his term the defendant was appointed by the comptroller in his stead. It was urged that, even if the power conferred by the statute upon the comptroller was not continuous, still the appointment of the defendant was valid under the authority given the comptroller to fill vacancies. It was held that there was no vacancy, as the original appointees were authorized to hold over until others were appointed in their places. The doctrine was recognized in People ex rel. Woods v. Crissey, 91 N. Y. 616, and People ex rel. Kehoe v. Fitchie, 76 Hun, 80, 28 N. Y. Supp. 600. In People ex rel. Lovett v. Randall, 151 N. Y. 497, 45 N. E. 841, the rule was held to apply to the case of a failure to elect by reason of a tie vote. The cases cited by the learned attorney general from other states are to the same effect (People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 407; State ex rel. Carson v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663, 16 N. E. 384; Smoot v. Somerville, 59 Md. 84), as are the textbooks. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 128; Throop, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pub. Off. § 330. The concluding portion of the sentence, "but after the expiration of such term, the office shall be deemed vacant for the purpose of choosing his successor," does not change the rule. It does not declare that the office shall be vacant, but that it shall be deemed vacant for one particular purpose, and one only, for the purpose of choosing his successor. Expressio unius exclusio alterius. It is just at this point that, in my opinion, the learned judge at special term erred. He considered that expiration of Williams' term without the legal appointment of his successor rendered the office wholly vacant. As already shown, that view conflicts with the uniform current of authority both in this and other states.

If, therefore, the office has become vacant at all, it has been occasioned by the subsequent resignation of Williams. It is urged by the attorney general that the act of Williams in resigning the office cannot increase the power granted the governor by the statute, and authorize him by his sole act, without confirmation by the senate, to appoint a successor to Williams. That is undoubtedly true. A claim to the contrary would be preposterous. But in appointing the relator the governor has not appointed Williams' successor but only a person to fill the office until Williams' successor is appointed according to law, subject, however, to the further limitation that the appointment will expire twenty days after the session of the senate next after his appointment convenes, whether a successor to Williams has been legally appointed at that time or not.

It is contended that Williams could not resign the office, because at the time of his resignation he had nothing to resign, and People ex rel. Jackson v. Potter, 47 N. Y. 375, is cited as authority for the proposition. That case involved the title to the office of justice of the supreme court. It has no application to the present case, for judicial officers do not hold over after the expiration of the term for which they are chosen, and, hence, clearly have nothing to resign. A little reflection will dispose of the point. It is conceded that on May 15th Williams lawfully held office, and that on May 17th he was not in office. Williams did not die nor remove from the state, nor was he convicted of a felony. What possible thing effected his removal from office between May 15th and May 17th, except his resignation on May 16th? This would seem to render further discussion unnecessary. If the contention is right, then there has been no provision in the statute since 1892, and possibly never, for filling a vacancy in office caused by the death or resignation of a hold over. There are all the constitutional officers of counties and municipalities whose successors cannot constitutionally be filled save by an election. In case of the death or resignation of one of these, the office must remain vacant till the next election. The report of the revisers who prepared the law of 1892 states that the change in the section was not to change the law hitherto prevailing, but merely "to clear the law on that subject of its present ambiguity."

It is further contended that, as by § 30 of the public officers law the event which renders an office vacant must happen before the expiration of the term, the resignation of Williams did not render the office vacant within the meaning of the statute. This is too narrow a construction of the law. Though at common law office was considered a burden, not an advantage, and though even now as to some town offices, such as commissioner of highways and others, a refusal to serve subjects the person elected to a penalty, the law of this state empowers any incumbent to resign his office, and by such resignation the office is vacated ipso facto. Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 378, 387. It requires no acceptance, but takes effect on delivery to the person to whom it is addressed. Pub. off. law, § 31. Williams, therefore, had the same right to resign while holding over that he had during his original term. The events which render an office vacant must be equally applicable to the case of a hold over as to one serving his original term. One is his ceasing to be an inhabitant of the state or, if he be a local officer, of the political subdivision of which he is required to be a resident. Another, the conviction of the incumbent of a felony. Surely, if these things should disqualify an incumbent from serving his original term, equally they should disqualify him from serving as a hold over. When the expression is used in the statute, "before the expiration of his term," it means not merely the period of time for which the officer is in the first instance elected or appointed, but the time which under the law he has the right to serve, and in the true sense of the word all of that period is the incumbent's term. This is made clear by the concluding provision in § 5, which provides that "an officer so holding over for one or more entire terms shall, for the purpose of choosing his successor, be regarded as having been newly chosen for such terms."

attorney general that "Mr. Williams' resignation transforms not at all the appointing power from governor and senate to governor. It does have this effect, however, that of creating a natural vacancy." That concession disposes of the case. It is the actual vacancy, and only the actual vacancy, which is contemplated by the Constitution and the statutes in the various provisions as to the filling vacancies in office. Here again I quote from a case cited by the attorney general (State ex rel. Carson v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663, 16 N. E. 384); "The word 'vacancy,' as applied to an office, has no technical meaning." It is urged that such a situation is met by the provision that the deputy of an officer shall possess the powers and perform the duties of his principal during the absence or inability to act of his principal, or during a vacancy in his principal's office. Pub. off. law, § 9. In many cases an officer has no deputy, and in the present case the power of the deputy of the commissioner of labor is restricted by excepting from the power conferred upon him that of removing his subordinates. But this claim is disposed of by authority. A county clerk died. At the time of his death he had appointed, as was required by law, a deputy under a statute which provided when the office of any county clerk shall become vacant his deputy should perform all the duties, and be entitled to all the emoluments, and be subjected to all the penalties, pertaining to the office of the county clerk of a county and until a new clerk should be elected or appointed for such county and duly sworn. The governor made an appointment to fill the vacancy. The deputy claimed that the case was excepted from the statute relating to vacancies because of the power conferred upon him to discharge the duties of the clerk. It was held that the claim was untenable and that the appointment by the governor was valid. People ex rel. Smith v. Fisher, 24 Wend. 215. To the same effect, see People ex rel. Henderson v. Snedeker, 14 N. Y. 52. It follows that the relator has got good title to the office until twenty days after the commencement of the session of the senate first succeeding his appointment.

The orders of the special term and of the appellate division should be reversed, and the application for a writ of mandamus granted, with costs in this court and $10 costs of motion.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF PORTLAND

v.

INMAN POULSEN LUMBER COMPANY
et al.

Estoppel — upon municipality to open street.

1. A city is estopped to open streets through property upon which a great industrial plant has been placed at its solicitation, so long as they are occupied for the purpose of such plant, where its mayor, upon inquiry by the owners of the plant as to streets, the existence of which through the property was doubtful, informed them that if they existed they were of no use

- II. Doctrine that municipality cannot be estopped, 1211.
- III. Doctrine that municipality may be estopped.
 - a. In general, 1212.
 - b. Requisites of estoppel.

 2. Mere possession, 1213.
 3. Possession not adverse, 1214.
 4. Duration of elements of estoppel, 1215.
 - c. Particular cases, 1216.

I. In general.

The note has, in general, been confined to the question of estoppel as it affects a municipality in opening up a street through a plat or tract where no street has existed except on paper, and does not in general include cases in which there is an obstruction of a public street and an attempt to remove it by the municipality, such as Fresno v. Fresno Canal & Irrig. Co. 98 Cal. 179, 32 Pac. 943, involving the obstruction of a public street by a canal; Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 72 Iowa, 437, 34 N. W. 197, infra, involving the obstruction of a public street by a mill race.

Although it is held by some courts that the statute of limitations may run against a municipality so as to prevent it claiming for street purposes land in the adverse possession of private parties, yet the weight of authority is to the effect that the statute does not apply to a municipal corporation in its public capacity, and that land set apart for street purposes cannot be acquired by adverse possession. 1 Cyc. 1118; Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. §§ 1189, 1193. See also note in 26 L.R.A. 449, referred to below. That question, however, is beyond the scope of this note.

To avoid the operation of a doctrine that might work a hardship in certain cases by permitting a municipality to claim land as a street after improvements had been erect-and would never be claimed by the city, upon which information the proprietors acted in establishing the plant.

Pleading — estoppel — sufficiency.

2. Failure to plead a technical estoppel is not fatal in equity if all facts necessary to constitute it are pleaded, and no objection is made to the form of pleading.

(Burnett, J., dissents.)

(July 15, 1913.)

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin the obstruction of certain streets; plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as denied its right to immediate reed thereon by one claiming the land as private property, or after a long-continued user of the same as private property with no claim on the part of the municipal authorities of the land as a street, the doctrine of equitable estoppel has been applied by some courts, and where it would be inequitable for the municipality's claim to prevail, it has been held estopped from claiming the land for street purposes, although it may have been dedicated and never abandoned.

As to estoppel of the municipality to assert true line where abutting owner has made improvements with reference to what was erroneously supposed to be street boundary line, see note to Oliver v. Synhorst, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 243.

And see also on another phase of estoppel of municipalities, the note to Bangor v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1187, as to the effect of acquiescence or consent by town or municipality to construction or use of a railroad in street or highway, to estop it from objecting thereto.

See note to Maire v. Kruse, 26 L.R.A. 449, as to abandonment of a highway by nonuser or otherwise than by the act of the public authorities, and especially subdivision IV. thereof, on equitable estoppel.

See note to Meyer v. Graham, as to rights acquired as against the public by adverse possession of highway or city street, 18 L.R.A. 146.

II. Doctrine that municipality cannot be estopped.

That a municipality may be estopped has been vigorously denied in Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 21 L.R.A. 62, 13 So. 289, where there had been a dedication of land as a public street, but the same had not been used by the public for more than forty years, and there was held to be nothing to prevent the municipality from opening the street at any time it desired. "No statute of limitations," says the court, "or principle of repose, obtains here; neither the statute of limitations, nor the rule which carries title to adverse possession, lief, and defendants appealing from so much as recognized a public right in the streets when defendants' particular use of the property ceased. Affirmed.

Statement by McBride, Ch. J.:

This is a suit brought by the city of Portland to restrain defendants from obstructing certain streets situated in what was formerly known as Stephen's addition to the city of East Portland, which, by the consolidation of the two cities, has become a part of the present city of Portland. The pleadings with their exhibits would occupy several hundred pages of the Oregon reports, and are therefore omitted; it being sufficient to state that they are broad enough in their scope to cover all the contentions of the parties, and that the evidence adduced fully justified the findings of fact made by the circuit court.

Said findings are as follows:

"(1) That the city of Portland is a municipal corporation within Multnomah county, state of Oregon.

"(2) That the city of East Portland was incorporated by an act of the legislative assembly of the state of Oregon on the 29th day of October, 1870.

"(3) That Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company, at the times mentioned in the complaint, was, and now is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Oregon.

"(4) That on the 8th day of June, 1869, James B. Stephens and Elizabeth Stephens nor the doctrine of staleness, equitable estoppel, or prescription, can be invoked or applied against the right of the city of Demopolis and of the public to have this street opened from end to end and from side to side. . . . The city never had any alienable title or right in the street. It could never have granted it, or any part of it, away, for any purpose whatever. Having no power of direct alienation, it could not pass title indirectly by submitting, for the statutory period, the private possession, claim, and use."

It is not clear that the question of estoppel received much consideration in Louisiana Ice Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 217, 9 So. 21. The only contention with reference to estoppel that was made in that case was that the city was estopped by the collection of taxes on the land in question. This contention was denied, but it is not clear whether on the ground that estoppel does not exist against a municipal corporation, or on the ground that it did not exist in this particular case. See further statements as to this case infra, III. b.

A borough was held not estopped from opening up a street across a railroad right of way, by a permission given previously by some of the borough officials to the railroad company to inclose a part of the street, and the act of some borough official in indicating, by placing curbing and replacing the same across the street, that the use of the street as a highway was abandoned, where the borough officials have no power to confer a right upon anyone to inclose a public highway against the public, in Seabright v. Central R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 625, 64 Atl. 131, apparently the decision is on the theory that estoppel does not exist against a municipality. See Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46, discussed in the note in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249.

That estoppel does not apply to a municipality to prevent its claiming land dedicated as a street is also decided in Krause v. El Paso. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 101 S. W. 828, a case not within the scope of the present note.

See also discussion of Ralston v. Wes- 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ton, 46 W. Va. 544, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, 33 S. E. 326, in note in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 243.

III. Doctrine that municipality may be estopped.

a. In general.

The greater number of courts that have considered this doctrine have held it applicable to municipal corporations, and have held estoppel to exist or not to exist according to the facts of the particular case.

The elements that are essential to create an estoppel against a municipality, to prevent the opening or use of a street, have not been separated so that it can be stated with certainty just what elements will and what will not work an estoppel. There are usually several elements in a case, and these are treated together in determining whether the estoppel exists. In South Carolina the only criterion is whether it would be inequitable to allow the municipality to open and use the street.

Thus the courts of this state take the view that where possession is accompanied by other circumstances which, as stated above, would render it inequitable for the municipality to assert its right to gain possession of the streets, the municipality may be estopped from asserting such right. Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 327, 34 Am. St. Rep. 752, 15 S. E. 951.

As to whether in a particular case it would be inequitable to allow the municipality to open the streets was held to be a question of fact in Chafee v. Aiken, 57 S. C. 507, 35 S. E. 800, 36 S. E. 3, an action for injunction, and also for damages on account of the destruction of a number of shade trees on the land in question.

That estoppel may exist against a municipality is recognized also in Simplot v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 McCrary, 158, 16 Fed. 350.

The court, in Sacramento v. Clunie, 120 Cal. 29, 52 Pac. 44, states that it is only in exceptional cases that the doctrine of were the owners and in possession of a certain portion of the James B. Stephens donation land claim, and he, the said James B. Stephens, filed a plat of said portion and designated the same as Stephens's addition to East Portland, and that on said plat there was shown the shore line of Stephen slough, and on said plat there were shown certain dotted lines within the bounds of said Stephens slough.

"(5) That said Stephens slough as shown upon said plat or map was surrounded by a high bank about 50 feet above the level of the water in said slough on the north bank, and 35 feet above the level of the water on the south bank thereof; and on said map or plat the portion of said slough containing water was shown with blue coloring, the same as the portion shown of the Willamette river, which likewise was shown with blue coloring, and the same was and is recorded in Book 1 at page 529, Records of Deeds of Multnomah county, Oregon.

"(6) That the premises hereinafter described were situated within the bounds of the city of East Portland after its incorporation.

"(7) That among the other various powers granted to the city of East Portland were the following: Article 4, § 1, subd. 3, enumerating the powers of the board of trustees: 'To prevent and remove nuisances. 11th. To remove all obstructions from the public highways or streets.'

"(8) That on July 30, 1885, there was passed by the city of East Portland Ordinance equitable estoppel may be invoked against a municipality, and indicates that on the facts of that case, which show that possession had been maintained by the defendant and his grantors for forty years, and during this time large sums of money had been expended upon the property in permanent improvements, estoppel would not be allowed. The city in this case based its right to recover upon an alleged dedication by the owners to the public as streets, and this was found against the municipality by the trial court and affirmed by the supreme court, and the decision is based upon this ground.

Where one highway has been substituted for another, and such other has been inclosed with adjoining land so that, if it were opened, it would pass through the walls of buildings, orchards, and cultivated land, to the great injury of the farm, the court, in Almy v. Church, 18 R. I. 182, 26 Atl. 58, held that the old right had been transferred to the new way, so that the municipality would be prevented from opening the old highway, and then adds: "Judge Dillon puts it upon the ground of an estoppel in pais, but the principle of substitution appears to us to be a stronger ground."

b. Requisites of estoppel.

1. In general.

Estoppel exists against a municipality, to prevent the opening or use of land for street purposes, where there is long-continued nonuser by the municipality, together with the possession by private parties in good faith and in the belief that its use as a street has been abandoned, and the erection of valuable improvements thereon without objection from the municipality, which has knowledge thereof, so that to reclaim the land would result in great damage to those in possession. Lee v. Mound Station, 118 Ill. 304, 8 N. E. 759; Lee v. Harris, 206 Ill. 428, 99 Am. St. Rep. 176, 69 N. E. 230. See also, III. c. infra, for cases supporting this general proposition.

2. Mere possession.

The mere fact of possession, however, by private parties and nonuser by the municipality, will not create an equitable estoppel. El Paso v. Hoagland, 224 Ill. 263, 79 N. E. 658; Lee v. Harris, 206 Ill. 428, 99 Am. St. Rep. 176, 69 N. E. 230; Burroughs v. Cherokee, 134 Iowa, 429, 109 N. W. 876. See Taraldson v. Lime Springs, 92 Iowa, 187, 60 N. W. 658, infra.

Neither is mere silence on the part of the city, and indulging the adjoining landowner, who had knowledge of all the facts, in the use of the street for a time, although it induces the belief that the street would not be opened, sufficient to work an estoppel against the municipality. Solberg v. Decorah, 41 Iowa, 501.

Thus, in Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 72 Iowa, 437, 34 N. W. 197, where the city had simply remained silent and done nothing to encourage a mill owner in constructing a mill race in the street under a claim of right, and had allowed him to maintain possession for more than ten years, there was held to be no estoppel against the city.

Although Solberg v. Decorah, supra, seems to require some affirmative action on the part of the municipality, such has not been made a requirement in subsequent cases in this state. Affirmative action on the part of the municipality appears in some of the cases in which an estoppel was held to exist. These affirmative acts are of various kinds. The collection of assessments (Simplot v. Dubuque, 49 Iowa, 630), or taxes (Uptagraff v. Smith, 106 Iowa, 385, 76 N. W. 733), or an attempted vacation (Blennerhasset v. Forest City, 117 Iowa, 680, 91 N. W. 1044), are affirmative acts in cases in which estoppel was held to exist against the municipality.

It does not appear that the land had been dedicated and accepted as a street in Simplot v. Dubuque and Uptagraff v. Smith, supra, nor that there had been an acceptance of the street in Blennerhasset v. Forest City, but in the last named case this was treated unimportant in view of the facts of the case.

nance No. 501, defining the duties of street commissioners, which provides, 'The street commissioner shall keep an office at the council chamber at which he shall attend at least once each day to receive and act on such petitions and business as may be brought before him; he shall keep himself thoroughly informed of the condition of all streets and highways, alleys, etc.; he shall see that no obstructions are allowed to remain upon the streets, alleys, or sidewalks; he shall cause the removal of all nuisances on the streets and public grounds,' which ordinance was in force and effect from said date to the time of the consolidation of the cities of East Portland and Portland.

"(9) That the city of East Portland in 1885 established all street grades at that time, and did not establish any street grade or grades through any of the premises described in the complaint or answer herein, being the property in controversy, but established grades at that time all around the said premises so described. That neither the city of East Portland nor the city of Portland has ever established any street grades within the bounds of the premises described in the answer in this proceeding in paragraph 1 thereof. That the said city of East Portland never accepted, acknowledged, or claimed that any streets existed within the bounds of the premises described in said answer, and that the said city of Portland never accepted the dedication of any street within the bounds of said premises, and never intimat-

Although it is alleged in Weber v. Iowa City, 119 Iowa, 633, 93 N. W. 637, that the city collected taxes on the land in question, the effect of this taxation was not determined in the opinion, which was allowed to rest on the long-continued use of the land without interference by the city, and the making of improvements thereon. Though there is no affirmative action on the part of the city leading the landowner to believe that the street had been vacated, appearing in this case, it does appear that the owner made an attempt at vacating the plat previously to going into possession. The decision is placed upon the ground of abandonment and estoppel, and no satisfactory distinction between the two theories is made.

And where there has been no dedication, or the dedication has never been accepted by the municipality, so that there is in fact no street, an affirmative act on the part of the municipality is not necessary to work an estoppel. Cambridge v. Cook, 97 Iowa, 599, 66 N. W. 884; Burroughs v. Cherokee, 134 Iowa, 429, 109 N. W. 876. At least, an estoppel was held to exist in Cambridge v. Cook, where there was no dedication, without an affirmative act on the part of the municipality appearing; and likewise without any affirmative act existing, estoppel was held to exist in Burroughs v. Cherokee, where there had been no acceptance until after the municipality was estopped.

In Arnold v. Volkman, 123 Wis. 54, 101 N. W. 158, an action between private parties, it is stated that where the claimant to land did no act and paid out no money in reliance upon any act or refusal to act on the part of the city, but on the contrary had not changed his position, the mere non-use of a strip of land by the public for street purposes for nearly fourteen years does not effect an estoppel against the municipality.

Where a claimant has gone into possession of the land with full knowledge of the existence of an alley, and has improved his land as if no alley were in existence, and has maintained possession for about fifteen years, the municipality is not estopped from claiming the land as an alley, although the opening thereof would separate a barn from a house and would necessitate the moving of some buildings. The moving of the buildings, however it spoken of as a matter not of serious importance. Taraldson v. Lime Springs, 92 Iowa, 187, 60 N. W. 658. Nothing is said in this case as to knowledge on the part of the city of the claim as to the alley, and it appears that the alley was not necessary for public use until the attempt to open the same was made.

3. Possession not adverse.

Where the occupation is not adverse to the public,—estoppel does not exist against the municipality.

The inclosure by the owner of lots, of a street with such lots, intending the inclosure to exist until such time as the municipality should need the street, and the possession of the lot and street as thus inclosed, by his grantee thereafter for about fifteen years, including the time from 1861 to 1867, when the statute of limitations was suspended, do not work an estoppel against the municipality. Sims v. Chattanooga, 2 Lea, 694. Buildings had been erected on the lot which encroached slightly upon the street in question, but nothing is said as to the effect of this upon the estoppel.

Injunction to restrain a city from opening up streets was denied in Burroughs v. Cherokee, 134 Iowa, 429, 109 N. W. 876, where the city had delayed for fourteen or fifteen years in accepting the dedication of streets, and during all this time the possession was maintained by private parties who conveyed the lots as numbered on the recorded plat, and residences were erected thereon, so that to close the streets claimed would make cul-de-sacs of those on which the residences were located, and where no taxes were charged or paid on the land dedicated as streets. It was further shown in this case that the platted land including the streets in question was fenced, but that gates were placed at the ed or claimed that any streets so existed until the month of September, 1907.

"(10) That on the 15th day of February, 1888, James B. Stephens conveyed to George W. McCoy and M. M. Clinton all the property in controversy lying west of Grand avenue, which was then known as Fifth street, together with other property, and that at said time said premises contained part of Stephens slough, as heretofore stated, which was an impassable slough about 20 to 30 feet in depth below the surface of the water, and from 30 to 50 feet from the surface of the water to the top of the banks surrounding said slough, and the high ground lying to the south of said slough was rough ground, covered with stumps, trees, logs, and thick underbrush; and said grantees thereupon began to clear the same, and cleared the said tract south of said slough, irrespective of, and, without reference to, or consideration of, any street or streets, and surrounded the premises lying south of said slough and west of Grand avenue, shown on the map of Stephens's addition as blocks 29, 32, 49, 50, 31, and parts of 32 and 51, with a high board fence, and erected in the southwestern portion of said inclosed premises a grand stand and conducted baseball games thereon, and used the said premises as a baseball park, and excluded the public therefrom otherwise than by the payment of an admission fee, and said baseball park and said fence included that portion shown on said maps as street crossings, so that the public could use the streets if they desired to do so, and that a sanitarium and grounds were constructed on the land, and that part of one building and a lake were situated on the land dedicated as streets; and these are stated to be the only circumstances occurring in the case which were inconsistent with the right to acquire the streets by acceptance. Apparently, the doctrine of estoppel was urged against the city in this case, as this doctrine is discussed in the opinion, and it is apparently on the theory that no estoppel exists against the municipality in this case that relief is denied.

The facts in Lee v. Mound Station, 118 Ill. 304, 8 N. E. 759, in which an estoppel was held not to exist against the municipality, do not clearly appear further than that the original dedicatory remained in possession of the land, but disclaimed hostility to the public. Apparently, a public square was the only property of which possession was sought in this case, and no streets were involved.

4. Duration of elements of estoppel.

As to the length of time the elements necessary to work an estoppel must continue, it was laid down in an early Iowa case that they must extend over a period of at least ten years in analogy to the statute of limitation. Davies v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574, approved in Orr v. O'Brien, 77 Iowa, 213, 14 Am. St. Rep. 277, 42 N. W. 183. And in all the Iowa cases within the scope of the present note, there was a nonuser by the municipality and possession by private parties for at least ten years. The length of time necessary to work an estoppel varies, however, in a majority of the jurisdictions, according to the facts of the particular case. An examination of the cases discloses, however, that the possession was maintained for long periods.

The existence of an estoppel was held to be a question of fact in Chafee v. Aiken, 57 S. C. 507, 35 S. E. 800, 36 S. E. 3, and the test of the existence of an estoppel to be whether it would be inequitable for the municipality to set up its claim to the street. Accordingly, it was held in this case that it could not be said as a matter of law that silence of the city for twenty years, while the landowner was improving the property, would work an estoppel.

Where the municipality has attempted to vacate the street, although it may not have power to do so, the element of long-continued nonuser by the municipality and possession by the private parties is not so important. People ex rel. Friend v. Wieboldt, 233 Ill. 572, 84 N. E. 646. In this case there was between two and three years' occupation, valuable improvements had been erected, and the landowner had dedicated other land to connect the ends of the alley on either side of the vacated portion with other streets.

It seems that in Wisconsin there can be no estoppel effected against a municipality before the street is required for public use.

The court in Reilly v. Racine, 51 Wis. 526, 8 N. W. 417, lays down the broad proposition that until a street is required by the public use, no mere nonuser for any length of time will operate as an abandonment of it, and all persons in possession of it will be presumed to hold subject to the paramount rights of the public. The court then held that, in the absence of evidence, it will be presumed that the public authorities who are attempting to open a street did so as soon as public necessity required, and denied an injunction to one who was in possession of the land claimed as a street. While the doctrine of equitable estoppel is referred to in the case, it is not made clear whether, in the opinion of the court, there could be no equitable estoppel against a municipality in the absence of a necessity for the public use of the street as to which the estoppel is claimed. However, in State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387, 22 N. W. 576, an action to recover a penalty for obstructing a street by a barn erected within the limits of the street, the fact that, before a street was required for public use, the municipal authorities had paid a part of the expense of removing a store out of one street, leaving it still in the street of which complaint was made, paid rent streets within the bounds of said baseball park.

"(11) That in the year 1889 J. T. Stewart was the mayor of the city of East Portland, and appeared anxious to encourage the establishment of manufacturing plants on the east side of the Willamette river and in the city of East Portland, and that he delivered a message to the council requesting the encouragement of enterprises within the bounds of East Portland, and that before and about said time said defendants R. D. Inman and Johan Poulsen were looking for a site upon which to locate a sawmill, and, pursuant to such message of the said mayor and the request of the city council of East Portland, councilman Hardie, then a member of said council of East Portland, invited the said defendants R. D. Inman and Johan Poulsen to locate and establish their proposed sawmill on the east side of the river. Subsequent to said time said defendants had negotiated with George W. McCoy and Richard Clinton with a view toward locating a sawmill on the premises now occupied by the defendant Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company, and that, pursuant to the invitation and encouragement of said councilman Hardie, the defendant Johan Poulsen, in the month of August, 1889, interviewed said J. T. Stewart, who was then the mayor of said city of East Portland, and said defendant informed said mayor that he and his associates were about to acquire the said premises herein described, and that they intended to locate for a part of that street for use as a pound and lock-up, taxed the adjoining lots by metes and bounds to the section line in the center thereof, and required the adjoining owner to bear the cost of a sidewalk in front of his store within the limits of the street, was expressly held to work no estoppel against the municipal authorities.

That estoppel will not run against a municipality until the land is needed for street purposes is indicated in Taraldson v. Lime Springs, 92 Iowa, 187, 60 N. W. 658, but the real basis of that decision is that there were no equities against the municipality and in favor of the claimant. See this case infra.

But where some affirmative act is taken by the municipality, estoppel may result, even though the public necessity does not require the opening of the street.

Thus, where a lumber company and its grantor have been in possession of land for more than thirty years, and for more than twenty years after the municipal council refused to open the street, have used it and the adjoining premises as a lumber yard, filling the same up and grading it so that it could be used, erecting buildings upon the land claimed as a street at a considerable expense, and all openly and with the knowledge of the officers of the city, the city is estopped from opening the street. Paine Lumber Co. v. Oshkosh, 89 Wis. 449, 61 N. W. 1108.

c. Particular cases.

In Jordan v. Chenoa, 166 Ill. 530, 47 N. E. 191, where the adjoining landowner had inclosed the land claimed as an alley, with his land, and had been in the open and notorious possession of the same for more than twenty years, had trees growing thereon and a house standing on a part of it, and a hedge fence growing across the end of the strip, and had used it as his own property without objection from any quarter, the municipality was held estopped to claim the ground as a street.

Where a city allowed private parties to occupy the premises claimed as a street for more than sixty years, and received taxes on at least a portion of the disputed premises, and the parties so occupying the premises erected buildings on a part thereof, and with the consent of the city authorities constructed docks on the premises, the municipality is estopped to claim the land as a street. Peoria v. Central Nat. Bank, 224 Ill. 43, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 687, 79 N. E. 296.

Where the officers of a municipality know that the streets and alleys in a plat are inclosed with the adjoining land, and that the owner for more than twenty-five years has been making valuable improvements thereon without objection from these officers to the use of the property in such a manner, inconsistent with the assertion of any right thereto on the part of the city, the city is estopped from thereafter asserting any right to the streets and alleys. Schooling v. Harrisburg, 42 Or. 494, 71 Pac. 605.

In determining upon the merchantability of a title in Baldwin v. Trimble, 85 Md. 396, 36 L.R.A. 489, 37 Atl. 176, the court holds that where the city has abandoned a street, although no action has been taken to vacate the same, and the street has been built up by private parties with buildings, and such possession by private parties has been maintained for about twenty-five years, the city is equitably estopped from claiming the land as a street.

In Cambridge v. Cook, 97 Iowa, 599, 66 N. W. 884, a municipality was held estopped from proceeding to open up an alley in the defendant's exclusive possession, in which it had acquiesced for more than fifteen years after its incorporation, and the public had stood by and seen the defendant erect valuable improvements thereon, including an orchard and a barn, and had seen him fence and cultivate it for nearly thirty years.

Where certain streets marked on the plat of an addition to a city were never used by the public as streets for a period of over twenty years, and surrounding streets were vacated by the city for railroad and other purposes, and finally the streets in question were inclosed by a substantial fence a sawmill upon the same, and that they intended to manufacture lumber and use the premises now occupied by them for their manufacturing plant, and requested that if said city claimed any interest or right in said premises or any portion thereof, or for the use of the public as a street or otherwise, that the same should be vacated; and he was informed by the said mayor that the said city of East Portland did not and would not claim any of said premises as a public street or highway, except that the city claimed Fifth street, now Grand avenue, as a public street. That thereupon said defendant Johan Poulsen obtained legal advice as to whether the public had any rights within the premises now occupied by defendant Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company, and was assured that no public rights existed therein. That said defendants Johan Poulsen and R. D. Inman, in good faith and with reliance upon the statements and encouragement of the mayor and council of the city of East Portland, began and completed the erection of a large sawmill, planing mill, and lumber plant upon said premises, and erected and built wharves and docks in the Willamette river abutting upon said premises, and proceeded to fill said Stephens slough, and to erect such other buildings as were necessary and convenient for the general manufacture of lumber, and duly completed the erection of such lumber mill in the year 1890, and erected its buildings irrespective of the existence of any streets, and in good faith, and otherwise improved and used as private property, a dwelling house being erected on one of them, and it is further shown that the ground could be made fit for street purposes only by the expenditure of a large amount of money in filling and grading, the city will be estopped from claiming the ground as a street. John Mouat Lumber Co. v. Denver, 21 Colo. 1, 40 Pac. 237.

A city was held estopped in Edwardsville v. Barnsback, 66 Ill. App. 381, where a private person and those under whom he claimed had been in peaceable, open, and adverse possession of the land claimed as a street for more than fifty years, and during that period had inclosed it, and uninterruptedly used a part of it as a house lot, and had on it buildings, a well, orchard, fences, and fruit trees, all within the actual knowledge of the municipality.

Where there is some doubt as to whether a street was ever dedicated, and for more than twenty years the city has, without objection, permitted a private person to occupy the street and at considerable expense place permanent improvements thereon, the removal of which and the opening of the street would cause him great injury, and also segregate a portion of his premises from the remainder, the city will be estopped from opening the street. Von Tobel v. Lewistown, 41 Mont. 226, 137 Am. St. Rep. 733, 108 Pac. 910.

Where a rolling mill company has possession of a tract of land through which streets had been laid out in a dedication made prior to the land becoming a part of the city, and erected thereon, including the land claimed as a street, railroad tracks and buildings necessary to its business, and the municipality for over forty years acquiesced in this use of the land, not claiming it as a street, such municipality is equitably estopped from claiming the land for street purposes. Chicago v. Illinois Steel Co. 229 Ill. 303, 120 Am. St. Rep. 258, 82 N. E. 286. It would have been necessary in this case to have reconstructed the entire plant if the land claimed as a street had been allowed to the city, and the city, having allowed such improvements to be made costing millions of dollars, on the faith and belief that there was no street in existence where the improvements were made, was held to be equitably estopped from claiming the land for street purposes.

Where a city acquiesced in the use of a street by a private corporation to the exclusion of the public for about fifty years, and such corporation erected a mill on an adjoining tract of land, and constructed a mill pond on substantially the entire street, so that to open the street would require the rearrangement and reconstruction of the mill pond and yard, the city is estopped from opening the street. Reichert Mill Co. v. Freeburg, 217 Ill. 384, 75 N. E. 544.

On the contrary, in Louisiana Ice Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 217, 9 So. 21, the right of a city to open a street which had been regularly established was affirmed as against a manufacturing company which had maintained possession of the tract for more than thirty years, and had erected vaults and fences thereon, the moving of which would be rendered necessary by the opening of the street. It is not clear that the doctrine of estoppel received much consideration in the decision of this case. The city had collected taxes on the property, and it was urged that the assessment and collection of taxes by the city operated as an estoppel to open the street, but further than this nothing is said as to estoppel. See reference to this case under subdivision II. supra.

Estoppel has been held to exist with reference to highways also.

The total abandonment of a public highway by the public, together with actual, open, notorious, and adverse holding of possession by an adjoining landowner for about twenty-five years, works an estoppel against the public from claiming any right in the highway. Orr v. O'Brien, 77 Iowa, 253, 14 Am. St. Rep. 277, 42 N. W. 183.

The failure of the public to assert any right to land claimed as a highway for nearly thirty years, and the possession of the land by an adjoining landowner and his grantors during this time, adverse to and expended in the erection of said lumber mill and plant large sums of money, and that during the period between September, 1889, and the present date, the said defendants and Inman, Poulsen, & Company, a corporation, occupied all of said premises now occupied by them, openly, continuously, notoriously, and adversely, and have excluded the public from said premises, and during all of said time conducted the business of a sawmill under claim of right, and believing in good faith that no street easement whatsoever existed within the boundary of the premises now occupied by them. That valuable and extensive improvements were made by said all other claimants, estop the public from asserting any right to the land in question. Smith v. Gorrell, 81 Iowa, 218, 46 N. W. 992.

See also Almy v. Church, 18 R. I. 182, 26 Atl. 58, supra.

So, estoppel has been held to exist where some affirmative action on the part of the municipality is shown, together with the possession and improvements.

The doctrine of equitable estoppel was applied in Boisé City v. Wilkinson, 16 Idaho, 150, 102 Pac. 148, and a municipality was denied the right to recover ground which had formerly been a street where the municipality gave a deed therefor after the legislature had attempted to abandon the street (an act which it had no power to do), and the grantee and his successors had possession of the land for a period of forty years, had erected valuable improvements thereon, and the street was never used as a street, but was always recognized by the municipal authorities as private property.

Although a municipality may not have had power to vacate a street, yet where it has attempted to do so and obtained from the adjoining landowner the dedication of a portion of his lot for alleys to connect the unvacated portions of the alley with other streets, and has granted to such lot owner a permit to construct buildings on the vacated land, and such buildings have been constructed at an expense to the landowner, the city is estopped to evict him from the portion of the street vacated. People ex rel. Friend v. Wieboldt, 233 Ill. 572, 84 N. E. 646.

Where a municipality has made an attempt to vacate an alley, which attempt is irregular, but thereafter an adjoining landowner has inclosed the alley with his land and continuously used and occupied the same under a claim of right for nineteen years, and has set out trees which have grown to a considerable size, planted shrubbery, built a summer house, dug a well, erected valuable fences, constructed a private driveway, and otherwise beautified and enhanced the value of the entire premises, and during all this time the municipality has taken no action to prevent it, but has apparently relied on its efforts at vacadefendants and by said Inman, Poulsen, & Company over the whole of said premises having the appearance of streets as shown on the map of Stephens's addition to East Portland, and erected buildings across the same, and made fills with thousands of yards of materials, and built adjuncts to said lumber mill and plant, and erected landings and platforms and all things necessary and convenient for the use of a large lumber manufacturing plant.

"(12) That on the 27th day of November, 1906, the whole plant of Inman, Poulsen, & Company and the defendants herein was completely destroyed by fire. Said fire occurred at night and created great excite-tion, the municipality is estopped from claiming the alley. Blennerhassett v. Forest City, 117 Iowa, 680, 91 N. W. 1044.

Where the municipality has attempted to vacate an alley, but by an error the wrong block is described, and thereafter the adjoining owner fences up the alley and erects buildings on different parts thereof, and so holds possession for over twenty years, the municipality is estopped from claiming the land as the street. El Paso v. Hoagland, 224 Ill. 263, 79 N. E. 658.

But where a city council made an ineffectual attempt to vacate certain streets, and subsequently entered into an ultra vires contract with a railroad company again to vacate the streets, but, before any improvements were placed upon the streets or any changes made, repealed the ordinance of attempted vacation, the city is not estopped from claiming the land as streets, notwithstanding there were subsequent improvements placed thereon by the railroad company. Ashland v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 105 Wis. 398, 80 N. W. 1101; Ashland v. Northern P. R. Co. 119 Wis. 204, 96 N. W. 688.

See also Paine Lumber Co. v. Oshkosh, 89 Wis. 449, 61 N. W. 1108, supra.

Where the city has levied and collected assessments upon the land claimed as a street, which was held by the claimant for more than thirty years, and improvements erected thereon during the time, the city is estopped from claiming the land as a street. Simplot v. Dubuque, 49 Iowa, 630.

A city was held estopped to claim land as streets in Smith v. Osage, 80 Iowa, 84, 8 L.R.A. 633, 45 N. W. 404, where the land had been platted and streets indicated thereon and the plat filed, but the owner continued in possession thereof as farm land for thirty years, eighteen of which were after the municipality was organized as a city, and the city made no attempt during the time to open the streets, but on the contrary taxed the land dedicated as streets as private property.

Where the city has taxed property and levied special assessments upon it for thirty years, and the defendant has occupied it under a claim of right for nineteen years before the commencement of the action, ment in the city of Portland, and that it was generally known and published within the said city that said plant had been destroyed, and it was generally known and published, and was known by the officials of the city of Portland, that said Inman, Poulsen, & Company were rebuilding a larger and more complete plant than the plant destroyed by fire as aforesaid, and that they continued the building of said plant without objection from the city of Portland or its officials, and have completed on said premises in controversy a sawmill and lumber plant with the greatest capacity of any sawmill in the world, and ever since have conducted on said premises said lumbering plant and sawmill, and have occupied the whole of said premises hereinafter described, with notice to all of the officials of the city of Portland; that the defendant Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company has continued to enlarge its plant, and has succeeded to all of the interests of its predecessors in title, and now has upon said premises a lumbering plant and sawmill of an actual annual capacity of 151,000,000 feet of lumber, and that it is necessary for the practical and proper operation of said plant to occupy the whole of the premises now occupied by them, and that during the operation and extension of defendants' plant, the defendant Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company during which time the land has been treated as private property, the municipality is estopped from claiming the land as a street. Davenport v. Boyd, 109 Iowa, 248, 77 Am. St. Rep. 536, 80 N. W. 314.

The mere fact, however, that a city has collected taxes and levied and collected an assessment upon a strip of land dedicated as a street, and also, in widening the streets connected by the street in question, has condemned the ends of the strip of land, does not estop the city from claiming the land as a street, where the strip of land is used by the public as a street. Seattle v. Hinckley, 67 Wash. 273, 121 Pac. 444.

In some of the Iowa cases, no satisfactory distinction is made between the theories of abandonment, adverse possession, and estoppel. This doubtless arises from the holding in an early Iowa case (Pella v. Scholte, 24 Iowa, 283, 95 Am. Dec. 729) that a private party may acquire the right to hold a public square by adverse possession. That land held for the public cannot be acquired by adverse possession against the municipality is the generally accepted doctrine of subsequent cases in this state, and a limitation was placed upon Pella v. Scholte in Davies v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574, —but the doctrine has caused some confusion in the Iowa cases.

In Smith v. Osage, 80 Iowa, 84, 8 L.R.A. 633, 45 N. W. 404, supra, the court, after holding that the city could not claim land dedicated as a street apparently on the theory of estoppel, adds: "We reach the conclusion that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, and that defendant is estopped to set up the claim of the public to the land in controversy."

Where the dedicator of a plat made an ineffectual attempt to vacate the same, including the street in question, and thereafter went into possession of the land under a claim of right, and held the same for more than ten years, for eight or nine of which taxes were levied and paid by him, and the property used for agricultural purposes, the city is estopped from thereafter claiming the street. Uptagraff v. Smith, 106 Iowa, 385, 76 N. W. 733. Although the opinion states that the person in possession of the street was entitled to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

relief against the municipality by virtue of her adverse possession under a claim of right for more than ten years, it seems that the term "adverse possession" is used in a somewhat loose sense, and refers to the estoppel against the municipality rather than to adverse possession as that term is strictly construed.

In Weber v. Iowa City, 119 Iowa, 633, 93 N. W. 637, the right of a municipality to open a street was denied where the landowner, after an ineffectual attempt at vacation, entered into possession of the land, inclosed it with fences, and made other valuable improvements thereon, remaining in possession, claiming and using the land as his own for more than thirty years, with the knowledge of and without objection by the city. The ground of this decision is not made clear by the opinion. In one part, the city is treated as having abandoned the street, and therefore not entitled to claim it; in another part, the ground is that of estoppel. These theories are treated by the court as at least similar, as, after referring to the theory of abandonment, it is stated that "parallel with cases thus holding, and largely along the same lines of reasoning, are the numerous decisions which apply to the doctrine of estoppel to municipal corporations, to prevent the assertion of public right to a street where the exercise of such right would be inequitable."

The court in Taraldson v. Lime Springs, 92 Iowa, 187, 60 N. W. 658, states that "the plea of an estoppel presents the question of the statute of limitations," and also refers to some earlier cases in which the doctrine of estoppel was applied with reference to an easement in the nature of a public highway. The latter cases are distinguished from the case at bar by stating that they were cases of neglect to use property in which the public had an easement, while the case at bar was one which, according to the Iowa doctrine, vested a fee simple in the public. The real decision in this case, however, seems to be based upon the fact that there were no equities in favor of the claimant, and therefore no ground for an equitable estoppel.

"(18) That on the 24th day of November, 1908, the city of Portland caused six complaints to be filed against defendants Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company and Johan Poulsen, accusing them of violating said Ordinance No. 7,130, and that in each case said defendants were arrested and were charged with wilfully and unlawfully maintaining and keeping buildings and structures standing within and upon certain public streets, and that said alleged streets were within the bounds of the premises heretofore described. That said defendants appeared in said actions in the municipal court of the city of Portland, county of Multnomah, state of Oregon, and defended the same, and, the title to said real estate being involved, each of said actions were certified to the circuit court for further proceedings. That on the 9th day of April, 1909, said defendants were charged with violating an ordinance providing that no street should be filled or improvement made without a permit from the city, and a complaint was filed against said defendants in the municipal court of the city of Portland, Multnomah county, state of Oregon, making such charges against the defendants, and that said defendants appeared in said court and defended said action in said court, and, the title to real estate being involved, the same was certified to the circuit court for further action, and that the same was duly set down for trial on motion of the city of Portland for the 5th day of January, 1911, and that the said city of Portland dismissed the same complaint. That in the month of January, 1911, eleven complaints were filed in the municipal court for the city of Portland, county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, charging defendants with obstructing alleged streets, and that defendants were arrested and appeared in said actions in said court, and, the title to real estate being involved, all of said actions were certified to the circuit court for further proceedings. That all of said actions are still pending against these defendants for the obstruction of alleged streets through the premises heretofore described, and none of the same have been brought to trial, and they are now pending, and have not been dismissed. That all of said actions involve the same questions of title as are involved in this suit, and that the plaintiff has had ample time and opportunity to bring said actions on for trial, and has neglected to do so."
